INTRODUCTORY.

OF all the names with which Scotland has adorned history, no one stands out more proudly than that of Sir William Wallace. This famous hero is in a conspicuous manner the boast of his country—a country which, from first to last, has contributed rather more than her fair share of the great men of the world.

Romance never pictured to herself a career of more thrilling interest than that of Wallace.

by Providence, and by the achievement of liberty, he accomplished such success as no other man of his time could have achieved. He left even of the few knights of his time who were his footstepers with something to be said in him an "extraordinary" man. In a short space of time, in the conquest of his native country, developed a character which, without exaggeration, he termed heroic.

His memory is cherished, and his name is revered, not only by his countrymen, but by all who love the deeds of liberty. Will not be wondered at those who read the following

CHARACTERISTICS FOR A KING

On the night, in March 1286, Alexander III. of Scotland, long remembered as "the good King Alexander," rode along the north shore of the Firth opposite to Edinburgh. Near the present burn of Kinghorn he had to pass over a rugged rocky story of basaltic trap. Here he was pitched from his horse and killed.

This event must be our starting point if we are to understand the career of Sir William Wallace and intelligently estimate the services rendered by him to his country.

With the death of Alexander a period of profound tranquillity came to a close. His reign had been characterized by national prosperity of no other order. Manufactures had flourished, industry in all hands had grown rich, the ports of Scotland had been crowded by foreign merchantmen. It had been emphatically a time of peace and plenty. The period which was opened may well be described as one of the most glorious in the history of a nation.

The heir to the Scottish throne was Alexander's grand-daughter and only daughter, King Eric of Norway, a little princess, just two years of age.

This child was of special interest to the English nation. Their monarch, Edward I., had resolved on her marriage to his son, and as a peaceful means of effecting the union of the two kingdoms, a project long entertained on the south side of the Firth. He had even gone so far as to obtain a dispensation from the Pope to enable the wedding to take place—the young Edward and the infant Queen of Scots were cousins-german—and so within the prescribed limits by the canon law.

Edward's plans, however, were frustrated by an unlooked-for death. On the 1st September, 1290, the young Queen—the Maid of Norway, as she was called—died at Orkney, on her way to Scotland. In her the royal line of William the Lion became extinct, and an empty throne had to be supplied for.

Genealogists were now ransacked, and could discover that an inter-marriage with royal blood had occurred in his family, by a claim to be King. There were no fewer than seven claimants. The two who certainly show the true title were Robert Bruce and John Balliol. The question between these two claimants was not free from doubt, according to the custom of the time; and Edward, to whom the decision was referred, appears at first to have acted with good faith. But this great King, who had already subdued Wales, was now bent on uniting the British Islands under one sceptre, and in the pursuit of that object he sacrificed humanity, honour, and justice. He first having declared for neither Balliol nor Bruce, but to himself his sovereign, recognising Balliol, however as a vassal, and accordingly he had that weak-minded man crowned at Scone on the 30th November, 1292.

Taking advantage of his superior power, and of his influence with the barons of Norman race, who were then the foremost persons among the nobility of Scotland, Edward now did his best to establish English supremacy over the northern Kingdom. Satisfying trade, unassailed villages, the Scotch at length made no attempt, when Balliol at the head, to drive out the English, and restore native usage. It failed, however, and the battle of Dunbar, fought in the spring of 1296, only made Edward's power the greater. Balliol was captured and sent to London, and all the possible powers of the country were placed in the hands of English

Then, indeed, Edward's claim to the sovereignty of Scotland, and the country with which it was connected, raised the opposition of all classes of the Scottish people, except the higher nobles. The clergy, and the middle and lower classes of the Lowlands, had for many years identified themselves with the country in which they dwelt, rather than with the great English race from which most of them drew their descent; and what has been styled the War of Independence began, which resulted in the deliverance of Scotland from foreign rule. At the cost, however, of the comparative civilization and tranquillity which the country had enjoyed under the descendants of Malcolm Canmore. Of this struggle Wallace was the great head.

WALLACE'S BIRTH AND DESCENT; MILITARY CAPACITY AND PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

Sir William Wallace was born in the reign

Alexander III. The precise year of his birth is not mentioned in any record at present known to exist. He was the second son of Sir Malcolm Wallace of Ellerslie, near Paisley, a knight whose family was ancient but neither rich nor noble. He had himself been knighted, and was thus, by the etiquette of Norman chivalry, as well entitled to lead armies as any noble, or even monarch, of his day.

"To which of the several races inhabiting Scotland his family belonged," says Mr. John Hill Burton, "is a question that has been deemed interesting, since he was certainly the representative and champion of the remnant of the Saxon, or pure Norse inhabitants of Britain, who had not yet been subjected to the southern yoke. But social position was of more weight in this matter than mere origin. He may have been of Norman descent; there were Wallaces scattered over England, and one came in with the Conqueror. But in reality the Normans were of the same northern Teutonic blood as the Saxons.

"If a family had been living among the Scotch people from generation to generation, it mattered not whether the first who had pitched his tabernacle there had come from Denmark or Friesland; whether he had been one of the Saxons of England, seeking refuge from the tyranny of William's forest-laws, or a grandson of one of William's own followers. The interests and feelings of such a family would be in harmony with those of the commonalty of which they were a part, and it was of such a family that William Wallace came."

Wallace was a man of vast political and military genius. As a soldier we find in him one of those marvellously-gifted men met with at long intervals, who can see through the military superstitions of the day, and organize a formidable resistance out of those elements which the pedantic soldier rejects as rubbish. In those days bodily strength and knightly powers were of the highest consequence in commanding respect and ensuring success. Wallace had an iron frame. His make, as he grew up to manhood, approached almost to the gigantic; and his personal strength was superior to the common run of even the strongest men. His passions were hasty and violent; a strong hatred to the English, who now insolently lorded it over Scotland, began to show itself at a very early period of his life; and this aversion was fostered in the youth by an uncle, a priest, who, deploring the calamities of his country, was never weary of extolling the sweets of liberty, and lamenting the miseries of dependence. Philosophy had not yet come to the conclusion that one government is as good as another.

FIRST EXPLOITS.

"Of the character," remarks Mr. Hill Burton, "in which Wallace first became formidable, the accounts in literature are distractingly conflicting. With the chroniclers of his own country, who wrote after the War of Independence, he is raised to the highest pinnacle of magnanimity and heroism. To the English contemporary chronicler he is a pestilent ruffian; a disturber of the peace of society; an outrager of all laws and social duties; finally, a robber—the head of one of the many bands of robbers and marauders then infesting Scotland. But Edward's government and organization were not of a kind to permit mere daring and robbery, and there were far more formidable powers at work than these, which the administration of criminal justice could cope with. The people were all exasperated, and all ready to rise against their new oppressors, wanting but a leader; and the course of events brought them that leader in Wallace."

The intrepid temper of Wallace appears first to have shown itself in a quarrel in the town of Lanark, with some of the English officers who insulted him. This led to bloodshed; and he would have been overpowered and slain in the streets had it not been for the interference of a female dependent, to whose house he fled, and by whose assistance he escaped to the neighbouring woods. In a spirit of cruel and unmanly revenge, Hislop, the English sheriff, attacked the house and put the woman to death; for which he was himself assaulted and slain by Wallace.

The consequence of this was to him the same as to many others who at this time preferred a life of dangerous freedom to the indulgence and security of submission. He was proclaimed a traitor, banished his home, and driven to seek safety in the wilds and fastnesses of his country. It was here that he collected by degrees a little band, composed at first of a few brave men of desperate fortunes, who had forsworn their vassalage to their lords and refused submission to Edward, and who at first carried on that predatory warfare against the English to which they were impelled as well by the desire of plunder and the necessity of subsistence as by the love of liberty.

These men chose Wallace for their chief. Superior rank—for as yet none of the nobility or barons had joined them—his uncommon courage and personal strength, and his unconquerable thirst of vengeance against the English, naturally influenced their choice, and the result proved how well it had fallen. His plans were laid with so much judgment, that in his first attacks against straggling parties of the English he was generally successful. Or if surprised by unexpected numbers, his superior strength and bravery, and the ardour with which he inspired his followers, enabled them to overpower every effort which was made against them.

To him these early and desultory excursions against the enemy were highly useful, as he thus became acquainted with the strongest passes of his country, and acquired habits of command over men of fierce and turbulent spirits. To them the advantage was reciprocal, for they began gradually to feel confidence in their leader; they were accustomed to rapid marches, to endure fatigue and privation, to be on their guard against surprise, to feel the effects of discipline and obedience, and by the successes which these insured, to regard with contempt the nation by whom they had allowed themselves to be overcome. Amongst the stories told of Wallace at this time, we may repeat the following, in which there is something characteristic.

A DANGEROUS ADVENTURE.

One day, having visited Ayr in disguise, Wallace's attention was attracted by a crowd collected near the quarters of the military. In the midst of a circle of his own countrymen there stood an Englishman of huge dimensions, playing off his wicker against the Scots, and offering, for a groat, an opportunity of avenging any injury they might have received from the English, by permitting the best among them to exert their utmost strength in striking a blow upon his back with a pole which he held in his hand; accompanying this absurd declaration with ridiculous gestures and scurrilous language, while his mailed companions, with arms akimbo, stood loitering round, laughing and enjoying the humour of their bulky buffoon.

Wallace approached, and offered three times the sum for the permission offered. This was readily agreed to by the jester, who winked to his companion, as he prepared to fulfil the conditions. The wary Scot had observed the trick; and grasping the pole above the place where it was intended to give way, he let fall a blow with such good will that the spine yielded to its force, and the foolish fellow sank with a groan at the feet of his companions.

Instantly the swords of the English were out to revenge the slaughter of their favourite. One of them, advancing towards the offender, received a blow on the head, which laid him dead across the body of the jester. Surrounded on all sides by the increasing numbers of his adversaries, he applied his weapon with a rapidity and force which kept the most forward of them at bay. Over the steel bacinet of a powerful trooper the fatal pole was shivered to pieces. Others, seeing him, as they imagined, disarmed by this incident, rushed forward, expecting to overwhelm him with their numbers; but on drawing his sword, which he had concealed under his dress, they as quickly receded from the well-known power of his arm.

Having, by his trusty blade, cleared the way to one of the outlets of the town, he was there attacked by two of the boldest of the garrison, who had not before mingled in the fray. The object of one of them appeared to be, to engage him in a little sword-play, and thus give his party an opportunity of hemming him in; but Wallace, aware of the value of his time, broke through the guard of his artful opponent with a blow which clove him to the teeth; while the other, in the act of retreating, received a thrust through an opening in his armour which laid him senseless by the side of his companion. Five of the English soldiers had now fallen beneath the arm of the youthful warrior, and the rest seemed so averse to come within his reach that he had time to gain a little copse in the neighbourhood, where he had left his horse before he had entered the town, and bounding into the saddle, Wallace was soon beyond the reach of any fresh assistance they might procure. Horse and foot were, however, soon on the alert; but after a long and fruitless pursuit, they were obliged to return—some of those who had already witnessed his prowess no way displeased at their want of success.

THE BURNING OF THE BARN OF AYR.

Another of Wallace's exploits about this time was the burning of what were called the Barns of Ayr. It seems that the English governor of Ayr had invited a large number of the Scottish nobility and gentry to meet him at these barns or buildings, for the purpose, as he pretended, of conferring together in a friendly manner on the affairs of Scotland. He really, however, meditated the most cold-blooded and relentless treachery. His intention was to put the whole assembly of gentlemen to death, by causing soldiers in attendance to run nooses over their heads, and then hang them to the beams of the roof. A large number accepted his invitation, unsuspecting of any such plot, and as they were admitted into the house, nooses were thrown over their heads, and they were immediately drawn up to the beams overhead and hanged. Amongst the sufferers in this infamous tragedy was Reginald Crawford, the sheriff of Ayrshire, and uncle to Wallace.

Wallace heard what had happened, and he determined on severe retaliation. Selecting fifty of his confederates, he hastened to the spot, and being joined by a number of the retainers of the murdered gentlemen, they surrounded the buildings where the English were cantoned, and who, indulging in fancied security, arising from the terror which they imagined their last act was likely to impress upon the Scots, had, after a deep carousal, betaken themselves to rest, little dreaming of the vengeance that awaited them.

Having procured the necessary combustibles, Wallace, after disposing of his men so as to prevent the escape of any of the English, set fire to the thatch, which being covered with pitch, the flames soon spread to every part of the buildings, and rose in one general conflagration, while the screaming wretches within, vainly attempting to escape, were received on the points of the Scottish swords, and either killed or forced back to perish in the devouring element. It is said that five hundred of the English suffered in this lamentable manner. The severity of the retaliation can only be palliated by the nature of the war the parties were engaged in, and the desperation to which the cruelty of the invaders had goaded on the wretched inhabitants.

If tradition may be credited, Wallace did not remain till the flames were extinguished; for when about two miles on his return, at an elevated part of the road, he is said to have made his men look back on the still blazing scene of their vengeance, remarking at the same time that "the barns of Ayr burn well." This spot is still pointed out.

AT GARGUNNOCK.

The Scottish insurgents having at last become abundantly supplied with all the munitions of war, and being animated by their success to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, became impatient to prosecute hostilities against their oppressors; and their leader, who was not of a character to allow the swords of brave men to rest in their scabbards, soon found them an opportunity to gratify their wishes.

At Gargunnoch, in the neighbourhood of Stirling, the English had erected a small fortification, or peel, which they had plentifully furnished with provisions. Some of the Scots in that quarter, who secretly adhered to Wallace, observing the carelessness which at times prevailed in setting the watch, and that the drawbridge was occasionally left down all night, for the purpose of admitting in the morning the labourers who were still employed about it, conveyed the intelligence to their chief, who resolved to make himself master of the place the following night. Accordingly, two spies were despatched, to ascertain the probability of success.

Towards evening a column of smoke was seen rising from a neighbouring hill—it was the signal agreed upon if the party were to advance. Wallace instantly set his men in motion, and about midnight arrived in front of the place which was the object of attack. As they expected, the drawbridge was down, but they found the door strongly secured within. Impatient at the delay this occasioned, our hero raised a heavy piece of timber, and rushing with it against the door, the fastenings gave way with a violence that loosened the stones, not yet properly cemented, and nearly a yard of the wall came tumbling to the ground. The porter, awakened by the noise, attempted to strike him with a ponderous mace. Wallace avoided the blow, and before he could recover his unwieldy weapon, laid him lifeless at his feet.

Thornton, the captain of the garrison, now appeared with the men under his command; but the Scots had got too firm footing within the fort to be easily expelled. After a sanguinary conflict, in which the captain fell by the hand of Wallace, the garrison was put to the sword, with the exception of the women and children, who received from the victors as much courtesy as the rudeness of the age entitled them to expect. The wife and three children of Thornton, after being supplied with what necessaries they required, were allowed to depart along with the other women, and furnished with a pass from Wallace by which they could proceed in safety to any of the towns in the possession of the English. The Scots found in the peel of Gargunnoch abundance of all kinds of necessaries, with a large sum of money, which Wallace divided equally among his followers; and, after distributing what part of the stores they did not require among his oppressed countrymen in the neighbourhood, he demolished the fortification, and proceeded with his companions on their crusade against the enemies of their independence.

A ROMANTIC MARRIAGE.

Shortly before engaging in this contest with the English, Wallace, according to some chroniclers, had fallen in love. Going to the kirk of Lanark one day, he had seen Marion Bradfute, the orphan daughter of Sir Hugh Bradfute of Lamington. Her father, mother, and brother being dead, the orphan girl led a retired life at Lanark, purchasing protection from insult by paying a sum of money to Haizing, the English governor, who, it is said, intended, with an eye to her estate, to make a match between her and his son. She was at this time eighteen years of age, and an ancient minstrel gives this interesting account of her:—

"All suffered she, and right lowly her bare,
Amiable, so benign, and wise,
Courteous and sweet, full-filled of gentleness,
Well ruled of tongue."

For a while Wallace struggled between love and duty—between Marion Bradfute and his native country. However, he managed at last to reconcile the two by marrying the gentle Marion. The marriage had a tragic end, for it appears that the heiress of Lamington was, early in her husband's career, slain by the English, under what circumstances does not very clearly appear. According to some it was into her house that Wallace escaped when in danger of his life in the streets of Lanark, as we have already related; but as to this nothing certain is known, and so nothing certain can be told.

SURPRISING THE ENGLISH AT SCONE.

The consequences of many partial advantages gained by Wallace over the English was soon seen. At first few had dared to unite themselves with so desperate a band as his. But confidence came with success, and numbers flocked to the standard of revolt. The continued oppressions of the English, the desire of revenge, and even the romantic and perilous nature of the undertaking, recruited the ranks of Wallace, and he was soon at the head of a great body of Scottish malcontents.

When it was known that he had raised open banner against the English, Sir William Douglas, who had been taken by Edward at the siege of Berwick, and restored to liberty upon swearing fealty, disregarded his oath, and joined the Scottish force with his numerous vassals.

Omesby, the English justiciary, was, at this time, holding his court at Scone; and Surrey, the guardian, had gone to attend the English Parliament. Wallace, by a rapid march, surprised the justiciary, dispersed his followers, and whilst he himself escaped with the greatest difficulty, took a rich booty and many prisoners.

This exploit gave new confidence to their little army; they more openly and boldly ravaged the country, and put all Englishmen to the sword. As circumstances allowed, they either acted together or engaged in separate expeditions. Whilst Wallace marched into Lanark, the castles of Disdeir and Saugular were taken by Douglas, and when their united strength afterwards broke in upon the west of Scotland, they were joined by some of the most powerful of the Scottish nobility.

Their united forces, led by the military skill and animated by the personal intrepidity of Wallace, continued to be successful in repeated attacks upon the English. These successes were frequently followed by many circumstances of cruelty and violence,—a fact to be regretted, though it may well excite little surprise.

The revenge of the Scots seems chiefly to have been directed against the English ecclesiastics who were possessed of Scottish livings. A public edict, passed by the Scottish estates in 1296, had banished these intruders from Scotland; and this edict Wallace, it is said, improved upon with a refinement in cruelty. Some aged priests, and, it is even asserted, although almost too horrible to believe, some defenceless women, had their hands tied behind their backs, and in this helpless state were thrown from high bridges into rivers, their dying agonies affording sport to their merciless captors.

THE BATTLE OF STIRLING BRIDGE.

Those responsible for the tranquillity of Scotland saw in these events an ugly tendency to turbulence, which must be extinguished at the beginning. Surrey gave instructions to his nephew Percy to proceed to the north to stamp out the disturbances. At Irvine Percy came upon Bruce, afterwards the famous Scottish hero, and a cluster of other barons, who all seem to have been undecided whether to cast in their lot with Wallace or submit to the English King. They chose the latter course, and surrendered on terms.

We have no reason for supposing that Wallace was present on this occasion. His name is not mentioned by the English chronicler, whose account of the affair is the most minute and the source of all others. Wallace indeed seems at this time to have been in the north, laying his plans for resisting the English army at the Forth, or the Scots Water, as it was then called. He organised a large force in the Lowland counties northward of the Tay, drawing large accessions from Aberdeenshire. He then laid siege to the castle of Dundee.

The siege was barely begun when news arrived that the English, under the command of the Earl of Surrey, and Cressingham the treasurer, were advancing on Stirling Bridge.

Wallace at once resolved to encounter them there. He left the siege of Dundee Castle to be continued by the citizens of the town; and marched with great expedition to the banks of the Forth. By good fortune his arrival in the neighbourhood of Stirling was before that of the enemy.

Nothing could have been better chosen than the ground taken up by Wallace. "It is marked by the tall tower of the Abbey of Cambuskenneth on the flat carse lands below Stirling, through which the river Forth winds itself. Close behind him was the Abbey Craig, an abrupt trap rock, yet not in all places so abrupt but that pathways might be found on the top, which those first in possession could use, and then so fortify as to defy any others to follow them. From the back of the Craig a neck of broken ground led immediately to the near mountain range called the Ochil Hills; so much for the means of retreat. For receiving an enemy the ground was still more happily selected. It was within one of the loops of the Forth, which swept almost all round it in a circle. In all ages of warfare the advantages of such a position are notorious—it makes the commander inside the loop master of the situation."

The English force arrived on the southern bank. In number they had the advantage: all told there were fifty thousand foot soldiers and one thousand horse, amply sufficient, their commander thought, for all possible needs. Indeed, they would have availed themselves of a reinforcement of over eight thousand men under Lord Henry Percy, had not the cost of its maintenance appeared likely far to exceed the value of its services.

The steward of Scotland, the Earl of Lennox, and others of the Scottish barons were at this time with the English army. They now requested Surrey to delay an attack till they had attempted to bring Wallace to terms. They soon returned, and declared that they had failed in their hopes of pacification, but that they themselves would join the English force with sixty armed horse.

It was now evening, and the Scottish barons, in leaving the army, met a troop of English soldiers returning from forage. Whether from accident or design, a skirmish took place between these two bodies, and the Earl of Lennox stabbed an English soldier in the throat. This, of course, raised a tumult in the camp; a cry arose that they were betrayed by the Scots; and there seems to be little doubt that Lennox and his friends were secretly negotiating with Wallace, and only waited for a favourable opportunity of joining him. Crying out for vengeance, the English soldiers carried their wounded comrade before their general, and reproached him with having trusted those who had broken their faith, and would betray them to the enemy. "Stay this one night," said he, "and if to-morrow they do not keep their promise, you shall have ample revenge." He commanded his soldiers to be ready to pass the bridge next day, and then, with a carelessness little worthy of an experienced commander, who had the fate of a great army dependent on his activity and foresight, he permitted Wallace to tamper with his countrymen in the English service; to become acquainted with the numbers and array of the English force; and to adopt, at his leisure, his own measures for their discomfiture.

Early next day—indeed before Warren had left his bed—five thousand foot and a body of Welsh archers had passed the bridge. These troops, however, on finding that they were not supported by the rest of the army, soon returned to their original station. Warren, who rose about an hour after, feeling, perhaps, reluctant to attack the Scots in their present position, despatched two friars to make a last attempt at pacification.

The answer returned was evidently intended to exaggerate the English, and bring them on headlong to the fray. After a bold declaration of independence, a taunting allusion was made to the conquerors of England. "We came not here," said the intrepid assertor of Scotland's rights, "to negotiate, but to fight; and were even your masters to come and attack us, we are ready to meet them at our sword's point, and show them that our country is free."

Incensed at this cool defiance, the English presumptuously and eagerly demanded to be led on; upon which Sir Richard Lundin, a Scottish knight who had gone over to the enemy at Irving, anxiously implored them to be still.

"If," said he, "you once attempt to pass the bridge, you are desperately throwing away your lives. The men can only cross two by two. Our enemies command one flank, and in an instant will be upon us. I know a ford not far from hence where you may pass by sixty at a time. Give me but five hundred horse, and a small body of foot, I shall turn the enemy's flank, whilst you, lord earl, and the rest of the army, may pass over in security."

This was the sound advice of a veteran soldier who knew the country; but although it convinced some it only irritated others, and among the last Hugh Cressingham the treasurer. "Why, my lord," cried he to Surrey, who was prudently hesitating, "why do you protract the war, and spend the King's money? Let us pass on as becomes us, and do our duty."

Stung by this reproach, Surrey weakly submitted his better judgment to the rashness of the churchman, and commanded the army to defile over the bridge. Sir Marmaduke Twenge, a knight of great experience and courage, along with Cressingham himself, led the van; and when nearly half of the army had passed the bridge, perceiving that the Scots kept their strong ground on the heights, Twenge, with chivalrous impetuosity, gave orders for a charge, and made the heavy-armed cavalry spur their horses up the hill.

The consequence of this precipitate movement was fatal to the English. A part of the Scottish army had by this time made a circuit and possessed themselves of the foot of the bridge, and Wallace, the moment that he saw the communication between the van and the rear of the English force thus cut off, rushed rapidly down from the high ground, and attacking Twenge and Cressingham, before they had time to form, threw them into inextricable confusion. In an instant all was tumult and disorder. Many were slain, multitudes of the heavy-armed horse plunged into the river and were drowned in making a vain effort to rejoin Surrey, who kept on the other side, a spectator of the discomfiture of the flower of his army. In the meantime, the standard-bearers of the King and of the Earl, with another part of the army, passed over, and shared the fate of their companions, being instantly cut in pieces.

A spirited scene now took place. Sir Marmaduke Twenge, on looking round, saw that the Scots had seized the bridge. A knight advised in this perilous crisis that they should throw themselves into the river, and swim their horses to the opposite bank. "What," cried Twenge, "volunteer to drown myself when I can cut my way through the midst of them back to the bridge! Never let such foul slander fall on us!" So saying he put spurs to his horse, and driving him into the midst of the enemy, hewed a passage for himself through the thickest of the Scottish columns and rejoined his friends, with his nephew and his armour-bearer, in perfect safety.

Meanwhile the Scots committed a dreadful slaughter. Multitudes perished in the river, and as the confusion and slaughter increased, and the entire defeat of the English became inevitable, the Earl of Lennox and the Steward of Scotland, who, although allies of the King of England, were secretly in treaty with Wallace, threw off the mask, and led a body of their followers to destroy and plunder the flying English. Surrey, on being joined by Sir Marmaduke Twenge, remained no longer on the field; but having hastily ordered him to occupy the castle of Stirling, which he promised to relieve in ten days, he rode, without drawing bridle, to Berwick: a clear proof of the total defeat of the powerful army which he had led into Scotland. From Berwick he proceeded to join the Prince of Wales in the south, and left the country which had been entrusted to him exposed to ravage and desolation. Although the English historians restrict the loss of soldiers in this fatal and important battle to five thousand foot and a hundred heavy-armed horse, it is probable that nearly one-half of the English army was cut to pieces, and Cressingham the treasurer was amongst the first who fell. Hemingford allows that the plunder which fell into the hands of the Scots was very great, and that waggons were filled with the spoils. Smarting under the cruelty and rapacity with which they had been treated by the English, the Scots were not slow now to take their revenge, nor was Wallace of a temper to restrain his soldiers. Few prisoners seem to have fallen into their hands, and the slaughter was general and indiscriminate. So deep was the detestation in which the character of Cressingham was regarded, that his dead body was mangled, the skin torn from the limbs, and in savage triumph cut into pieces, and afterwards tanned and converted into sword-belts.

The decisive nature of the defeat is, perhaps, most apparent from the important consequences which attended it. To use the words of Knighton, "this awful beginning of hostilities roused the spirit of Scotland, and sunk the hearts of the English." Dundee immediately surrendered to Wallace, and rewarded his army by a rich booty of arms and money. In a short time not a fortress or castle in Scotland remained in the hands of Edward. The castles of Edinburgh and Roxburgh were dismantled; and Berwick, upon the advance of the Scottish army having been hastily abandoned, Wallace sent Henry de Haliburton, a Scottish knight, to occupy this important frontier town. Thus, by the efforts of a single man, not only unassisted, but actually thwarted and opposed by the nobility of the country, was the iron power of Edward completely broken, and Scotland once more able to lift her head among free nations.

AFTER THE BATTLE.

Later chroniclers inform us how Wallace, having now the country at his command, set to work and adjusted thoroughly effective systems for the official organisation of the executive, the administration of justice, and the transaction of local business by properly-constituted local boards. But at such a period the defence of the country would be the first consideration, and so we are told how he split up the country into military divisions, and appointed a muster-book of able-bodied men, between the ages of sixteen and sixty, to be kept in each shire, barony, lordship, town, and burgh. The persons, it has been shrewdly remarked, who mention these things lived at a time too late to have practical knowledge of them; and we all have experience of the fact that it has been an established historical etiquette to attribute such organisations to the hero of a country's idolatry when the fortune of war has given him the upper hand.

One little authentic vestige of his conduct after the battle, however, exists, and it shows him prompt to help the cause of peaceful progress. There lately was found in the old commercial city of Lubeck a short document which is of great interest. It is dated October 11th, 1297, and is a communication to the towns of Lubeck and Hamburg, in the names of Andrew de Moray and William Wallace, Generals of the Army of the Kingdom and Community of Scotland. They thank the worthy friends of their country in these towns for services and attentions which the unfortunate state of their country had hindered its people from duly acknowledging. They assure their distant trading friends, however, that commerce with the ports of Scotland will now be restored; for the kingdom of Scotland, thanks be to God, has been recovered by battle from the hands of the English. Scotland was fast becoming a prosperous trading nation before the commencement of her troubles, and this little document is a touching testimony to the prevalence of those peaceful pursuits which were so cruelly crushed by the remorseless invaders.

DAYS OF FAMINE.

A famine now fell upon Scotland, and bands of armed men, impelled either by hunger or hatred, crossed the Border, and played havoc in Cumberland and Westmoreland, over the old disputed district. "The English Chronicles—which are the only contemporary accounts of this affair—are confused," says Mr. John Hill Burton, "as all accounts of plundering and devastating inroads, whether by friend or foe, must needs be. Language and indignation are almost exhausted by the monkish chroniclers in describing the cruelties and brutalities of these rovers, and yet the accounts of their deeds want originality, for there had been a sort of terrible formula for describing the work of a Scots' invading army from the Battle of the Standard downwards. Of cruelty and rapacity there was no doubt a fearful amount, but it must be remembered that the suffering side had the telling of the story; and it was a policy with the English clergy, who were also the historians, to make out that the Scots were sacrilegious as well as cruel, and reserved their special tortures and indignities for holy men and women."

A SACRILEGIOUS ATTACK.

Wallace appears to have been, at least for a time, in command of the invading and plundering Scots. One incident of his command was long remembered. The winter had set in with great severity. The frost was so intense, and the scarcity of provisions so grievous, that many of the Scots perished by cold and famine, and Wallace commanded a retreat.

On returning to Hexham, where there was a rich monastery, which had already been plundered and deserted on the advance, a striking scene occurred. Three monks were seen in the solitary monastery. Thinking that the tide of war had passed over, they had crept back, to repair the ravages they had left, when suddenly they saw the army returning, and fled in terror into a little chapel. In a moment, the Scottish soldiers with their long lances were upon them, calling on them, on peril of their lives, to show them the treasures of their monastery. "Alas!" said one of the monks, "it is but a short time since you yourselves have seized our whole property, and you know best where it now is." At this moment Wallace himself came into the chapel, and, commanding his soldiers to be silent, requested one of the canons to celebrate mass. The monk obeyed, and Wallace, all armed as he was, and surrounded by his soldiers, reverently attended. When it came to the elevation of the host, he stepped out of the chapel to cast off his helmet and lay aside his arms, but in this short absence the fury and avarice of his soldiers broke out. They pressed on the priest, snatched the chalice from the altar, tore away its ornaments and the sacred vestments, and even stole the missal in which the service had been begun. When their master returned, he found the priest in horror and dismay, and gave orders that the sacrilegious wretches who had committed the outrage should be sought for and put to death. Meanwhile he took the canons under his protection. "Remain with me," said he; "it is that alone which can secure you. My soldiers are evil disposed. I cannot justify, and I dare not punish them." This sacrilegious attack was the more unpardonable, as the monastery of Hexham was dedicated to the patron saint of Scotland, and enjoyed a perpetual protection from King David. Wallace, to atone for the outrage, granted a charter of protection to the priory and convent, by which its lands, men, and movables, were admitted under the peace of the King, and all persons interdicted from doing them injury. The Scots now advanced to Newcastle, but finding the garrison prepared to stand a siege, they contented themselves with ravaging the adjacent country; and having collected the booty, they allotted their part to the Galwegians who were with the army, and marched homewards. It had been a prosperous raid, and was long remembered, but with very different feelings, both by the spoilers and by those they spoiled.

IN SCOTLAND AGAIN.

Soon after his return from his expedition into England, Wallace, in an assembly held at the Forest Kirk in Selkirkshire, which was attended by the Earl of Lennox, William Douglas, and others of the principal nobility, was elected Governor of Scotland, in the name of King John, and with the consent of the community of Scotland.

Strengthened by the high title which he so well deserved, and which the common people believed was ratified by the express approval of St. Andrew, he proceeded to reward his friends and fellow-soldiers, and to punish his enemies, and, despising the jealousy and desertion of a great majority of the nobility, he sought to enforce those public measures which he considered necessary for securing the liberty of the country. By a strict severity he restrained the licentiousness of his soldiers, and endeavoured to introduce discipline into his army.

In a short time, such were the effects of his firm and courageous dealing in the government, that the most powerful of the nobility were compelled by the fear of imprisonment to submit to his authority, although they envied him his high elevation, and whenever an opportunity presented itself, took part with the King of England. But although few of the barons had joined him, the lesser barons and gentry repaired in great numbers to the banner of the Governor, and willingly supported him with all their forces.

There is just one writ by the Guardian extant—it appoints Alexander of Scrinischir, or Scringeur, to be constable of the castle of Dundee, and invests him with certain lands on the hill above the town in reward for his fidelity in bearing the royal banner of Scotland. "The constabulary and the estate were held for centuries by St. Ingemar, who distinguished themselves by honourable service; and a special lustre was always conceded by the popular voice to that race which held a hereditary title conferred by Wallace."

AN ENGLISH INVASION.

Though the enemy had been swept out of the country, they were now, however, about to return, and Scotland was to be plunged once more in all the troubles of warfare. Immediately on the return of King Edward from Flanders, where he had been, to England, he demanded from his Parliament a grant for the punishment of Scotland. Having got what he could, and while his troops were gathering, he took the opportunity of making a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. John of Beverley, "a kind of incidental aid which he always sought for his projects when it did not interfere with the preparations for effecting them by the arm of the flesh."

He entered Scotland with an army which, if it even approached the description of the chroniclers, was magnificent and overwhelming. There were at first seven thousand mounted men-at-arms, three thousand of them in coats of mail; and they were afterwards joined by five hundred from Gascony. After this the number of footmen was of little moment. Eighty thousand is spoken of as the number.

The plan adopted by Wallace for the defence of Scotland was the same as that so successfully employed at a later date by Bruce. It was to avoid a general battle, which, with an army far inferior to the English, must have been fought at a disadvantage; to fall back slowly before the enemy, leaving some garrisons in the most important castles, driving off all supplies, wasting the country through which the English were to march, and waiting till the scarcity of provisions compelled them to retreat, and gave him a favourable opportunity of breaking down upon them with full effect.

Edward had determined to penetrate into the west of Scotland, and there he purposed to conclude the war. He directed a fleet with supplies for his army to sail round from Berwick to the Firth of Forth; and he then proceeded by moderate marches into Scotland, laying waste the country, and anxious for a sight of his enemies. No one, however, was to be found who could give him information respecting the Scottish army; and he proceeded through Berwickshire to Lauder, and without a check to what is now Kirkcaldy, a small town between Edinburgh and Linlithgow.

Here, as provisions began to grow scarce, he determined to remain in order to receive the earliest intelligence of his fleet, and, in case of accidents, to secure his retreat. At this time he learned that frequent attacks were made against the foraging parties of his rear division, by the Scottish garrison in the strong castle of Dirlton, and that two other fortresses which he had passed on his march were likely to give him annoyance. Upon this he despatched his favourite marshal, Bishop Anthony Beck, who sat down before the castle; but on account of the want of proper battering machines, found it too strong for him. He then attempted to carry it by assault, but was driven back with loss. His division began to be in extreme want, so the bishop sent Sir John Marmaduke to require the King's pleasure.

"Go back," said Edward, "and tell Anthony that he is right to be pacific when he is acting the bishop, but that in his present business he must forget his calling. As for you," continued the King, addressing Marmaduke, "you are a relentless soldier, and I have often had to reprove you for too cruel an exultation over the death of your enemies; but return now whence you came, and be as relentless as you choose. You will have my thanks, not my censure; and look you, do not see my face again till these three castles are razed to the ground."

In the meantime the besiegers were relieved from the extremities of want by the arrival of three ships with provisions; and the bishop, on receiving the King's message, took advantage of the renewed strength and spirit of his soldiers to order an assault, which was successful. The garrison stipulated, before surrender, that their lives should be spared.

Edward, when at Kirkliston, had raised some of the young squires in the army to the rank of knighthood; and these new knights were sent to gain their spurs by taking the other two fortalices. On coming before them, however, they found that the Scots had abandoned them to the enemy; and having destroyed them, they rejoined the main army.

THE BATTLE OF FALKIRK.

These transactions occupied a month, and the army began again to suffer from the scarcity of provisions. The fleet from Berwick was anxiously looked for, and Edward foresaw that in the event of its arrival being protracted a few days longer, he should be compelled to retreat. At last a few ships were seen off the coast, which brought a small supply; but the great body of the fleet was still detained by contrary winds, and a dangerous mutiny broke out in the camp. The Welsh troops had suffered much from famine; and a present of wine having been sent to them by the King, their soldiers, in a paroxysm of intoxication and national antipathy, attacked the English quarters in the night, and inhumanly murdered eighteen priests. Upon this the English cavalry hastily ran to their weapons, and breaking in upon the Welsh, slew eighty men. In the morning the Welsh, of whom there were forty thousand in the army, exasperated at the death of their companions, threatened to join the Scots. "Let them do so," said Edward, with his usual cool courage; "let them go over to my enemies: I hope soon to see the day when I shall chastise them both." This day, however, was, to all appearance, distant. The distress for provisions now amounted to an absolute famine. No intelligence had been received of the Scottish army.

As the English advanced, the country had been wasted by an invisible foe; and Edward, wearied out, was at length compelled to issue orders for a retreat to Edinburgh, hoping to meet with his fleet at Leith, and thereafter to recommence operations against the enemy.

At this critical juncture, when the military skill and wisdom of the dispositions made by Wallace became apparent, and when the moment to harass and destroy the invading army in its retreat had arrived, the treachery of her nobles again betrayed Scotland. Two Scottish lords, Patrick, Earl of Dunbar, and the Earl of Angus, privately, at daybreak, sought the quarters of the Bishop of Durham, and informed him that the Scots were encamped not far off in the forest of Falkirk. The Scottish earls, who dreaded the resentment of Edward, on account of their late renunciation of allegiance, did not venture to seek the King in person. They sent their intelligence by a page, and added, that having heard of his projected retreat, it was the intention of Wallace to surprise him by a night attack, and to hang upon and harass his rear. Edward, on hearing this welcome news, could not conceal his joy. "Thanks be to God," he exclaimed, "who hitherto hath extricated me from every danger! They shall not need to follow me, since I shall forthwith go and meet them." Without a moment's delay, orders were issued for the soldiers to arm, and hold themselves ready to march. The King was the first to put on his armour; and, mounting his horse, rode through the camp, hastening the preparations, and giving orders in person to the merchants and sutlers who attended the army to pack up their wares, and be ready to follow him.

At last all was ready, and at three o'clock the whole army was on its advance from Kirkliston to Falkirk. It was late before they reached a heath near Linlithgow, on which they encamped for the night. They were not allowed the refreshment of disarming themselves, but, to use the striking words of Hemmingford, "each soldier slept on the ground, using his shield for his pillow: each horseman had his horse beside him, and the horses themselves tasted nothing but cold iron, champing their bridles."

Towards morning orders were given to march. They passed through Linlithgow a little before sunrise, and on looking up at a rising ground, at some distance in their front, observed the ridge of the hill lined with lances. Soon they were in the presence of their Scottish foes.

The Scottish army did not amount to the third part of the force of the English, and Wallace, who dreaded this great disparity, and knew how much,

Edward was likely to suffer by the prolongation of the war and the want of provisions, at first thought of a retreat, and hastened to lead off his soldiers; but he soon found that the English were too near to admit of this being done without certain destruction. He therefore proceeded to draw up his army, so as best to avail himself of the nature of the ground, and to sustain the attacks of the English. He divided his infantry into four compact divisions composed of his lancers. In the first line the men knelt, with their lances turned obliquely outwards, so as to present a serried front to the enemy on every side. In this infantry consisted the chief strength of the Scottish army, for the soldiers stood so close, and were so linked or chained together, that to break the line was extremely difficult. In the spaces between these divisions were placed the archers, and in the rear was drawn up the Scottish cavalry, consisting of about a thousand heavy-armed horse.

After hearing mass, the King of England, being informed of the Scottish disposition of battle, hesitated to lead his army forward to the attack, and proposed that they should pitch their tents, and allow the soldiers and the horses time for rest and refreshment. This was opposed by his officers as unsafe, on account of there being nothing but a small rivulet between the two armies. An immediate advance was therefore ordered; the barons who commanded the first division, the Marshal of England and the Earls of Hereford and Lincoln, leading their soldiers in a direct line against the enemy. They were not aware, however, of an extensive morass which lay along the front of the Scottish position, and on reaching it were obliged to make a circuit to the west, which retarded their attack. Meanwhile, the second line, under the command of the Bishop of Durham, being better informed of the nature of the ground, in advancing inclined to the east, to avoid the morass. The bishop's cavalry was fiery and impetuous. Thirty-six banners floated above the mass of spears, and showed how many leaders of distinction were in the field; but Anthony Beck, who had seen enough of war to know the danger of too precipitate an attack, commanded them to hold back, till the third line under the King came up to support them.

"Stick to thy mass, bishop," cried Ralph Basset of Drayton, "and teach not us what we ought to do in the face of an enemy."

"On, then," replied the bishop: "let on in your own way. We are all soldiers to-day, and bound to do our duty."

So saying, they hastened forward, and in a few minutes engaged with the first column of the Scots, whilst the first line, which had extricated itself from the morass, commenced its attack upon the other flank.

Wallace's anxiety to avoid a battle had in all probability arisen from his having little dependence on the fidelity of the heavy-armed cavalry, commanded by those nobles who hated and feared him. The event showed how just were his suspicions, for the moment the lines met, the whole body of the Scottish horse shamelessly retired without striking a blow.

The columns of infantry, however, with the intermediate companies of archers, kept their ground, and a few of the armed knights remained beside him. The archers soon gave way, but the columns of the Scottish infantry stood firm.

Edward now brought up his reserves of archers and slingers, who showered their arrows upon them, with volleys of large round stones, which covered the ground where they were stationed. This continued and galling attack, along with the reiterated charges of the cavalry, at last broke the first lines, and the heavy-armed horse pouring in at the gap which was thus made, threw all into confusion, and carried indiscriminate slaughter through their ranks.

Wallace, with the remains of his army, having gained the neighbouring wood, made good his retreat, leaving nearly fifteen thousand men dead on the field.

WALLACE IN FRANCE.

"From this time," says the shrewd but somewhat sceptical historian, Mr. John Hill Burton, "we hear no more of Wallace concerning himself in active life in Scotland. Much has been said of the cabals and aristocratic jealousies which drove him from the office of Guardian; but in reality the whole affair is a secret to the present day.

"The romancers after this time send Wallace to France, where he comes out as the true knight-errant in feats with lions, robbers, and pirates. Here, again, some vestiges of evidence lately found tend to confirm the material fact that he sojourned in France. In a mere list of documents found in his possession when he was carried captive to London, was a letter of safe-conduct to him from King Philip of France. While he was in power, indeed, Wallace kept a sort of ambassador in France in William Lamberton, Bishop of St. Andrew's. Lamberton was in fact his own bishop. When the See became vacant, William Comyn was the candidate favoured by King Edward, and as this rendered it necessary that the national party should have another person, Lamberton was made bishop.

"That Wallace should have had a safe-conduct to France is not sufficient to inform us that he went there and used it, but the probability that he did so is much strengthened by finding that he got credentials from France onwards.

"A very minute scrap among documents in the Tower of London, without date, was found to be a letter by Philip, King of France, to his representatives at the court of Rome, recommending to them his good friend, William le Walois of Scotland, knight, and desiring them to do what in them lay to expedite the business he had to transact at the court of Rome."

RETURNED TO SCOTLAND.

On the night of Wallace's return from France to Scotland we are told that he landed near one of his old places of resort, accompanied by Sir Thomas de Longueville, John Blair, Thomas Gray, and a few other friends who had attended him abroad. He wished to gain some knowledge of the state of the country, to enable him to regulate his further proceedings, and for this purpose he raised his bugle to his lips, and before the reverberations had died away among the woodlands, a rustling was heard among the underwood, and presently an unarmed Scot stood before him. From this ready adherent, who had been watching the landing of the party, Wallace learned the situation of the kingdom, the slaughters committed by Edward, the submission of the regency, and the terror that pervaded the nobility.

Finding from the number of the English that were in the neighbourhood, the necessity of betaking himself to some place of concealment, he and his party were conducted by their informer to a farmhouse in a secluded part of the country, occupied by a relation of Wallace, of the name of Crawford. Here he was joyfully received, and a hiding-place artfully constructed in the barn for him and his companions, where they lurked during a search made for them by Sir John Butler, who commanded a body of troops which had been instructed to search for Wallace.

In this retreat they might have remained till some favourable occurrence had enabled them to appear more openly, but it seems the unusual quantity of provisions which Crawford was obliged to purchase for the maintenance of his guests awakened the suspicions of the English at Dundee, and on his return, having mentioned the examination to which he had been subjected, Wallace and his party thought it prudent to retire to a neighbouring thicket, and wait the result. They had not long adopted this precaution before a body of the English made their appearance, and having surrounded the dwelling of Crawford, they discovered, in the course of search, the lair of the fugitives.

The wife of Crawford having refused to answer their inquiries regarding the route of her visitors, they were proceeding by violent measures to compel her to disclose the place of their retreat, when Wallace, ascertaining the danger to which she was exposed, advanced from the thicket, and sounded a bold defiance to the enemy. The situation he had chosen was such as could only be assailed by three narrow and rugged paths; these he proposed to guard by dividing his little party, which consisted only of about twenty men, into three divisions. With the smallest of these he undertook to defend the path that was most exposed to the enemies' attacks.

Butler was not long in commencing the assault, which he did by a simultaneous movement on all those little bodies of Scots. The resistance, however, which he met with, aided by the rugged nature of the ascent, rendered all the ardour of his troops unavailing. As the evening advanced he called them off, and having beat a retreat he attempted to persuade Wallace to surrender, by representing the folly of continuing a resistance which must at last terminate in the ruin of himself and his friends. Our hero replied, by advising him to stand to his arms; for in place of surrendering, he intended, before morning, to become the assailant. Irritated by this coolness, Butler determined to take every precaution to prevent his escape, and for this purpose kept his men under arms all night.

Wallace, however, was as good as his word, for at daybreak, under cover of a thick mist, he descended at the head of a little band, and before the enemy was aware of his approach, broke into that quarter where Butler had his station. The surprise occasioned by his sudden appearance threw the English into confusion, while their uncertainty as to the number of their assailants greatly increased; and availing himself of the disorder into which they were thrown, Wallace pressed forward, and came in contact with Butler, who after a slight resistance fell beneath his arm.

The Scots having forced their way through the enemy, Wallace now discovered that their faithful host, Crawford, had been left behind. Returning, therefore, to the charge, he was fortunately in time to save him from the spear of an English soldier, whom he slew; and grasping his wounded friend in one of his arms, he carried him off in triumph to his companions. Favoured by the denseness of the fog, the gallant little band was soon lost to their pursuers.

Though thus relieved from their perilous situation, they are said to have suffered the greatest privations in the wild and unfrequented solitudes to which they were now obliged to retire. However, their indefatigable chief, always fertile in expedients, found means to preserve them from actual starvation, till Edward withdrew his troops for the purpose of resuming his march of subjugation throughout the kingdom.

THE CAPTURE OF WALLACE.

The only man in Scotland who had steadily refused submission to the English was Wallace, and the King, with that inveterate enmity and unshaken perseverance which marked his conduct to his foes, now used every possible means to hunt him down and become master of his person. He had already set a large sum upon his head; he gave strict orders to his captains and governors in Scotland to be constantly on the alert, and he now carefully sought out those Scotchmen who were enemies to Wallace, and bribed them to discover and betray him.

For this purpose he commanded Sir John de Mowbray, a Scottish knight then at his court, and who seems at this time to have risen into great favour with Edward, to carry with him into Scotland Ralph de Haliburton, one of the prisoners lately taken at Stirling. Haliburton was ordered to co-operate with the other Scottish men who were then engaged on the attempt to seize Wallace, and Mowbray was to watch how this brave person conducted himself.

What were the particular measures adopted by Haliburton, or with whom he co-operated, it is now impossible to say; but it is certain that, soon after this, Wallace was betrayed and taken by Sir John Menteith, a Scottish baron of high rank. Perhaps we should trace this infamous transaction to a family feud. At the battle of Falkirk, Wallace, who on account of his overbearing conduct had never been popular with the Scottish nobility, opposed the pretensions of Sir John Stewart of Bonkill, when this baron contended for the chief command. In that disastrous defeat, Sir John Stewart, with the flower of his followers, was surrounded and slain; and it is said that Sir John Menteith, his uncle, never forgave Wallace for making good his own retreat without attempting a rescue. By whatever motive he was actuated, Menteith succeeded in discovering his retreat, through the treacherous information of a servant who waited on him; and having invaded the house by night, seized him in bed, and instantly delivered him to Edward.

The generally received account of the capture of Wallace is as follows, and, in the main, no doubt, it is to be relied on as a narrative of facts:—On the night of the 5th August, 1305, Sir William Wallace and a faithful friend of the name of Kerlé, accompanied by a youthful attendant, had betaken themselves to their lonely retreat at Robroyston, to which place their steps had been watched by a spy who, as soon as he had observed them enter, returned to his employers.

At the dead hour of midnight, while the two friends lay fast asleep, the youth, whose turn it was to watch, cautiously removed the bugle from the neck of Wallace, and conveyed it, along with his arms, through an aperture in the wall; then slowly opening the door, two men-at-arms silently entered, and seizing upon Kerlé, hurried him from the apartment, and instantly put him to death. Wallace, awakened by the noise, started to his feet, and, missing his weapons, became sensible of his danger, but grasping a large piece of oak, which had been used for a seat, he struck two of his assailants dead on the spot, and drove the rest headlong before him.

Seeing the fury to which he was roused, and the difficulty they would have in taking him alive, Menteith now advanced to the aperture, and represented to him the folly of resistance, as the English, he said, having heard of his place of resort, and of the plans he had in contemplation, were collected in too large a force to be withstood; that if he would accompany him a prisoner to Dunbarton, he would undertake for the safety of his person; that all the English wished was to secure the peace of the country and to be free from his molestation.—adding, that if he consented to go with him, he should live in his own house in the castle, and he, Menteith, alone should be his keeper; that, even now, he would willingly sacrifice his life in his defence, but that his attendants were too few and too ill-appointed to have any chance of success in contending with the English. He concluded by assuring Wallace that he had followed in order to use his influence with his enemies in his behalf, and that they had listened to him on condition of an immediate surrender; but that if he did not instantly comply, the house would soon be in flames about him. These, and other arguments, were urged with all the seeming sincerity of friendship; and our patriot, confiding in early recollections, and the private understanding that subsisted between them, allowed himself to be conducted to Dunbarton Castle.

On the morrow, however, no Menteith appeared to assert his influence, in order to prevent the unfortunate hero from being carried from the fortress; and strongly fettered, and guarded by a powerful escort, under the command of Robert de Clifford and Aymer de Vallance, he was hurried to the outh, by the line of road least exposed to the chance of a rescue.

LED INTO CAPTIVITY ; A CRUEL FATE.

The fate of Wallace, as was to be expected, was soon decided ; but the circumstances of refined cruelty and torment which attended his execution effect an indelible stain upon the character of Edward ; and, were they not stated by the English historians themselves, could scarcely be believed. Having been carried to London, he was brought with much pomp to Westminster Hall, and there arraigned of treason. A crown of laurel was placed in mockery on his head, because Wallace had been heard to boast that he deserved to wear a crown in that hall. Sir Peter Mallorie, the King's justice, then impeached him as a traitor to the King of England, as having burnt the villages and abbeys, stormed the castles, and slain and tortured the liege subjects of his master the King.

Wallace indignantly and truly repelled the charge of treason, as he had never sworn fealty to Edward ; but to the other articles of accusation he pleaded no defence ; they were notorious, and he was condemned to death.

The sentence was executed on the 23rd August. Discrowned and chained, he was now dragged at the tails of horses through the streets, to the foot of a high gallows, placed at the end of Smithfield. After being hanged he was cut down, yet breathing, and his entrails taken out and burned before his face. His head was next struck off, and his body divided into four quarters. The head was placed on a pole on London Bridge, his right arm above the bridge at Newcastle, his left arm was sent to Berwick, his right foot and limb to Perth, and his left quarter to Aberdeen.

"These," says an old English historian, "were the trophies of their favourite hero, which the Scots had now to contemplate, instead of the banners and gonfalon which they had once proudly followed." But he might have added, remarks a Scottish historian, that they were trophies more glorious than the richest banner that had ever been borne before him ; and if Wallace already had been, for his daring and romantic character, the idol of the people—if they had long regarded him as the only man who had asserted, throughout every change of circumstances, the independence of his country—now that the mutilated limbs of this martyr to liberty were brought amongst them, it may well be conceived how deep and inextinguishable were their feelings of pity and revenge. Tyranny is practically short-sighted ; and Edward, assuredly, could have adopted no more certain way of canonising the memory of his enemy, and increasing the unforgiving animosity of his countrymen.

THE FUTURE OF SCOTLAND : THE CAREER OF WALLACE.

The course of events which soon followed this cruel sentence demonstrates the truth of these remarks. For fifteen years Edward had been employed in the reduction of Scotland—Wallace was put to death—the rest of the nobility had sworn fealty—the fortresses of the land were in the hands of English governors, who acted under an English guardian—a Parliament was held at London, where the Scottish nation was represented by ten commissioners, and these persons, in concert with twenty English commissioners, organized an entirely new system of government for Scotland. The English King, indeed, affected to disclaim all violent or capricious innovations, and it was pretended that the new regulations which were introduced were dictated by the advice of the Scotch nobles, and with a respect to the ancient laws of the land ; but he took care that all that really marked an independent kingdom should be destroyed, and that whilst the name of authority was given to the Scottish commissioners who were to sit in Parliament, the reality of power belonged solely to himself. Scotland, therefore, might be said to be entirely reduced ; and Edward flattered himself that he was now in quiet to enjoy that sovereignty which had been purchased by a war of fifteen years, and at an incredible expense of blood and treasure. But how idle are the dreams of ambition ! In less than six months from the execution of Wallace, this new system of government was entirely overthrown, and Scotland was, to the joy of the whole country, once more free.

Summing up the career of Wallace, one writer truly remarks:—"Contradictory as are the accounts of the English and Scottish chroniclers, it is not difficult to discover the true character of Wallace. He was the true leader of a national insurrection against a foreign yoke. He shared in the cruel and violent habits of his time, and in this was more excusable than the great King whose ambition and tyranny he opposed. The cruelties inflicted in his invasion of England were undeniable, but he did what he could to mitigate them, and he should not be severely blamed if, under far greater provocation, he tolerated what the good King David, in his war of the Standard, was unable to prevent. His memory lives, and will ever live, in the hearts of his countrymen, who know that they owe to him, and to those who followed in the same course, that their history has not been as 'unhappy as the history of Ireland.'"

BLIND HARRY THE MINSTREL.

The chief authority for the Life of Wallace, as told by Scottish writers, is the poem of Henry the Minstrel—long known by the familiar name of Blind Harry. His work is so often mentioned in connection with our Scottish hero, that a few particulars regarding him will not be out of place.

Of the personal history of Blind Harry the memorials are indeed scanty. They are almost entirely comprised in the following passage from Dr. John Mair, who was born about the middle of the fifteenth century. "During my infancy," says Mair, "Henry, a man blind from his birth, composed a separate work on the exploits of Sir William Wallace; collecting such accounts as were then preserved by popular tradition, he exhibited them in popular rhyme, which he cultivated with success; but writings of this kind I only credit in part. The author was a person who, by the recitation of stories before men of the highest rank, earned his food and raiment, of which he was worthy."

"It is obvious," remarks Dr. Irving, in his "History of Scottish Poetry," "that Henry's unfortunate privation of sight excluded him from many of the advantages incident to his mode of life. A person blind from his birth is entirely deprived of one of the most copious sources of knowledge; and many of the images of poetry are drawn from the appearances and vicissitudes of external nature. Notwithstanding this great and manifest disadvantage, he produced a work which maintained an extensive and uninterrupted popularity during the course of several centuries; and if we consider it as the composition of a man blind from his infancy, we cannot but be disposed to class its author among the most remarkable individuals recorded in the history of literature.

"He has conducted a very long narrative with an uncommon degree of spirit and vivacity. His accounts of battles and adventures are not very unfrequently diversified with picturesque descriptions of the works of nature or art; but such is the vigour of his mind and the fervour of his patriotism, that he rarely suffers the reader's attention to languish. His poem exhibits little more than a perpetual succession of adventures, marked with blood and slaughter; but the incidents themselves are sufficiently varied, and he proceeds to every new encounter with fresh and unabated ardour."

The numerous impressions of "Blind Harry's" "Wallace" sufficiently attest the extent of its popularity. The earliest edition that has yet been traced was printed by Lekprevik, in 1570;<sup>1</sup> and another made its appearance in 1594. The most valuable edition that has yet appeared was published by Dr. Jamieson in 1820.

The following extract will give some idea of the style of versification:—

THE DEATH OF WALLACE.

On Wednesday the false Southron furth brocht
To martyr him, as they before had wrocht,<sup>1</sup>
Of men in arms led him a full great rout.
With a bauld sprite guid Wallace blent about:
A priest he asked, for God that died on tree.
King Edward then commanded his clergy,
And said: "I charge yon, upon loss of life,
Nane be so bauld yon tyrant for to shrive.
He has reigned long in contrar my highness."
A blyth bishop soon, present in that place;
Of Canterbury he then was righteous lord;
Again the king he made this richt record,
And said: "Myself shall hear his confession,
If I have might in contrar of thy crown.
An thou through force wilt stop me of this thing,
I vow to God, who is my righteous King,
That all England I shall her interdite,
And make it known thou art a heretic.
The sacrament of kirk I shall him give:
Synne take thy choice, to starve<sup>2</sup> or let him live.
It were mair weil, in worship of thy crown,
To keep sic ane in life in thy bandoun,
Than all the land and good that thou hast reived,
But cowardice thee ay fra honour dreived.
Thou has thy life rougin<sup>3</sup> in wrangous deed;
That shall be seen on thee or on thy seed."
The king gart<sup>4</sup> charge they should the bishop ta,
But said lords counseil to let him ga.
All Englishmen said that his desire was richt.
To Wallace then he rakit in their sight,
And sadly heard his confession till ane end:
Humbly to God his sprite he there commend.
Lowly him served with hearty devotion
Upon his knees and said ane orison.
A psalter-book Wallace had on him ever
Fra his childheid: fra it wald nocht disever;
Better he trowit in wyage<sup>5</sup> for to speed.
But then he was dispalyed of his weel.
This grace he asked at Lord Clifford, that knight,
To let him have his psalter-book in sight.
He gart a priest it open before him hald,
While they till him had done all that they wald.
Stedfast he read for ought they did him there;
Feil<sup>6</sup> Southrons said that Wallace felt na sair.
Guid devotion, see, was his beginning,
Continued therewith, and fair was his ending.
While speech and sprite at anis all can fare
To lasting bliss, we trow, for evermair.

AN HEIR TO A THRONE.
WE have now to trace the history of the struggles for independence in the annals of the great Scottish hero, Robert Bruce, and to follow the events of one of the most heroic world. We must presuppose in the reader a knowledge of the events immediately following the death of Alexander III.:—the death of the young princess Margaret on her way from Norway; the disputes regarding the succession; the reference to Edward of England; Edward's decision in favour of Baliol, who did homage immediately as the vassal of Edward; and the subsequent struggle in which Sir William Wallace played so prominent a part.

Amongst the ten competitors who claimed the throne on the death of the princess Margaret, there were but two whose pretensions rested on a solid basis. One of these was Baliol, the other was Robert Bruce, lord of Annandale, both being descended from daughters of David, Earl of Huntingdon, the brother of William the Lion. Baliol was the grandson of the elder daughter, and Bruce the son of the younger. The latter was thus nearer in relationship, but, according to modern notions, the former would be the right heir, as the descendant of an elder child. The decision of Edward was in favour of Baliol, as everyone knows; recognising him, however, only as a vassal-king.

After the disappearance of Baliol from the pages of history in 1304, and the execution of Wallace in 1305, a fiercer desire than ever seems to have possessed the Scots to shake themselves free from the oppression of their English foes; and Robert Bruce, the grandson of the lord of Annandale, who had opposed Baliol, and the subject of the present paper, now found his opportunity.

Young Bruce spent his early years at Turnberry Castle, in Ayrshire; and at the age of sixteen or thereabouts, on the death of his mother, the Countess of Carrick, he succeeded to the earldom of Carrick. Old Bruce, the grandfather, died in 1295; Bruce, the father, died in 1301; and young Bruce, Earl of Carrick, was thus the sole representative of the house.

ASSUMING THE CHARACTER OF PATRIOT.

Bruce was upwards of thirty years old before he assumed the character of patriot. His father had chiefly resided in England, with little inclination to put forward any claims to the Scottish throne; and, bred up with a desire to conciliate Edward's favour, he himself was inclined to remain a peaceful subject to England, and, on one occasion, took oaths of fealty to him. The heroism and fate of Wallace at last induced him to take a different view of things. His conduct for some years was characterised by great prudence, if not dissimulation. He became desirous of, attempting to free Scotland from English intrusion, provided it could be done with a good chance of success.

After Baliol was sent to France in 1304, a prospect seemed to open up for gaining the Scottish crown; and this, no doubt, contributed to fix Bruce's wavering resolutions. Yet there was a rival to his aspirations after kingly honours; this was a personage usually known as the Red Comyn, and against whom he had a grudge on account of Comyn having perfidiously made known to Edward that Bruce was wavering in his allegiance.

At the time of which we speak, Bruce was in London; and it is said that Edward, his tongue one day having been a little loosened by the wine-flask, dropped words which showed that Bruce was in imminent danger of his life. A friend at court, the Earl of Gloucester as it was said, sent him a symbolical warning,—a sum of money and a pair of spurs.

THE MURDER OF COMYN.

Bruce, taking the hint, resolved to quit London. The following morning, accompanied by two attendants, he was hurrying along the north road. There was snow on the ground; so, to baffle pursuit, he had the horses shod the reverse of the usual way, so that their traces appeared those of riders on their journey to town.

On the road they fell in—at least so says tradition—with a messenger going to court with dangerous papers from Comyn. Him they slew.

Bruce halted at Dumfries, where it happened that the English judges were sitting in assize. On them Comyn, being a freeholder in the neighbourhood, was in attendance; so the two rivals met face to face.

An interview was arranged in the church of the Minorites, or Grey Friars. In this sacred building they had a brief and angry conversation. Bruce spoke of the miserable prospect of Scotland, once a sovereign State, now nothing but a province of England, and showed how they two, powerful as they were, if they only worked in common, might restore the ancient kingdom. He then made this proposal:—

"Take my estates and help me to be King; or, if you prefer it, I shall take yours and support your claim."

Comyn objected, professing duty and loyalty to Edward.

Bruce then charged him with betraying certain important secrets of his.

"You lie!" answered Comyn; on which Bruce instantly stabbed him with his dagger; and hurrying from the sanctuary which he had defiled with blood, rushed into the street, and called, "To horse!" Two of his followers, Lindsay and Kilpatrick, seeing his agitation, asked what was amiss.

"I doubt," said Bruce as he leapt into the saddle, "that I have slain Comyn."

"Do you doubt it?" said Kilpatrick; "then I mak sikar"—I make secure: and entering the convent, he slew the wounded man outright. Comyn's uncle, who had come to his rescue, was slain beside him.

It is interesting to know that the crest of the Kilpatricks, or Kirkpatricks of Cloosburn, descendants of this impetuous follower of Bruce, is a hand with a dagger erect in pale dropping blood, and their motto is "I mak sikar."

IMPORTANT CONSEQUENCES.

The die was cast. There was no drawing back now, even though prudence might have suggested waiting for a more favourable opportunity. Acting on the spur of the moment, Bruce and his party attacked the place where the English judges were assembled. These, after the building had been set on fire, had the discretion to surrender. To make captives of them would be inconvenient, and they were driven across the border.

The murder of Comyn had been perpetrated by Bruce and his companions in the heat of passion, and was entirely unpremeditated; but its consequences were important and momentous. Bruce's former varying and uncertain line of policy, which had arisen out of the hope of preserving, by fidelity to Edward, his great estates, and of seeing his rival crushed by his opposition to England, was at once changed by the murder of which he had been guilty. His whole schemes upon the crown had been laid open to Edward. This was ruin of itself; but, in addition to this, he had, with his own hand, assassinated the first noble in the land, and in a place of tremendous sanctity. He had stained the high altar with blood, and had directed against himself, besides the resentment of the powerful friends and vassals of the murdered earl, all the terrors of religion, and the strongest prejudices of the people. He had no alternative left but either to become a fugitive and an outlaw, or to raise open banner against Edward, and, although the disclosure of his plan was premature, to proclaim his title to the crown. Having determined on this last, he repaired to Lochmaben, Castle, and despatched letters to his friends and adherents.

CORONATION AT SCONE.

Bruce's first step was bold and decisive. He determined immediately to be crowned at Scone, and for this purpose repaired from his castle of Lochmaben to Glasgow, where he was joined by some of the friends who supported his enterprise.

On the road from Lochmaben, a young knight, well armed and horsed, encountered his retinue, who, the moment Bruce approached, threw himself from his horse, and did homage to him as sovereign. He was immediately recognised as Sir James Douglas, the son of William the fourth Earl Douglas, and was affectionately welcomed. The father had fought with Wallace, and the son had already shown some indications of his future greatness. Douglas immediately joined the little band who rode with Bruce; and thus commenced a friendship which, after a series of as noble services as ever subject paid to sovereign, was not dissolved even by death: for it was to this tried follower that in after years his dying master committed his heart to be carried to Jerusalem.

From Glasgow Bruce rode to Scone, and there was solemnly crowned, on Friday the 27th of March. Edward had carried off the ancient regalia of the kingdom, and the famous stone chair in which, according to ancient custom, the Scottish kings were inaugurated. But the ready care of Wishart, Bishop of Glasgow, supplied from his own wardrobe the robes in which Robert appeared at his coronation: and a slight coronet of gold, probably borrowed by the Abbot of Scone from some of the saints or kings who adorned his abbey, was employed instead of the hereditary crown. A banner wrought with the arms of Baliol, was delivered by the Bishop of Glasgow to the new King, and Robert received beneath it the homage of the prelates and earls who attended the ceremony.

On the second day after the coronation, and before Bruce and his friends had left Scone, they were surprised by the sudden arrival of Isabella, Countess of Buchan, sister of the Earl of Fife, who immediately claimed the privilege of placing the King upon the throne. It was a right which had undoubtedly belonged to the Earls of Fife from the days of Malcolm Canmore; and as the Earl of Fife was at this time of the English party, the countess, a high-spirited woman, leaving her home, joined Bruce at Scone, bringing with her the war-horses of her husband.

To have refused Isabella's request might give to his enemies some colour for alleging that an essential part of the ancient solemnity had been omitted in his coronation. The King was, therefore, on the 20th of March, a second time installed in the regal chair by the hands of the countess, who afterwards suffered severely for her alleged presumption.

Bruce next made a progress through various parts of Scotland, strengthening his party by the accession of new partisans; seizing some of the castles and towns which were in the possession of the enemy; committing to prison the sheriffs and officers of Edward; and creating so great a panic that many of the English fled precipitately from the country. But his party was small; the Comyns possessed the greatest power in Scotland, and they and their followers opposed him, not only from motives of policy, but with the deepest feelings of feudal enmity and revenge; while many earls and barons who had suffered in the late wars, preferred the quiet of submission to the repeated hazards of insurrection and revolt.

EARLY MISFORTUNES.

In the early part of his career, Bruce was decidedly unfortunate; and his military talents, which afterwards conducted him through a course of unexampled victory, were nursed amid times of incessant hardship and defeat. Soon after the inauguration at Scone, he advanced towards Perth, in those days a walled and strongly-fortified town, where the Earl of Pembroke, the English regent, lay with a small army of soldiers.

Bruce, on arriving at Perth, and finding the earl comfortably housed within the walls, sent a challenge requesting him, in the chivalrous style of the age, to come out and try his fortune in the open field. Pembroke replied that the day was too far gone, but that he would fight with him next morning; upon which the King retired and encamped about a mile from Perth, in the wood of Methven.

Towards evening, whilst his soldiers were preparing their frugal supper, and many were dispersed in foraging parties, a cry was heard that the enemy was upon them. It was too true. Pembroke, with his whole force, which outnumbered the Scots by fifteen hundred men, broke in upon the camp. The surprise was so complete that it can only be accounted for by the belief that Bruce had implicitly relied on the promise of the earl.

The King and his friends armed themselves in haste, and made a short resistance. But no efforts of individual courage could restore order or long delay defeat. Bruce was nearly taken, and some of his best and bravest associates fell into the hands of the enemy.

WANDERING ABROAD.

Bruce and his friends now began to feel the miseries of outlaws. A high price was set on his head, and he was compelled to harbour in the hills, deprived of the common comforts of life. He and his followers presented a ragged and wretched appearance. Their shoes were worn off their feet by constant toil in a mountainous country; and hunting, in better days a joyful pastime, became a necessary occupation.

At length want and distress drove him and his little band into the low country; and at Aberdeen, his brother, Sir Nigel Bruce, met him, with his queen and other ladies determined to share the pains of war and banishment with their husbands and fathers.

Here, after enjoying a short season of repose, a report was brought of the near advance of the English. The King and his friends, accompanied by their faithful women, retreated into Breadalbane. And now, if already they had experienced distress, it was, we may believe, aggravated by the presence of those whose constitutions were little able to struggle against cold and hunger, and whose love, as it was of that sterling kind which was ready to share in every privation, only made the hearts of the men of the party more keenly alive to their sufferings.

An ancient author has given a striking account of their mode of life. The roots and berries of the woods, the venison caught in the chase, the fish which abounded in the mountain rivers, supplied them with food; the warm skins of deer and roe with bedding; and all laboured to promote their comfort, but none with such success as the brave and gallant Sir James Douglas. This young soldier, after the imprisonment and death of his father, had been educated at the polished Court of France; and whilst his indefatigable perseverance in the chase afforded them innumerable comforts, his sprightly temper and constant gaiety consoled the King and amused his forlorn companions.

They had now reached the head of the Tay, and deep distresses seemed gathering round them, for the season was fast approaching when it was impossible for women to exist in that remote and wild region, and they were on the borders of the Lord of Lorn's country, a determined enemy of Bruce, who had married the aunt of the murdered Comyn.

Lorn immediately collected a thousand men, and, with the barons of Argyle, beset the passes, hemmed in the King and attacked him in a narrow defile where Bruce and his small band of knights could not manage their horses. The Highlanders were on foot, and, armed with that dreadful weapon the Lochaber axe, did great execution. Sir James Douglas, with Gilbert de la Haye, were both wounded, and many of the horses severely cut and gashed; so that the King, fearing the total destruction of his little band, managed to get them together, and having placed himself in the rear between them and the men of Lorn, commenced his retreat, halting at intervals, and driving back the enemy when they pressed too hard upon them.

DANGERS AND DISTRESSES.

It was in one of these skirmishes that Bruce, who, in the use of his weapons, was esteemed inferior to no knight of his time, with his own hand killed three soldiers who attacked him at the same time and at a disadvantage,—a feat which is said to have extorted even from his enemies the praise of superior chivalry.

Having thus again escaped, a council was held, and it was resolved that the Queen and her ladies should be conducted to the strong castle of Kildrummie, in Mar, under an escort commanded by young Nigel Bruce, the King's brother, and John, Earl of Athol. The King, with only two hundred men, and beset on all sides by his enemies, was left to make his way through Lennox to Kintyre, a district which, from the influence of Sir Niel Campbell, who was then with him, he expected would be somewhat more friendly. He now gave up all his horses to those who were to escort the women, and having determined to pursue his way on foot, took a melancholy farewell of the Queen. It was the last time he ever saw his brother, who soon after was taken, and fell a victim to the implacable revenge of Edward.

Bruce, meanwhile, pressed on through Perthshire to Loch Lomond. On the banks of this lake his progress was suddenly arrested. To have travelled round it would have been accomplished at great risk, when every hour which could convey him beyond the pursuit of his enemies was precious. After some time they succeeded in discovering a little boat, which from its crazy and leaky state could but hold three persons, and that not without danger of sinking. In it the King, Sir James Douglas, and another, who rowed them, first passed over. They then despatched it in return for the rest; so that the whole band at length succeeded in reaching the other side.

Amid these complicated dangers and distresses, the spirit of their royal master wonderfully supported his followers. His memory was stored with the tales of romance so popular in that chivalrous age; and in recounting the sufferings of their fabled heroes, he is said to have diverted the minds of his friends from brooding too deeply on their own.

They now began to feel the miseries of hunger; and in traversing the woods in search of food, they encountered the Earl of Lennox, who, since the unfortunate defeat at Methven, had heard nothing of the fate of his sovereign. Lennox fell on his master's neck, and the King wept in embracing him. But even this natural burst of grief proved dangerous by occupying too much time; for the enemy were now pressing on their track, and everything depended on Bruce's gaining the coast where he expected to meet Sir Niel Campbell, whom he had sent in advance.

This he fortunately accomplished; and Campbell, with a few boats which he had collected, conveyed the monarch and his followers to Kintyre, where they were hospitably received by Angus of Illy, lord of Kintyre. From thence, deeming himself still insecure, he passed over with three hundred of his company to the little island of Rathlin, situated on the northern coast of Ireland, amid whose rude but friendly inhabitants he buried himself from the pursuit of his enemies.

In the spring of 1307, the fugitives determined to revisit their native land, where their mysterious disappearance had created some sensation. Accordingly Sir James Douglas and Sir Robert Boyd went over to the Island of Arran, where they found the castle of Brodick strongly garrisoned by the English. Having laid an ambuscade, they had the good fortune to surprise the under-warden; and after killing forty of his soldiers, made themselves masters of a very valuable cargo of provisions, arms, and clothing.

This proved a seasonable supply to the King, who soon after arrived from Rathlin with a fleet of thirty-three galleys, and in his company about three hundred men.

Ignorant of the situation of the enemy, Bruce first despatched a messenger from Arran into his own county of Carrick, with instructions, if he found the people well-disposed, to light a fire on a day appointed upon an eminence near Turnberry Castle. When the day arrived, Bruce, who watched in extreme anxiety for the signal, about noon perceived a light in the expected direction, and instantly embarked, steering, as night came on, by the light of the friendly beacon.

Meanwhile his messenger had also seen the fire, and dreading that his master might embark, hastened to the beach where, on meeting his friends, he informed them that Lord Percy, with a strong garrison, held the castle of Turnberry; that parties of the enemy were quartered in the town, and that there was no hope of success.

"Traitor," said the King, "why did you light the fire?"

"I lighted no fire," he replied; "but observing it at nightfall, I dreaded you might embark, and hastened to meet you."

Placed in this dilemma, Bruce questioned his friends as to what had best be done, when his brother, Sir Edward, declared loudly that he would follow up the adventure, and that no power or peril could induce him to re-embark. This was said in the true spirit of a knight-errant: but his royal brother, who was playing a game of which the stake was a kingdom, might be allowed to hesitate. His naturally fearless and sanguine temper, however, got the better of him, and, dismissing caution, he determined to remain, and, as it was still night, to attack the English quarters.

The plan succeeded. The enemy, cantoned in careless security in the houses and hamlets around the castle of Turnberry, were easily surprised and put to the sword; while Percy, hearing the tumult, and ignorant of the small number of the Scots, did not dare to attempt a rescue, but shutting himself up in the castle, left a rich booty to the assailants, amongst which were his war-horses and his household plate.

Little, however, was to be done in the Carrick region; the inhabitants were friendly enough, but they were afraid openly to take the part of Bruce. The most acceptable part was played by a lady, a relation of his own, who brought him a seasonable supply of money and provisions, and a reinforcement of forty men. From her, too, he learned what had happened in Scotland during his absence.

UNWELCOME NEWS.

The news was disheartening enough. Nigel Bruce, one of the King's brothers, and a youth remarkable for comeliness, had been taken, and afterwards hanged and beheaded. The same doom had befallen the husband of Bruce's sister; Christopher Seton, and his brother Alexander Seton, the Earl of Athole, Simon Fraser, and Herbert de Norham, had been put to death at London, after the horrible form of the execution of traitors; and the chroniclers say that Athole, being in some slight degree akin to the royal blood of England, had the distinction that the gibbet he was hanged on was thirty feet higher than the others. There had been many inferior victims.

The Queen, he heard, and his daughter Marjory, thinking themselves insecure in the castle of Kildrummie, which was threatened by the English army, had taken refuge in the sanctuary of St Duthac, at Iain in Ross-shire, but had been made prisoners through the treachery of the Earl of Ross. The Queen and her daughter were committed to close confinement in England, where in different prisons and castles they endured an eight years' captivity.

A more severe fate awaited the Countess of Buchan, who had dared to place the King upon the throne, and who was soon after taken. In one of the outer turrets of the castle of Berwick was constructed a cage, latticed and cross-barred with wood, and secured with iron, in which this unfortunate lady was immured. No person was permitted to speak with her, except the women who brought her food, and it was carefully stipulated that these should be of English extraction. Confined in this rigorous manner, and yet subjected to the gaze of every passer-by, she remained for four years shut up, till she was released from her misery and subjected to a milder imprisonment in the monastery of Mount Carmel, in Berwick.

HISTORICAL DIFFICULTIES; AN OUTLAW'S LIFE.

"It is extremely difficult," remarks the late Dr. John Hill Burton, "to give distinctness and chronological sequence to the events in Scotland from 1306 to 1310; the conditions are, indeed, antagonistic to distinctness. We have a people restless and feverishly excited to efforts for their liberty when opportunity should come, but not yet embodied in open war against their invaders, and therefore doing nothing distinct enough to hold a place in history; in fact, if after events did not attest the determined spirit of opposition then smouldering among the people, the natural inference would be that they were now thoroughly broken in. The other prominent feature in the historical conditions was the new-made king, as yet so insecurely seated that he must be treated as a competitor only for a throne. He was not, however, in this capacity holding himself apart in serene dignity until his partisans should come to tell him that the cause of legitimacy is at length triumphant, and a devoted people are impatient for their sovereign. On the contrary, he was doing his own work with labour, peril, and suffering."

We soon become acquainted with the nature, physical and moral, of the adventurer. He is a tall, strong man, of a comely, attractive, and commanding countenance. When clad in steel and mounted on his war-horse, he is a thorough paladin, dealing with sword or mace the doughtiest blows going in his day. But when he has to cast aside his panoply he can take to the ways of the half-naked mountaineer—can make long journeys on foot, scramble over rugged ground, and endure cold and hunger. He is steady and sanguine of temperament: his good spirits and good humour never fail; and in the midst of misery and peril, he can keep up the spirits of his followers by chivalrous stories and pleasant banter. To women he is ever courteous, and he is kind and considerate to all less able to bear fatigue and adversity than himself. There is, indeed, a remarkable parallel between Robert Bruce and Henry the Great of France, with the difference in Bruce's favour of his living in an age which did not applaud the immoralities of gallantry.

To the account we have already given of his wanderings we may add one or two more incidents. On one occasion, when in Galloway, and hard pressed by a large party of the natives, he went forward in advance of his party to reconnoitre, in company with Sir Gilbert de la Haye. The ground was well fitted for defence. A steep path led up from the brink of the river to the summit of the bank: and Bruce took his stand at the gorge, where it was so narrow that the superior numbers of the enemy gave them little advantage. Here he listened for some time, till at length the baying of a hound told him of the approach of the Galwegians, and, by the light of the moon, he could see their band crossing the river and pressing up the path. He instantly despatched De la Haye to rouse and bring up his little force, whilst he remained alone to defend the pass.

The fierce mountaineers were soon upon him; but although mounted and armed after their own fashion, they stood little chance against so powerful an adversary as Bruce, clothed in steel, and having the advantage of the ground. One only could attack him at a time; and as he pressed boldly but blindly forward, he was transixed in a moment by the spear; whilst his horse borne down to the earth and instantly stabbed, blocked up the path in such a way that the next soldier must charge over his body. He, too, with many of his companions, successively but vainly endeavoured to carry the pass. They were met by the dreadful sword of the King, which swung around on every side. Numbers now fell and formed a ghastly barrier around him; so that on the approach of his men the Galwegians drew off and gave up the pursuit. When Bruce's own party came up, they found him wearied but unwounded, and sitting on a bank, where he had cast off his helmet to wipe his brow and cool himself in the night air.

In this manner, partly by his own valour, and partly from the private information which he received from those kindly disposed to him, he escaped the various toils with which he was beset; and as he still counted among his party some of the bravest and most adventurous spirits in Scotland, it often happened that when his fortunes seemed sinking to the lowest ebb, some auspicious adventure occurred which re-animating the hopes of the party, and encouraged them to persevere.

The castle of Douglas had been rebuilt by the English. It was again attacked by its terrible master the "Good Sir James;" and although he failed in getting it into his hands, its captain was slain, and a great part of its garrison put to the sword: after which, having heard that the Earl of Pembroke, with a large force, was marching against the King who still lay in the mountainous parts of Carrick, Douglas joined his sovereign and awaited their advance.

Bruce had now been well trained. He was familiarly acquainted with this partisan warfare; and it was his custom, when keenly pursued, to make his soldiers disperse in small companies, first appointing a place of rendezvous where they should reassemble when the danger was over. Trusting to this plan and to his own personal courage and skill, he did not hesitate, with only four hundred men, to await the attack of Pembroke's army, which had been reinforced by John of Lorn, with eight hundred Highlanders, familiar with war in a mountainous country, and well trained to act in the moors and merrasses of this wild region. Lorn is, moreover, reported to have taken along with him a large bloodhound, which had once belonged to the King, and whose instinctive attachment was thus meanly employed against its old master.

The Highland chief contrived so successfully to conceal his men, that Bruce, whose attention was fixed chiefly on Pembroke's force, found his position unexpectedly attacked by Lorn in the rear, and by the English, with whom was his own nephew Randolph, in the front. His brother, Edward Bruce, and Sir James Douglas, were now with him, and after making head for a short time, they divided their little force into three companies, and dispersed among the mountains. He trusted that he might have thus a fairer chance of escape; but the bloodhound instantly fell upon the track of the King; and the treacherous Lorr, with his mountaineers, had almost run him down, when the animal was transfixd by an arrow from one of the fugitives, and Bruce with great difficulty escaped.

In this pursuit it is said that with his own hand he slew five of the enemy, which, as the men of Lorn were probably half-naked and ill-armed mountaineers, who had to measure weapons with an adversary fully accoutred and of uncommon personal strength, is in no respect unlikely to be true. Bruce, however, had the misfortune to lose his banner, which was taken by Randolph, then fighting in the ranks of the English.

THE TURN OF THE TIDE.

The heroic spirit of Bruce had now transfused itself into the peasantry of the country: and the King began to reap the fruits of this popular spirit in the capture of the castle of Linlithgow by a common labourer. His name was Binney; and being known to the garrison, and employed by them in leading hay into the fort, he communicated his design to a party of Scottish soldiers, whom he stationed in ambush near the gate. In his large wain he contrived to conceal eight armed men, covered with a load of hay. A servant drove the oxen, and Binney himself walked carelessly at his side. When the portcullis was raised, and the wain stood in the middle of the gateway, interposing a complete barrier to its descent, the driver cut the ropes which harnessed the oxen: upon which signal the armed men suddenly leaped from the cart, the soldiers in ambush rushed in, and so complete was the surprise, that with little resistance the garrison were put to the sword, and the place taken. Bruce amply rewarded the brave countryman, and ordered the castle and its strong outworks, constructed by Edward I., to be immediately demolished.

At last Bruce not only secured possession of the country, but increased the number of his partisans by causing many powerful Scotch gentlemen, who had hitherto taken the side of the English, to join him. In the year 1313, only a few vestiges of English intrusion remained, in the shape of an unwarlike garrison here and there. Nor had Bruce's exertions been confined to Scotland itself. Imitating the conduct of Wallace after the Battle of Stirling, he had made two forays into the north of England, devastating and spoiling the country, and he had also seized the Isle of Man.

At last, after repeated complaints from the people of Cumberland, whose territories Bruce had ravaged, and from the small party of Scotch nobles who still adhered to the English interest, Edward II., who had succeeded, on the death of his father, to the English throne, began to make preparations in earnest to invade Scotland, and an army greater than had ever followed his victorious father was ordered to be raised.

The immediate cause of this invasion, however, was this: Edward Bruce, the King's brave and hot-headed brother, had attacked Stirling Castle. The English commander, Philip de Mowbray, offered to surrender if the castle were not relieved before a certain date. The effect of this treaty was to allow the English time to assemble an army, and to commit the fate of Scotland to the issue of a great general battle, such as it appeared most prudent in the meantime to avoid.

The first half of the year 1314 was spent by each kingdom in gathering all its strength for this great day. When the appointed time for this decisive conflict drew near, Edward entered Scotland by way of Berwick and the Lothians. Bruce caused all his available forces to be summoned to meet at Torwood, near Stirling.

THE BATTLE OF BANNOCKBURN.

Everything being arranged, the King reviewed his troops, and declared himself well satisfied with their appearance and equipment. The chief leaders of the Scottish army were Sir Edward Bruce, the King's brother, Sir James Douglas, Randolph, Earl of Moray, and Walter, the High Steward of Scotland. These, with the exception of the last, who was still a youth, were experienced and veteran leaders, long accustomed to war, and on whom the King could place entire reliance. Bruce, therefore, fully explained to them his intended order of battle, and awaited with great tranquillity the approach of the enemy.

The latest historian of Scotland, Dr. John Hill Burton, has given a graphic account of the conflict which followed, the most momentous event in the annals of the country, and we shall here follow his clear and interesting narrative.

On the 23rd of June, the two armies were visible to each other. If the Scots had, as it was said, between thirty and forty thousand men, it was a great force for the country at that time to furnish. The English army might be, as it was said to be, a hundred thousand in all. The efficient force, however, was in the mounted men, and these were supposed to be about equal in number to the whole Scots army.

This great host was apparelled with unusual magnificence. Had it been assembled for some object of courtly display, it would have been a memorable exhibition of feudal splendour. The countless banners of all colours and devices, and the burnished steel coats of the many thousand horsemen glittering in the summer sun, left impressions of awe and admiration which passed on from generation to generation.

"There are efforts, not always successful, to describe the exact division and disposal of the Scots army. It seems more important to keep in view the general tactics on which its leader was prepared with confidence to meet so unequal a force. It was the same as Wallace had practically taught. Its leading feature was the receiving charges of cavalry by clumps—square or circular—of spearmen; and simple as it was, it was revolutionising the military creed of Europe by sapping the universal faith in the invincibility of mounted men-at-arms by any other kind of troops. Bruce had a small body of mounted men, but he was not to waste them in any attempt to cope with the English cavalry; they were reserved for any special service or emergency."

For the hopes of Scotland the great point was that the compact clumps of spearmen should be attacked upon their own ground. But there was a serious danger to be met beforehand. Holding the approaches to the castle from the east was far more difficult than holding the ground of the main army. If any body, however small, of the English army could force their passage, and could reach the castle gate or the sloping parts of the rock, the primary object of the invasion would be accomplished. The castle would be relieved, and the English army, no longer bound to attack the Scots on their own strong ground, could go where it pleased; and, in fact, this movement, so dangerous to the Scots, had been well-nigh accomplished.

It was the duty of King Robert's nephew, Randolph, with a party told off for the purpose, to guard the passage. The King observed that a party of eight hundred horse, under Clifford, were making a circuit, evidently with the purpose of reaching the passage, and that no preparations were made to receive them. He pointed this out to Randolph, with a severe rebuke for his negligence. Burning to redeem his honour, he ran with a body of spearmen, who planted themselves in the way of the English horsemen, forming a clump, with spears pointing forth all over like the prickles of a hedgehog. The horse attacked them furiously in front without breaking them, then wheeled round and round them, vainly assailing them from all points.

From a distance the little party seemed doomed, and Douglas hastened with a following to their rescue; but as he approached, the aspect was more cheering. It was not so certain that they were to be beaten, and chivalry forbade him to give unnecessary aid. The assailants had suffered heavy loss. Sir William d'Eyncourt, an illustrious English knight, was numbered among the dead; and the horsemen, breaking up in confusion, had to retreat to the main army.

A MEMORABLE PASSAGE AT ARMS.

This was followed by a short and memorable passage at arms. King Robert was riding along the front of his line on a small horse or hackney, conspicuous by a little gold circlet round his head to mark his rank. An English knight, Henry de Eham, rode forward into the space between the two armies, after the fashion of a challenger to one of the single combats which at that time gave liveliness to the intervals between the serious business of battle. Bruce accepted the challenge. He warded off his enemy's charge, and, wheeling round, cleft his skull with a small battle-axe, the handle of which went to pieces.

His followers blamed him for so rashly risking the safety of the army in his own, and he had nothing to say in his defence. Yet the act was not so flagrant as it might be if the like were done in our days. One so thoroughly trained to personal warfare as Bruce must have known the extent of his own resources, and might be able to calculate on the next to certainty of killing his man and on the inspiring influence of such an act.

We can easily believe what is said of this incident, showing a feeling of despondency and apprehension through the English host. It was nothing in itself, but it was an evil portent.

A GREAT SCOTTISH VICTORY.

At daybreak on the 24th of June, the English army advanced to the charge. This was a preparatory movement attended with great danger to the Scots. The English army contained a large body of archers, whose motions on foot and in their lines were not impeded by the difficulties of the ground. A detachment of these wheeled round and took up a position where they could rake the compact clumps of Scots spearmen. Here was a use for Bruce's small reserve of cavalry. It charged the archers, and dispersed them; and now the spearmen could give their undivided attention to the onset of the English cavalry.

They soon found how judiciously the ground had been prepared for them. They were parcelled out in ten battles or battalions, but there was not room to move these separately on the narrow ground available for cavalry, and the whole seemed to their enemy thrown into one disorganized mass, or "scheltum" as they called it. The spearmen stood against the charge of the horsemen firm as a rock. It was one of the formidable features of this method of resistance that a great proportion of the wounds fall to the poor horses, who rushed hither and thither in their agony; or, as Barbour has it, the horses "that were sticked rushed and reeled right rudely."

The English cavalry attempted by repeated charges to break the line of the Scottish spearmen, but were repulsed with terrific slaughter. The Scots fought like men animated by the remembrance of many years of wrong and oppression.

The Scottish army suffered much at the hands of the English bowmen; and Bruce, dreading the effect of the constant shower of arrows, directed Sir Robert Keith, the Marshal, to make a circuit with the five hundred horse which were in the reserve, and charge the archers in flank. This movement was successfully executed: the whole body of archers was thrown into confusion: part of them fled to the main army, and the rest did not again attempt to rally or make head during the continuance of the battle.

Bruce now brought up his whole reserve; and the four battles of the Scots were now engaged in one line, the Scottish commanders—the King, Edward Bruce, Douglas, Randolph, and the Steward—fighting in the near presence of each other, and animated with a generous rivalry.

The wavering of the English lines was at last discernible by the Scottish soldiers, who shouted when they saw it, calling out, "On them, on them! —they fail!" and pressed forward with renewed vigour, gaining ground upon their enemy. At this critical moment there appeared over the little hill which lay between the hill and the banner of the Scottish army, a large body of troops marching apparently in firm array towards the field. This spectacle, which was instantly believed to be a reinforcement proceeding to join the Scots, although it was nothing more than the sutlers and camp-boys hastening to see the battle, spread dismay amidst the ranks of the English; and King Robert, whose eye was everywhere to perceive and take advantage of the slightest movement in his favour, put himself at the head of his reserve, and raising his war-cry, furiously pressed on the enemy.

It was this last charge, followed by the advance of the whole line, that decided the day. The English, who hitherto, although wavering, had preserved their array, now broke into disjointed squadrons: part began to quit the field; and no efforts of their leaders could restore order. The flight became general, and the slaughter great. The banners of twenty-seven barons were laid in the dust, and their masters slain.

IN FLIGHT; PRISONERS AND PLUNDER.

On seeing the entire rout of his army, Edward reluctantly allowed the Earl of Pembroke to seize his bridle and force him off the field, guarded by five hundred heavily-armed horse. Multitudes of the English were drowned when endeavouring to cross the Forth. Many in their flight got entangled in the pits, which they seem to have avoided in their first attack, and were there suffocated or slain; others who vainly endeavoured to pass the rugged banks of the Bannockburn were slain in that quarter; so completely was this little river heaped up with the dead bodies of men and horses, that the pursuers passed dry over the mass as if it had been a bridge. Thirty thousand of the English were left dead on the field; and amongst these two hundred knights and seven hundred esquires. A large number of Welsh fled; but the greater part of them were slain or taken prisoners before they reached England.

Such also might have been the fate of Edward himself, had Bruce been able to spare a sufficient body of cavalry to follow up the chase. To the Lothian peasant, the mighty King of England, galloping past like a criminal fleeing from justice, must have been a sight not to be presently forgotten. The King reached Dunbar, a fastness still in his own hands, and took shipping for Berwick.

The camp apparel left behind by the fugitives made a booty so extensive and so costly as to astonish its captors. Still more valuable than this inanimate merchandise was the living sport—the crowd of noble captives who had to be ransomed. In this very lucrative kind of booty, Bannockburn was peculiarly rich, from the nature of a conflict in which so much was gained by disabling the horses rather than the riders.

In the treatment of the dead, many of them the heads of the most distinguished houses in England, Bruce gained golden opinions. Much care was taken in their decorous interment, with church rites; and in some instances, where application was made for such a concession, the body was removed to England with all fitting ceremonies, that it might be laid where the illustrious family of the slain man desired that his ashes should rest.

"Among the prisoners," says Dr. John Hill Burton, "was one whose story furnished the Scots with a merry jest to grace these triumphs. He was a certain Camerlite friar named Baston; and it was said of him, whether truly or not, that he had been taken to see the battle, in order that he might the better be able to perform a certain function assigned to him, which was the celebration of the triumph of the English King as he returned victorious,—an expectation which Bower characterises as proud presumption and presumptuous pride. He was told that, as the price of his ransom, he must celebrate the triumph of the real victors, and that without ambiguity. The result is preserved; and whatever other merits it may have, shows a laboriously earnest effort to accomplish his task to the satisfaction of his instructors.

Stirling Castle was delivered up in terms of the stipulation. Edward Bruce was blamed for having made it, and given such dangerous terms to England; but the result was fortunate.

AFTER THE BATTLE.

A deep and general panic seized the English after the disastrous defeat of Bannockburn. The weak and undecided character of the King infected his nobility; and the common soldiers, having lost all confidence in their officers, became feeble and dispirited themselves. "A hundred English would not hesitate," says Walsingham, "to fly from two or three Scottish soldiers, so grievously had their wonted courage deserted them."

Taking advantage of this dejection, Bruce, in the beginning of autumn, sent Douglas and Edward Bruce across the eastern marches, with an army which wasted Northumberland, and carried fire and sword through the principality of Durham, where they levied severe contributions. They next pushed forward into Yorkshire, and plundered Richmond, driving away a large body of cattle, and making many prisoners. On their way homeward they burned Appleby and Kirkwold, sacked and set fire to the villages on their route, and found the English so dispirited everywhere, that their army reached Scotland loaded with spoil, and unchallenged by an enemy.

BRUCE AND THE POPE; IN IRELAND.

In 1317, Bruce passed over to Ireland, to assist his brother Edward, who had been elected King of that country, and defeated the Anglo-Irish, under the Baron of Clare. The adventures and achievements of Bruce and his brother are among the most exciting chapters in the romance of war. Many brave Scots were thus lost to their country in the hour of need that was coming. Among the deaths the most conspicuous was that of Edward Bruce himself; but "that it was a loss to his country," remarks one writer, "is open to question, for gallant and popular as he was, his reputation was not of the kind that promises a good pilot in a storm."

The political condition of Scotland now pressed for serious consideration at the Papal Court. After the ruin that had overtaken his invading force, the King of England had a keen desire for peace; but the Scots would not let him have it unless he acknowledged their independent sovereignty. Application was made to Rome for a pacificating bull, which was issued. It was addressed to "Our dearest son in Christ, the illustrious Edward, King of England, and our beloved son, the noble Robert de Bruce, conducting himself as King of Scotland." It lamented the loss of Christian blood in civil wars, when the rescue of the Holy Land was in vain calling for champions, and adjudged a truce between the two countries for two years, excommunicating those who might break it.

On the presentation of the documents, Bruce said to the friar who brought them, that the letters and papal instruments were not addressed to him as King of Scotland, returned them to him with much contempt, and declared that he would on no account obey the bulls so long as his royal titles were withheld, and that he was determined to proceed with the war, and make himself master of Berwick, at the siege of which place he was then engaged.

The envoy, we are told, then publicly declared before the Scottish barons and a great concourse of spectators that a two years' truce was, by the authority of the Pope, to be observed by the two kingdoms; but his proclamation was treated with such open marks of insolence and contempt, that he began to tremble for the safety of his person, and earnestly implored them to permit him to pass forward into Scotland to the presence of those prelates with whom he was commanded to confer, or, at least, to have a safe-conduct back again to Berwick. Both requests were denied him, and he was commanded, without delay, to make the best of his way out of the country. On his way to Berwick, the unfortunate monk was waylaid by four armed ruffians, robbed of his letters and papers, amongst which were the bulls excommunicating the King of Scotland, and, after being stripped to the skin, turned naked upon the road. "It is rumoured," says he, in an interesting letter addressed to the cardinals containing the account of his mission. "that the Lord Robert and his accomplices, who instigated this outrage, are now in possession of the letters entrusted to me." There can be little doubt that the rumour rested on a pretty good foundation.

THE ENGLISH AGAIN.

At last, after the northern counties of England had suffered for several years from army after army of marauders, each treading on the heels of another, England spoke of a truce from hostilities as a preliminary to some ulterior permanent arrangement. It was adjusted on the 21st of December, 1319, and was to last for two years.

A change of policy, however, took place on the part of England: and in 1322, preparations were again made for a great and final invasion of Scotland. But Scotland was stronger than it had been eight years before, and was not compelled by the force of circumstances to risk a critical battle on a given day and at a given place. To give England a foretaste of the character of the new war, the Scots began it by a raid across the Border as far as Lancashire, where, according to the accounts of the day, they swept away with them, in their usual light-handed manner, a booty well worth their pains; though how their previous pillaging should have left anything in that part of England worth carrying off is a mystery.

When the English army marched northwards, the policy of the Scots was the same that Wallace tried before the Battle of Falkirk,—to leave the enemy to march over bare fields, and keep clear of a battle. The season was well on in August when the new army crossed the Border; but the harvest cannot have advanced so far as to afford any available food, for we are told that on the line of their march there was blank famine. There was much jealousy about their obtaining near Traquair, in East Lothian, a full—a poor lame least left behind when its brethren were driven to the hills. The Scots army waited behind the Frith of Forth, leaving the invaders in the hands of a deadlier foe—starvation.

Starvation did its work with signal effect while the army was still in the Lothians. They turned southwards; and the starved wretches who were able to drag themselves across the Border, died in multitude from the incapacity with which they fell on the food presented to them on the English ground.

The Scots followed on the heels of the fugitives, and harassed them in every possible way. At Billand Abbey, in Yorkshire, King Robert gained another victory over his foes; but it must have been a comparatively easy matter to triumph over a body of dispirited refugees.

THE TREATY OF NORTHAMPTON.

England had now had enough of fighting, and negotiations were begun for the establishment of a permanent peace. The great difficulty was the acknowledgment of independence, but the affair resolved itself into a sort of compromise. Bruce and his people were permitted to take the titles of King and Kingdom, but England would not give them. On the 7th of June, 1323, King Robert issued a solemn instrument accepting of a truce, or rather of a permanent peace, for his kingdom of Scotland. In this document the war came to an end. The peace was to last for thirteen years.

On the accession of Edward III., however, in 1327, hostilities were recommenced. The "good King Robert," as his people called him, was now justified by age and infirmity in declining military duty; but an expedition into England was committed to the thoroughly competent hands of Douglas and Randolph. This brought the English to their senses. It was agreed to treat on such terms as the Scots would listen to. At a Parliament held at York in January 1328, a document was prepared and issued in the King's name, acknowledging the independent sovereignty of Scotland. It is discursive in solemnities, as such documents ordinarily were, but in the essentials it is quite clear. "The King of England declares for himself and his heirs, that the kingdom of Scotland shall remain for ever to the great prince Lord Robert, by the grace of God illustrious King of Scotland, and to his heirs and successors; and that Scotland by its old marches in the days of King Alexander shall be separated from the kingdom of England, and free of all claims of subjection or vassalage, while all writings or obligations inconsistent with their independence are to be cancelled."

The treaty which followed on this resolution by Parliament was concluded at Edinburgh on the 17th of March. It was ratified by the Parliament of England at Northampton in April, and is hence called the Treaty of Northampton.

THE DEATH OF KING ROBERT.

The good King Robert was now visibly approaching the end of his days on earth; and it gives one pleasure to think that in the infirmities from which he could not recover, he had the proud satisfaction of possessing that Treaty of Northampton—the certificate that he had recovered for his people their conquered kingdom. He died at Cardross, near Dumbarton, on the 7th of June in the year 1329.

On his death-bed he delivered to the Scottish barons his last advice regarding the best mode of conducting the war against England. They concentrate in a small compass the wisdom and experience which he had gained during the whole course of his protracted but glorious war; and it is perhaps not too much to say that there is no instance in their subsequent history in which the Scots have sustained any signal defeat where it cannot be traced to a departure from some of the directions of what is affectionately called the “Good King Robert’s Testament.” His injunctions were, that the Scots in their wars ought always to fight on foot; that, instead of walls and garrisons, they should use the mountains, the morasses, and the woods; having for arms the bow, the spear, and the battle-axe; driving their herds into the narrow glens, and fortifying them there, whilst they laid waste the plain country by fire, and compelled the enemy to evacuate it. “Let your scouts and watches,” he concluded, “be vociferating through the night, keeping the enemy in perpetual alarm; and, worn out with famine, fatigue, and apprehension, they will retreat as certainly as if routed in battle.” Bruce did not require to add that then was the time for the Scots to commence their attacks, and to put in practice that species of warfare which he had taught them to use with such fatal effect.

*A SCENE FROM FROISSART.

Some time before his death, an interesting scene took place, of which Froissart gives us a beautiful and affecting narrative.

“When King Robert of Scotland,” says that historian, “felt that his end drew near, he sent for such barons and lords of his realm as he most trusted, and very affectionately entreated and commanded them, on their fealty, that they should faithfully keep his kingdom for David his son, and when their prince came of age, that they should obey him and place the crown on his head.

“After which he called to him the brave and gentle knight Sir James Douglas, and said, before the rest of the courtiers,— “Sir James, my dear friend, none knows better than you how great labour and suffering I have undergone in my day, for the maintenance of the rights of this kingdom; and when I was hardest pressed, I made a vow, which it now grieves me deeply I have not accomplished. I vowed to God that if I should live to see an end of my wars, and be enabled to govern this realm in peace and security, I would then set out in person, and carry on war against the enemies of my Lord and Saviour, to the best of my power. Never has my heart ceased to bend to this point; but our Lord has not consented thereto; for I have had my hands full in my days, and now, at the last, I am seized with this grievous sickness, so that, as you all see, I have nothing to do but to die. And since my body cannot go thither, and accomplish that which my heart hath so much desired, I have resolved to send my heart there, in place of my body, to fulfil my vow. And now, since in all my realm I know not any knight more hardy than yourself, or more thoroughly furnished with all knightly qualities for the accomplishment of the vow; in place of myself, therefore, I entreat thee, my dear and tried friend, that for the love you bear to me, you will undertake this voyage and acquit my soul of its debt to my Saviour; for I hold this opinion of your truth and nobleness, that whatever you undertake I am persuaded you will successfully accomplish; and thus shall I die in peace, provided that you do all that I shall tell you. I will, then, that as soon as I am dead, you take the heart out of my body and cause it to be embalmed, and take as much of my treasure as seems to you sufficient for the expenses of your journey, both for you and your companions; and that you carry my heart along with you and deposit it in the Holy Sepulchre of our Lord, since this poor body cannot go thither. And it is my command that you do use that royal state and maintenance on your journey, both for yourself and your companions, that into whatever lands or cities you may come, all may know that you have in charge, to bear beyond seas, the heart of King Robert of Scotland.”

“At these words, all who stood by began to weep; and when Sir James himself was able to reply, he said,—

“Ah, most gentle and noble King, a thousand times do I thank you for the great honour you have done me, in making me the depositary and bearer of so great and precious a treasure. Most faithfully and willingly, to the best of my power, shall I obey your command, albeit I would have you believe that I think myself but little worthy to achieve so high an enterprise.”

“Ah, gentle knight,” said the King, “I heartily thank you, provide I you promise to do my bidding on the word of a true and loyal knight.”

“Assuredly,” my liege. I do promise so,” replied

Douglas, 'by the faith which I owe to God and to the order of knighthood.'

"Now praise be to God," said the King, 'for I shall die in peace, since I am assured that the best and most valiant knight of my kingdom has promised to achieve for me that which I myself could never accomplish.'

"And not long after this, this noble King departed this life."

THE BURIAL OF BRUCE; THE HEART OF THE KING.

Immediately after the King's death, his heart was taken out, as he had directed. He was then buried with great solemnity under the pavement of the choir of the Abbey Church of Dunfermline, and over the grave was raised a rich marble monument, which was made at Paris.

Centuries passed on: the ancient church, with the marble monument, fell into ruins, and a more modern building was erected on the same site. This also gave way to time; and, in clearing the foundations for a third church, the workmen laid open a tomb, which proved to be that of Robert the Bruce. The lead coating in which the body was found, was twisted round the head into the shape of a rude crown. A rich cloth of gold, but much decayed, was thrown over it; and, on examining the skeleton, it was found that the breastbone had been sawn asunder to get at the heart.

There remained, therefore, no doubt, that after the lapse of almost five hundred years, his countrymen were permitted, with a mixture of delight and awe, to behold the very bones of their great deliverer.

As soon as the season of the year permitted, Douglas, having the heart of his beloved master in keeping, set sail from Scotland, accompanied by a splendid retinue, and anchored at Sluys in Flanders, at this time the great seaport of the Netherlands. His object was to find out companions with whom he might travel to Jerusalem; but he declined landing, and for twelve days received all visitors on board his ships with a state almost kingly. He had with him seven noble Scottish knights, and was served at table by twenty-eight squires, of the first families in the country. "He kept court," says Froissart, "in a royal manner, with the sound of trumpets and cymbals; all the vessels for his table were of gold and silver; and whatever persons of good estate went to pay their respects to him, were entertained with the richest kind of wine and spiced bread."

At Sluys he heard that Alonzo, the King of Leon and Castile, was carrying on war with Osmyn the Moorish governor of Granada. The religious mission which he had embraced, and the vows he had taken before leaving Scotland, induced Douglas to consider Alonzo's cause as a holy warfare; and before proceeding to Jerusalem, he first determined to visit Spain, and to signalize his prowess against the Saracens.

But his first field against the infidels proved fatal to him, who in the long English war had seen seventy battles. The circumstances of his death were striking and characteristic. In an action near Shēba, on the borders of Andalusia, the Moorish cavalry were defeated; and after their camp had been taken, Douglas, with his companions, engaged too eagerly in the pursuit, and being separated from the main body of the Spanish army, a strong division of the Moors rallied and surrounded them.

The Scottish knight endeavoured to cut his way through the infidels; and in all probability would have succeeded, had he not again turned to rescue Sir William Saint Clair of Roslin, whom he saw in jeopardy. In attempting this he was inextricably involved with the enemy.

Taking from his neck the heart of Bruce, he cast it before him, and exclaimed with a loud voice, "Now pass onward as thou wert wont, and Douglas will follow thee or die."

The action and the sentiment were heroic, and they were the last words and deeds of a heroic life, for Douglas fell, overpowered by his enemies; and three of his knights, and many of his companions, were slain with their master.

On the succeeding day, the body and the casket were both found on the field, and by his surviving friends conveyed to Scotland. The heart of Bruce was deposited at Melrose, and the body of the "Good Sir James," the name by which he is affectionately remembered by his countrymen, was consigned to the cemetery of his fathers in the parish church of Douglas.

THE CHARACTER OF BRUCE.

Bruce undoubtedly belongs to that race of heroic men regarding whom we are anxious to learn even the commonest particulars. But living at so remote a period, the lighter shades and touches which confer individuality are lost in the distance. We only see through the mists which time has cast round it a figure of colossal proportions "walking amidst shadowy peers;" and it is deeply to be regretted that the ancient chroniclers, whose pencil might have brought him before us as fresh and true as when he lived, have disdained to notice many minute circumstances with which we now seek in vain to become acquainted.

• Some faint idea of his person, however, may be gathered from the few scattered touches presented by these authors, and the greater outlines of his character are too strongly marked to escape us.

In his figure the King was tall and well-shaped. Before being broken down by illness he stood nearly six feet high; his hair curled closely and shortly round his neck, which possessed that breadth and thickness that belong to men of great strength. He was broad-shouldered and open-chested, and the proportions of his limbs combined power with lightness and activity. These qualities were increased not only by his constant occupation in war, but by his fondness for the chase and all manly amusements. It is not known whether he was dark or fair-complexioned; his forehead was low, his cheekbones strong and prominent, and the general expression of his countenance open and cheerful, although he was maimed by a wound which had injured his lower jaw.

His manners were dignified and engaging; after battle nothing could be pleasanter or more courteous; and it is infinitely to his honour that in a savage age, and smarting under the injuries which attacked him in his kindest and tenderest relations, he never abused a victory, but conquered often as effectually by his generosity and kindness as by his great military talents. We know, however, that when he chose to express displeasure his look was stern and kingly, and imposed silence and insured obedience. He excelled in all exercises of chivalry; to such a degree, indeed, that the English themselves did not scruple to account him the third best knight in Europe.

His memory was stored with the romances of the period, in which he took a great delight. Their hairbreadth escapes and perilous adventures were sometimes scarcely more wonderful than his own; and he had early imbibed from such works an appetite for individual enterprise and glory, which, had it not been checked by a stronger passion, the love of liberty, might have led him into fatal mistakes. It is quite conceivable that Bruce, instead of a great King, might, like Richard I., have become only a kingly knight-errant.

From this error he was saved by his attachment to his country, directed by an admirable judgment, an unshaken perseverance, and a vein of strong good sense. It is here, although some may think it the homeliest, that we are to find the brightest part of the character of the King. It is these qualities which are especially conspicuous in his long war for the liberty of Scotland. They enabled him to follow out his plans through many a tedious year with undeviating energy; to bear reverses, to calculate his means, to wait for his opportunities, and to concentrate his whole strength upon one great point, till it was gained and secured to his country for ever.

Brilliant military talents and consummate bravery have often been found amongst men, and have proved far more a curse than a blessing; but rarely indeed shall we discover them united to so excellent a judgment, controlled by such perfect disinterestedness, and employed for so sacred an end as in the case of Robert Bruce. There is but one instance on record where he seems to have thought more of himself than of his people, and even this, though rash, was heroic.

"THE BRUCE" OF JOHN BARBOUR.

A sketch of the life of Bruce would be incomplete without some mention of the famous national epic, "The Bruce," in which we have a complete history of the memorable transactions by which King Robert asserted the independence of Scotland, and obtained its crown for his family.

Of John Barbour, the author of "The Bruce," but little is known. Nothing is known of his parentage, and of his birth it can only be conjectured that it occurred about 1320. In his own age he was accounted a man of great worth and learning; he was Archdeacon of Aberdeen as early at least as 1357, and he held that office till his death in 1395.

"When we endeavour," says Dr. Irving, in his "History of Scottish Poetry," "to appreciate the literary merit of Barbour, we must at the same time endeavour to transport ourselves to the remote and unrefined age in which he lived; we must recollect the general barbarism of many preceding centuries, the difficulty of acquiring extensive liberal knowledge, the rude and grotesque taste of almost all his contemporaries. When all these circumstances are duly considered, his poem will be found entitled to an ample share of our approbation.

"Fortunate in the choice of a subject, he has unfolded a series of remarkable events, and has diffused over a very long narrative that lively interest, which an ordinary writer is incapable of exciting. Here we are not to expect the blandishments of modern poetry; the author stands conspicuous amid the ruins of time, and, like an undecayed Gothic tower, presents an aspect of majestic simplicity. The lively strain of his narrative, the air of sincerity which he always exhibits, his earnest participation in the success or sufferings of his favourite characters, as well as the splendid attributes of the characters themselves, cannot fail of arresting the attention of every reader familiarly acquainted with the language in which he writes. The age of the great King Robert was the age of Scottish chivalry; and the monarch himself presented the most perfect model of a valiant knight. Whatever inconsistencies may have appeared in his early conduct, the best portion of his life was undoubtedly spent in the exercise of heroic valour or of political wisdom. Such a hero and such a crisis were a most fortunate selection; and although the intrinsic merit of the poem is very conspicuous, yet the attraction of the poem is partly to be ascribed to his judicious choice of a subject."

Barbour, in the opinion of all who are competent to judge, has adorned the English language by a strain of versification, expression, and poetical imagery, far superior to his age. His historical merits have also been generally admitted. Bruce died in 1329; and as Barbour was employed in writing his poem within forty-six years from that date, he enjoyed many opportunities of collecting information. He might himself have conversed with warriors who fought at Bannockburn.

The following extracts will give the reader some idea of the style of the poem:—

APOSTROPHE TO FREEDOM.

"A! fredome is a nobill thing!
Fredome maye set man to half liking!
Fredome all so cee to man giffs;
He leyvs at use that frely leyvs!
A noble hart may half name e-e,
Na ellys nocht that may him please,
Gyff fredome failly the: for fre liking
Is yearnyt our all othir thing;
Na he, that ay lease leyvt fre,
May nocht know weill the profferte,
The angry, na the wreecht o' me,
That is coupl't to foule thyrdome.
Bot gyff he had assayit it,
Then all perperle he sould wryt;
And sould think fredome war to pryse
Than all the gold in world that is."

THE DEATH OF SIR HENRY DE BOHUN.

[Of this incident, which took place on the eve of the Battle of Bannockburn, we have already given an account. In the extract we give as much as possible the modern spelling.]

"And when the king wist that they were
In hale battle, comit he to war,
His battle gart he set in array,
He made gude and rich payne,
Laid out and gave away man
His land, yit was an ax to hand,

And on his bassinet he bare
An hat of tyre aboon ay where;
And, thereupon, into takin,
Ane high crown, that he was king.
And when Gloster and Hereford were
With their battle approachand near,
Before them all there camo ridand,
With helms on heid and spear in har!
Sir Henry the Boon, the worthy,
That was a wicht knicht, and a hardy,
And to the Earl of Hereford cousin;
Armed in arms gude and fine;
Camo on a stouid a bowshot near,
Before all other that there were;
And knew the king, for that he saw,
Him sae range his men on raw,
And by the crown that was set
Also upon his bassinet.
And toward him he went in by.
And the king sae apertly
Saw him come, forouth all his fears,
In by till him the horse he steers.
And when Sir Henry saw the king
Come on, forouthin abasing,
Till him he rode in greet by.
He thought that he should weel felytly
Win him, and have him at his will,
Sin' he him for-it saw sae ill.
Spent they samen intill a lyng;
Sir Henry missed the noble king;
And he that in his stirrups stude,
With the ax, that was hard and gude,
With sae greet main, raucht him a dint,
That nouthir har nor helm might stint
The heavy dush, that he him gave,
That near the lead till the harus clava.
The hand-ax shaft frushit in tway;
And he down to the yird gan gao
All flailings, for him failit richt.
This was the first straik of the ficht,
That was performit doughtily,
And when the king's men sae stontly
Saw him, richt at the first meeting,
Forouthen doubt or alasing,
Have slain a wicht sae at a straik,
Sic hard'neit therout gan they tak,
The they come on richt hardily.
When Englishmen saw them sae stontly
Come on, they had greet abasing;
And specially for that the king
Sae smartly that gude knicht has slain,
That they wroldrew them ewilk ane,
And durst not ane abide to ficht;
Sae dreid they for the king's richt.

When last the king repairit was,
That gart his men all leave the chase,
The lordis of his company
Blamed him, as they durst, greatlyndy,
That he him put in aventure,
To meet sae stith a knicht, and stour,
In sic point as he ther was seen.
For they said weel, it might have been
Cause of their tynsal ewilk ane.
The king ans'ed, he had made them gnaes,
But maid not a hand-ax shif sae
Was with the straik broken in tway."

INTRODUCTORY.

THE naval history of England has no name to be compared in eminence with that of Horatio Nelson, the greatest admiral the world has ever seen.

Neither is there in the whole range of biography

a life more full of excitement than his, or one from which the reader may derive more spirited instruction.

The coolness of Nelson amidst danger, his foresight in providing for every chance, his promptitude in action, his humanity to his foes, are all to be taken note of by those who wish their reading to aid their improvement, and who would form their characters on the great models of the past.

We see him avoiding no labour or sacrifice which promised to make him a better sailor or officer, and shunning no peril when he saw a reasonable chance of success in any enterprise. We find him literally on fire with that ardour of enthusiasm, without which scarcely any great man has ever achieved distinction; and we gather from his whole life this valuable lesson, that the true charms to secure success are those which are at everybody's hand, good character and conduct.

BIRTH AND EDUCATION.

Horatio Nelson was born on Michaelmas Day, 1758, in the parish house of Burnham Thorpe, in Norfolk. His father was rector of that parish, Horatio was the fifth son, and was called after his god-father, the first Lord Walpole, to whom his mother was related.

As a child, he was feeble and sickly; and all through life his small, frail, and attenuated frame seemed to consort but poorly with the daring and impetuous spirit which stirred and lifted him to high attempts. In spite of his weak constitution, however, he became distinguished among his youthful companions for bold and adventurous achievements.

The first school of any importance to which he was sent was the High School at Norwich. While studying here, he was recalled home on the death of his mother, who died in 1767. The funeral of Mrs. Nelson brought her brother, Captain Suckling, of the Royal Navy, on a visit to the rectory, and Horatio heard his uncle relate many stories and anecdotes of his sea-life. These fired his imagination, and he determined, if possible, to be a sailor.

During the Christmas holidays of the year 1770, he read in a newspaper that Captain Suckling was appointed to the Porpoise, of 61 guns. Young Horatio well knew that eight children were a heavier burden than his father's income could well support, and he had often expressed a wish to remove his part of the weight. It was the thought of providing for himself that now actuated him in proposing that he should go to sea with his uncle.

His father, who was then at Bath, understood the generous nature of the boy's feelings, but did not oppose his resolution. Accordingly, he wrote to his brother-in-law.

Captain Suckling had promised to provide for one of his nephews, but Horatio was not the one he would have chosen, on account of the delicacy of his constitution. "What," said he in reply, "has poor Horatio done, who is so weak, that he, above all the rest, should be sent to rough it out at sea? But let him come, and the first time we go into action, a cannon-ball may knock off his head, and provide for him at once."

EARLY LIFE AT SEA.

In the spring of 1771, the boy was sent by his father to join the ship, then lying in the Medway. At the end of the journey, he was put down with the other passengers, and left to find his way as well as he could. After wandering about in the cold, he was at last observed by an officer, who asked him a few questions, and happening to know his uncle, took him home and gave him something to eat. When he got on board, Captain Suckling had not joined, and he paced the deck for the rest of the day without being noticed by anyone. Such was the unpromising entrance on the naval profession of one who was destined to be its brightest ornament.

At first, as was to be expected, Horatio was wretchedly homesick. Added to this, he had to endure much physical hardship, the loss of every comfort, even of sleep. Nelson had a feeble body and an affectionate heart, and he remembered through life his early days of wretchedness in the service.

The Raisonné did not remain long in commission, and on his being paid off, Captain Suckling was appointed to a guard-ship in the Medway. This he thought much too inactive a life for his nephew, and he, therefore, sent him in a merchant ship to the West Indies. "I came back," says Nelson, "a practical seaman, with a horror of the Royal Navy, and with a saying then constant with the seamen, aft the most honour, forward the better man." So strongly was he possessed with this prejudice, that when, on his return, Captain Suckling received him on board, it was many weeks before he was in the least reconciled to a man-of-war.

His uncle, who noticed this, and who seems also to have rightly appreciated the boy's character, held out to him as a reward, that if he attended well to navigation, he should go in the cutter and in the decked long-boat, attached to the commanding officer's ship; and thus he became a good pilot, and confident of himself among rocks and sands, which, he said, afterwards was of great comfort to him.

In April 1773, an expedition of discovery towards the North Pole was sent out under Captain Phipps, in consequence of an application from the Royal Society. On account of the severity of the service, effective men were entered instead of boys; but Horatio contrived to get with Captain Lutwidge as his coxswain, in the Curcass, one of the two ships composing the expedition.

One night, when the ice was all around them, the young coxswain and a shipmate of his own standing, stole from the ship to hunt a bear. It was not long before they were missed: a thick fog had come on, and Captain Lutwidge was exceedingly anxious for their safety. Between three and four in the morning, the mist cleared off, and they were seen at a considerable distance in pursuit of their game. The signal was made for their return, but Nelson was too intent upon his object to obey it. A chasm in the ice luckily separated him from the bear; his musket flashed in the pan. "Never mind," said he, "do but let me get a blow at this devil with the butt-end, and we shall have him." A gun from the ship terrified the animal, and Nelson was obliged to return, disappointed and expecting a reprimand. Captain Lutwidge reproved him somewhat sternly, and asked him what reason he could have for hunting a bear. "Sir," he replied, pointing his lips as he used to do when agitated, "I wished to get the skin for my father."

A VOYAGE TO INDIA—A GLIMPSE OF GLORY.

Soon after his return to England, his uncle recommended him to Captain Farmer of the Schooner, 20 guns, then going to India in the squadron under Sir Edward Hughes. He was stationed in the foretop at first, but the mast, seeing how anxious he was to become acquainted with the minutest part of a seaman's duty, particularly recommended him to the Captain, who accordingly placed him on the quarter-deck, and rated him as midshipman.

The service which he had gone through had strengthened his constitution, his countenance at this time was florid, and he seemed rather stout and athletic; but in India he caught one of the malignant diseases of that climate: it totally deprived him of the use of his limbs, and nearly brought him to the grave. In consequence of this he returned to Europe, in an alarming state of weakness.

During the voyage home he was much depressed. He had left his companions in the vigorous pursuit of duty and full of the brightest hopes; while over him there appeared to be hanging a cloud presaging an unprofitable destiny. "I felt impressed," said he, long afterwards, "with an idea that I should never rise in my profession. My mind was staggered with a view of the difficulties I had to surmount, and the little interest I possessed. I could discover no means of reaching the object of my ambition. After a long and gloomy reverie, in which I almost wished myself overboard, a sudden glow of patriotism was kindled within me, and presented my king and country as my patrons. Well then, I exclaimed, I will be a hero, and, confiding in Providence, I will brave every danger."

From that hour, as he often afterwards declared, a radiant orb was suspended before his mind's eye, which urged him onward to renown. No person has ever looked to the attainment of any great and worthy object without experiencing similar fluctuations. Nelson spoke of these aspirations of his youth as if they had in them a character of divinity, as if the light that led him on was light from heaven.

His fits of dejection were altogether causeless. His prospects were fair, and his progress almost as rapid as it could be. When he reached England, he found his uncle Comptroller of the Navy, and was immediately appointed to act as fourth lieutenant of the Worcester, 64 guns, then on the point of sailing for Gibraltar. His age might have been a sufficient cause for not entrusting him with the charge of a watch, yet the Captain used to say he felt as easy when Nelson was on deck as any other officer in the ship.

FROM 1777 TO 1783.

On the 8th April, 1777, he passed his examination. Captain Suckling sat at the head of the table; and when it had ended in a manner highly creditable, introduced Horatio as his nephew. The examining captains expressed their surprise that he had not told them of their relationship before. "No," replied the Comptroller, "I did not wish the youngster to be favoured. I felt convinced that he would pass a good examination, and you see I have not been disappointed."

On the following day, Nelson received his commission as second lieutenant of the Lowestoft, a frigate of 32 guns, under Captain William Locker. Then fitting out for Jamaica. After a year's active service he was removed to the Eristol, the flag-ship of Sir Peter Parker, to whom Captain Locker warmly recommended him. This change was only for a short time, for on the 8th December, 1778, Nelson, then about twenty years and two months old, was appointed commander of the Badger sloop. Six months afterwards he acquired the last step, being made Post into the Hinchinbrooke, of 23 guns.

Nelson's services were next engaged in a naval expedition against the Spanish territories in Honduras. This terminated in disaster, owing in a great measure to the ignorance and incapacity of those entrusted with the military conduct of the affair. Of eighteen hundred men who were sent to different posts upon this ill-fated scheme, only three hundred and eighty returned, whilst of the whole crew of the Hinchinbrooke, consisting of two hundred men, only ten were saved, the rest almost all falling victims to the deadly effect of the climate.

Nelson narrowly escaped. He had been injured by drinking from a stream in which boughs of the manchineel tree had been thrown; and though his undaunted spirit remained unsubdued, yet he never ceased to feel the consequences so long as he lived. His health, indeed, had suffered so severely that he was compelled to return home.

On his arrival in England, he was carried to Bath, where the change of air and the waters had so good an effect that at the end of three months we find him unable to remain any longer idle, and hastening to the metropolis to apply for employment. In August 1784, he was appointed to the Albemarle, 23 guns, and sent to the North Sea. During this voyage he gained a considerable knowledge of the Danish coast and its soundings—knowledge which afterwards proved of much importance.

On his return he was ordered to Quebec. Here he became acquainted with a Mr. Alexander Davison, who saved him from an imprudent marriage. Nelson was about to quit the station, had taken leave of his friends, and had gone down to the river to the place where men-of-war usually anchor; nevertheless, the next morning, as Mr. Davison was walking on the beach, he saw him coming back in his boat. He could not, he said, leave Quebec without offering himself and his fortune to the woman whom he loved. Davison told him his utter ruin, situated as he was, must inevitably follow.

"Then let it follow," was his reply, "for I am resolved to do it."

His friend, however, was equally resolute that he should not; and, after some dispute, Nelson, with no very good grace, suffered himself to be led back to his boat.

Soon after this he was introduced to Prince William Henry, afterwards King of Orange, then serving as a midshipman under Lord Hood. He did not prove the imposing looking character His Royal Highness had been led to imagine after hearing of his various exploits. He found him the merest boy of a captain he had ever beheld. He had on a full-laced uniform; his lank, unpowdered hair was tied in a stiff Hessian tail of an extraordinary length, and the old-fashioned flaps of his waistcoat added to the general quaintness of his figure. The Prince and Nelson were not long in becoming fast friends.

Lord Hood, who had been intimately connected with Captain Suckling, took the Albemarle with him to the West Indies, and treated Nelson with the most gratifying kindness. "He treats me," says Nelson, "as if I were his son: nor is my situation with Prince William less gratifying."

In the spring of 1783, peace was concluded between England and France and Spain, and the unhappy contest with the American Colonies also terminated. The Albemarle returned to England, and was paid off, Nelson seizing the opportunity to pass a few months in France.

AT THE LEeward ISLANDS. MARRIAGE—RETURN TO ENGLAND.

Early in the ensuing year he was appointed to the Boreas, 23 guns, and proceeded to the Leeward Islands as a cruiser on the peace establishment.

Here he rendered himself conspicuous, and at the same time decidedly obnoxious to the planters by his zeal on behalf of British commerce. The Americans at this time, taking advantage of the registers of the vessels, issued when they were British subjects, carried on a great trade with our West Indian Islands. This illicit traffic, in direct violation of the Navigation Act, was at last put an end to by Nelson.

At Nevis, Nelson became acquainted with Mrs. Nisbet, a widow in her eighteenth year. They were married on the 11th March, 1787, Prince William Henry, at his own desire, giving away the bride. This union lasted happily for several years, till at last, as we shall hear, it was brought to a strange termination.

A few months after his marriage, Nelson returned to England. By what seems a cruel neglect, the Boreas was kept from the end of June till the end of November as a sloop and receiving ship. This treatment excited in Nelson the strongest indignation; and but for the good offices of a friend, he would have resigned his commission, and never again set foot on board a man-of-war.

His resentment having been to a certain extent removed, he was anxious to be employed, and repeatedly applied to the Admiralty requesting that he might not be left to rust in indolence.

"I must still," he says in one of his letters, "buffet the waves in search of—what? Alas! that thing called honour is now thought of no more. My integrity cannot, I hope, be amended, but my fortune, God knows, has grown worse for the service—so much for serving my country. I have invariably laid down and followed close a plan of what ought to be uppermost in the breast of an officer, that it is much better to serve an ungrateful country than to give up his own fame."

IN THE WAR WITH FRANCE.

With the advent of the war with revolutionary France, the time came when Nelson was to excite amazement in the world by a series of noble deeds, in the lustre of which all other naval glory looks pale. The French having declared war against Great Britain on the 1st February, 1793, a contest began, which soon brought Spain and Holland into union with France, and caused England, with some wretched allies, to maintain one of the most tremendous struggles known in history.

By the influence of the Duke of Clarence and Lord Hood, he was appointed, on the 30th January, 1793, to the Agamemnon, of 61 guns.

The temper with which Nelson engaged in this war is manifested in the instructions he gave to one of his midshipmen. "There are three things, young gentleman, which you are constantly to bear in mind; first, you must always implicitly obey orders, without attempting to form any opinion of your own respecting their propriety; secondly, you must consider every man as your enemy who speaks ill of your king; and thirdly, you must hate a Frenchman as you do the devil."

The Agamemnon was ordered to the Mediterranean under Lord Hood; and there Nelson commenced a career, first, of unexampled exertion, and, finally, of unequalled glory.

His first exploits were rather of a military than a naval character. He took a distinguished part in the sieges of Bastia and Calvi. Speaking of the siege of the former place, which continued nearly seven weeks, Nelson says: "I am all astonishment when I reflect on what we have achieved: 1000 regulars, 1500 national guards, and a large body of Corsican troops, laying down their arms to 1000 sailors and marines, and 200 seamen. I always was of opinion, and have acted upon it, that one Englishman was equal to three Frenchmen. Had this been an English town, I am sure it would not have been taken."

The siege of Calvi was carried on by General Stuart. Nelson had less responsibility here than at Bastia, but the service was no less hard.

More than four months he was thus employed on shore, till he felt almost qualified to pass his examination as a besieging general. The climate proved more destructive than the war. Nelson described himself as the reed among the oaks, bowing before the storm that laid them low. "All the prevailing disorders have attacked me, but I have not strength for them to fasten upon. One plan I pursue, never to employ a doctor—Nature does all for me, and Providence protects me."

His services before Calvi were, by an unaccountable omission, altogether overlooked; his name did not even appear in the list of wounded, though he lost an eye. "One hundred and ten days," says he, "I have been actually engaged at sea and on shore against the enemy, three actions against ships, two against Bastia in my own ship, four boat actions and two villages taken, and twelve sail of vessels burnt. I do not know that any one has done more; I have had the comfort to be always applauded by my Commander-in-Chief, but never to be rewarded; and what is more mortifying, for service in which I have been wounded, others have been praised who at the time were actually in bed. They have not done me justice; but never mind, I'll have a gazette of my own." How amply was this second-sight of glory realized!

It was not long before a colonelcy of marines was given him, a thing which he had hoped for rather than expected. It came in good time, when his spirits were considerably oppressed by the feeling that his services were not acknowledged as they deserved.

The Agamemnon now entered on a new line of service, being appointed, with a small squadron of frigates, to co-operate with General Devins. He began in high spirits, but the want of activity and decision in the Austrian generals soon gave him melancholy forebodings of what was to follow. His own exertions were unremitting, but he was crippled for want of means.

Weak as his force was, it was almost reduced to nothing by Sir Hyde Parker, after Admiral Hotham had struck his flag. He left him only one frigate and a brig, whereas he had demanded two seventy-fours and eight or ten frigates or sloops, to ensure safety to the army. That army received a defeat from which it never recovered. The generals, of course, imputed it to the want of naval co-operation, asserting that if their left wing had not been exposed to the French fire, it would not have happened.

"I pretend not to say," says Nelson, "that the Austrians would not have been beat had not the g. boats harassed them, for in my conscience I believe they would; but I believe the French could not have attacked had we destroyed all their vessels of war."

To follow Nelson through his subsequent services in the Mediterranean till the fate of Italy was decided, would exceed our limits. In the whole of his conduct he displayed the same zeal, the same indefatigable energy, the same intuitive judgment, the same decision, which always characterised him. While his name was hardly known to the English public, it was feared and respected throughout Italy. A letter came to him directed "Horatio Nelson, Genoa." When the writer was asked how he could direct it so vaguely, he replied, "There is but one Horatio Nelson in the world." In the letter wherein he mentioned this to his wife, he says,—“Had all my actions been gazetted, not one fortnight would have passed during the whole war without a letter from me. One day or other I will have a long gazette to myself; I feel that such an opportunity will be given me. I cannot, if I am in the field of glory, be kept out of sight. Wherever there is anything to be done, Providence is sure to direct my steps.”

These hopes and anticipations were soon to be fulfilled. His mind had long been irritated and depressed by the fear that a general action would take place before he joined the fleet. At length he sailed from the Mediterranean with a convoy for Gibraltar, whence he proceeded to the westward in search of the Admiral.

ENGAGEMENT WITH THE SPANISH FLEET UNDER ADMIRAL D. JOSEPH DE CORDOVA.

Off the mouth of the Straits he fell in with the Spanish fleet, and on the 13th February, communicated the intelligence to Sir John Jervis. Nelson, now Commodore, was directed to show his broad pendant on board the Captain; and before sunset the signal was made to prepare for action. At day-break the enemy were in sight. The British force consisted of two ships of 100 guns, two of 98, two of 90, eight of 74, and one of 64, with four frigates, a sloop, and a cutter. The Spaniards had one four-decker of 136, six three-deckers of 112, two of 81, and eighteen of 74, with ten frigates and a brig. Their Admiral, D. Joseph de Cordova, had learned from an American that the English had only nine ships, which was indeed the case when he had fallen in with them.

Upon this information, instead of going to Cadiz, as had been his intention, he determined to seek an engagement with an enemy so inferior in numbers; and relying with fatal confidence upon the superiority of the Americans, suffered his ships to remain too far dispersed, when the morning of the 14th broke, and the English came in sight. A fog for some time concealed their numbers. The lookout ship, fancying her first signal disregarded, made another that the English force consisted of forty sail-of-the-line. This, as the Captain afterwards said, “he did to rouse the Admiral.” It had the effect of perplexing him and alarming the whole fleet.

Before the enemy could form a regular order of battle, Sir John Jervis, by carrying a press of sail, came up with them, passed through their fleet, tacked, and then cut off nine of their ships from the main body. These ships attempted to turn on their larboard tack, either with a design of passing through the British line or to leeward of it, and then rejoining their friends. Only one of them succeeded. The others were so warmly received that they took to flight and did not appear again in the action till the close.

The Admiral was now able to direct his attention to the enemy's main body, still superior in number to his whole fleet. He made signal to tack in succession.

Nelson, whose station was in the rear of the British line, perceived that the Spanish fleet was beating up before the wind, with an intention of forming their line, joining their separated ships, or flying. To prevent either of these schemes from taking effect, he, without a moment's hesitation, disobeyed the signal.

This at once brought him into action with the Santissima Trinidad, 136, the San Joseph, 112, Salvador del Mundo, 112, San Nicolas, 80, San Isidro, 74, another 74, and another first-rate. Trowbridge, in the Culloden, nobly supported him. The Blenheim then came to their assistance. The Salvador del Mundo and San Isidro dropped astern, and were fired into by the Excellent, Captain Collingwood, who made the latter strike. “But Collingwood,” says Nelson, “distaining the parade of taking possession of beaten enemies, most gallantly pushed up with every sail set to save his old friend and messmate, who was to all appearance in a critical situation.”

The Captain was at this time actually fired upon by three first-rates, the San Nicolas and a 74 with-in pistol-shot of her. The Blenheim was ahead, and the Culloden crippled and astern. Collingwood ranged up and passed within ten feet of the San Nicolas, giving her a most awful and tremendous fire; then pushed on for the Santissima Trinidad.

At this time, the Captain having lost the fore-top-mast, not a sail, shroud, or rope left, her wheel shot away, and incapable of further service in the line or in chase, he directed Captain Miller to put the helm a-starboard, and called for the boarders.

The first man who leaped into the enemy's mizen chains was Captain Berry. He was supported from the spritsail yard, which hooked in the San Nicolas' mizen rigging. A soldier of the 69th broke the upper quarter-gallery window, and jumped in, followed by the Commodore himself and others as fast as possible. The cabin doors were fastened, and the Spanish officers fired their pistols at them through the window. The doors were soon burst. Nelson pushed in, and found Berry in possession of the poop, and the Spanish ensign down. The English were at this time in full possession of every part of the ship; and a fire of musketry opened upon them from the stern gallery of the San Joseph.

Nelson, having planted sentinels at the different ladders, and ordered Captain Miller to send more men into his prize, gave orders for boarding the San Joseph. It was done in an instant, he himself leading the way, and exclaiming, "Westminster Abbey or Victory!"

It was not long before he was on the quarter-deck, where the Spanish captain presented to him his sword, and told him the Admiral was dying of his wounds below. One of his sailors came up, and, with an Englishman's feeling, took him by the hand, saying he might not soon have such another place to do it in, and that he was heartily glad to see him there. Nelson received only a few bruises.

The Spaniards had still eighteen or nineteen ships, which had suffered little or no injury; that part of the fleet which had been separated from the main body in the morning was now coming up, and Sir John Jervis made signal to bring to. The Captain was lying a perfect wreck on board her two prizes, and many of the other vessels were wholly unmanageable. The Spanish Admiral, meantime, according to his official account, inquired of his captains whether it was proper to renew the action. None of them answered explicitly that it was not, some replied that it was inexpedient to delay the business—two only were for fighting.

RAISED TO THE RANK OF REAR-ADMIRAL.

Before the action was known in England, Nelson had been advanced to the rank of Rear-Admiral. The Order of the Bath was now conferred on him. Amongst the numerous congratulations which he received, none can have affected him with deeper delight than a letter from his venerable father. "I thank God," says this excellent man, "with all the fervour of a grateful soul, for the mercies

He has most graciously bestowed on me in preserving you amid the imminent perils which so lately threatened your life at every moment. The height of glory to which your professional judgment, united with a proper degree of bravery guarded by Providence, has raised you, few sons, my dear child, attain to, and fewer fathers live to see. Tears of joy have involuntarily trickled down my furrowed cheeks. Who can stand the force of such general congratulation? The name and services of Nelson have sounded throughout the city of Bath, from the common ballad-singer to the public theatre."

AT THE BLOCKADE OF CADIZ—HIS EXPEDITION AGAINST TRINIDAD.

Sir Horatio, having shifted his flag to the Thesius, was now employed in the command of the inner squadron at the blockade of Cadiz. And here occurred one of the most perilous actions in which he was ever engaged. One night his barge got alongside of a large Spanish launch of twenty-six men. Nelson had only his ten barge-men, Captain Fremantle, and John Sykes, an old and faithful follower. The contest was desperate—hand-to-hand with cutlasses. Sykes twice saved the life of the Admiral by parrying the blows that were aimed at him, and at last interposed his own head to receive the stroke of a sabre which he could not by any other means avert. The whole of the Spaniards were killed or wounded, and Nelson brought off the launch.

He was less fortunate in an expedition which he led against the island of Tenerife; indeed, the enterprise utterly failed. Nelson was in the act of stepping out of the boat at the landing when he received a shot through the right elbow and fell. His son-in-law, Lieutenant Nisbet, who was close to him, placed him at the bottom of the boat. He then examined the wound, and taking some silk handkerchiefs from his neck bound them above the lacerated vessels. Had it not been for Nisbet's presence of mind, Nelson afterwards declared he must have perished.

Whilst rowing off to the Thesius, the Fox cutter received a shot under water and went down. Ninety even men sunk with her, and eighty-three were saved, many by Nelson himself, whose exertions on this occasion materially increased the pain and danger of his wound.

On reaching his own ship he peremptorily refused all assistance in getting on board, so impatient was he that the boat should return in time that it might save a few more men from the Fox. He desired to have only a single rope thrown over the side, which he twisted round his left hand. "Let me alone," said he, "I have yet my legs left, and one arm. Tell the surgeon to make haste and get his instruments; I know I must lose my right arm, so the sooner it is off the better." The spirit which he displayed in jumping up the ship's side astonished every one.

Nelson in his official dispatches makes no mention of his own wound; but in a private letter to Lord St. Vincent, the first which he penned with his left hand, he shows himself to have been deeply affected by the failure of this expedition.

But honours enough awaited him in England to heal his wounded spirit. The freedom of the cities of London and Bristol were transmitted to him, and he was awarded a pension of £1000. The requisite memorial of his services stated that he had been four times engaged with fleets, and no less than one hundred and twenty times in action; he had assisted at the capture of seven sail-of-the-line, six frigates, four corvettes, eleven privateers, and taken or destroyed nearly fifty sail of merchant vessels.

When his health was restored, with that pious feeling which formed a leading feature of his character, he transmitted a note of thanks to the minister of St. George's, Hanover Square: "An officer desires to return thanks to Almighty God for his perfect recovery from a severe wound, and also for the many mercies bestowed on him."

ON BOARD THE "VANGUARD."

Early in the ensuing year, Sir Horatio hoisted his flag in the Vanguard, and was ordered to rejoin Earl St. Vincent. Upon his departure his father addressed him with that affectionate solemnity which marks all his letters:—"I trust in the Lord," said he, "that He will prosper your going out and your coming in. I earnestly desired once more to see you, and that wish has been heard. If I should presume to say I hope again to see you, the question would be readily asked, How old are you?—Vale, Vale!"

A gloomy foreboding, it is said, hung on the spirits of Lady Nelson at their parting: this, of course, can only have been a fear of losing him by the chances of war; no apprehension of losing his affection could possibly have existed, for all his letters at this time evince that he considered himself happy in his marriage, and his private character had hitherto been as spotless as his public life. One of the last things he said to her was that his own ambition was satisfied, but he went to raise her to that rank in which he had long wished to see her.

Immediately on his rejoining Earl St. Vincent, he was dispatched to the Mediterranean that he might ascertain if possible the object of the great expedition fitting out at Toulon. The first news he received of this armament was that it had surprised Malta. It was clear that the destination was eastward, and he thought, Egypt: for Egypt therefore he made all sail. He reached Alexandria, but the enemy were not there; and he returned to Sicily without obtaining any news of them.

Through the secret agency of Sir William Hamilton, at that time ambassador at Naples, he obtained requisite supplies, and renewed his search. At last he resolved on again revisiting Alexandria, where on the forenoon of the 1st August, 1798, he saw the French fleet at anchor in Aboukir Bay.

For many preceding days Nelson had hardly taken either sleep or food; he now ordered his dinner to be served while preparations were making for battle; and when his officers rose from table and went to their separate stations, he said to them, "Before this time to-morrow I shall have gained a peerage or Westminster Abbey."

THE BATTLE OF THE NILE.

The advantage of numbers alike in ships, guns, and men was in favour of the French. They had thirteen ships-of-the-line and four frigates, carrying 1,196 guns and 11,230 men. The English had the same number of ships-of-the-line, carrying 1,012 guns and 8,068 men.

Nelson's plan was to double upon the French and anchor his ships one on the outer bow and another on the outer quarter of each ship of the enemy as far as his force would extend. Captain Berry, when he comprehended the scope of this design, exclaimed with transport, "If we succeed what will the world say?" "There is no if in the case," replied the Admiral. "That we shall succeed is certain. Who may live to tell the story is a very different question."

As the squadron advanced, the enemy opened a steady fire, from the starboard side of their whole line, full into the bows of our van-ships. It was received in silence; on board of every ship the crew were employed aloft in furling sails, and below in tending the braces and making ready for anchoring.

At length, when anchored, mostly by the stern, the English opened a most destructive fire. Nelson had six colours flying in different parts of his rigging, lest they should be shot away—that they should be struck no British admiral considers as a possibility. The whole of the ships being judiciously placed, the battle raged with the utmost fury. Unfortunately the Culloden got fast a ground, and though she served as a beacon to other ships entering the bay, it was impossible for her to be of use in the fight. Before the whole fleet had anchored it was quite dark.

The first two ships of the French line were dismasted within a quarter of an hour after the action began, and the others had suffered so severely that victory was already certain; the third, fourth, and fifth were taken possession of at half-past eight. Meanwhile Nelson received a severe wound on the head from a piece of langridge shot; the skin of his forehead was stripped away and hung down over his face. The great effusion of blood caused an apprehension that the wound was mortal. Nelson was carried below and the surgeon hurried to examine him. "No, no," exclaimed he, "I will take my turn with my brave fellows."

When he had at last been looked to, and the wound had been pronounced not mortal, the utmost joy prevailed. The wound was dressed, and Nelson sat down and began the official letter which appeared in the Gazette.

Suddenly a cry was heard on deck that the Orient, the largest of the French ships, carrying the flag of Admiral Bruceys, was on fire. In the confusion, Nelson found his way up, and to the astonishment of every one appeared on the quarter-deck, when he immediately gave orders that boats should be sent to the relief of the enemy.

It was soon after nine that the fire on board the Orient broke out. Bruceys was dead. He had received three different wounds, yet would not leave his post; a fourth cut him almost in two: he desired not to be carried below, but to be left to die upon deck. The flames soon mastered the ship. By the prodigious light of this conflagration the situation of the two fleets could now be perceived, the colours being clearly distinguishable. About ten the Orient blew up; the tremendous explosion was followed by a silence not less awful—the firing instantaneously ceased on both sides, and the first sound was the fall of her shattered masts and yards, which had been carried to a vast height.

The cannonading was partially continued till three in the morning, when it ceased, leaving the English in possession of nine French ships-of-the-line. The victory was the most complete and glorious in the annals of naval history. "Victory," said Nelson, "is not a name strong enough for such a scene." He therefore called it a conquest. The loss of the English in killed and wounded was 895; that of the French 5225; the rest, including the wounded, were sent on shore.

Nelson was now at his height of glory; congratulations, rewards, and honours were showered upon him by all the states, princes, and powers to whom this victory gave a respite. In England he was created Baron Nelson of the Nile and of Burnham Thorpe, with a pension of £2000 for his own life and that of his two immediate successors. The East India Company presented him with £10,000, and various other gifts were received from different bodies in England; whilst rich presents were bestowed by Turkey, Sicily, Naples, Sardinia, etc.

ON THE NEAPOLITAN COASTS—LADY HAMILTON— IN THE BALTIC.

From this time Nelson remained chiefly employed on the Neapolitan coasts, during which period he sanctioned that which must ever remain a blot on his character, and which tarnished the honour of the British flag—the execution of the aged Prince Caraccioli.

This was a nobleman, nearly seventy years old, and of an unblemished reputation, who was highly beloved by the Neapolitans, as an excellent officer, having been long at the head of their marine service. This respectable man accompanied the royal family to Sicily; but when the new republic was established, and an edict was issued, decreeing that those who did not return within a limited time should forfeit their estates, Caraccioli unfortunately thought it prudent to hasten back to Naples, to preserve his patrimony. There he was soon solicited to take the command of the navy, as he was greatly esteemed by the seamen; and with this request he was induced to comply, most probably from the fear of incurring the resentment of those who had everything at their disposal, and who could, of course, in a moment have deprived him of his property and his life.

Caraccioli, perceiving that his destruction was determined upon, and seeing that the English commander had violated the only means by which his life could have been saved, endeavoured to effect his escape in disguise. The distribution of money, however, among the peasantry, and the offer of ample rewards for the apprehension of the proscribed revolutionists, quickly brought this venerable old man within the grasp of those who thirsted for his blood. He was taken in the disguise of a peasant, and hurried on board Nelson's own ship; which thus became, by a most unnatural act, a jail for the imprisonment of those who were neither subject to our laws nor could be brought from their own shores to be confined there, without manifest injustice.

Within an hour from the time that this poor old man was brought on board the Foudroyant, a court-martial of Sicilian officers, the president of which was his determined enemy, assembled in that ship by the orders of Lord Nelson, to try the subject of another state for treason. That Caraccioli was found guilty by this junta, who had no authority for what they did, was a matter of course. He received sentence of death, the report of which being communicated to the British admiral, he signed the warrant for its being carried into effect the same evening, by hanging the prisoner at the yard-arm, on board a Sicilian frigate.

Capua and Gaëta now surrendered to the naval force under Nelson's orders. In February 1800, Nelson sailed for Malta, and captured the French ship-of-the-line Généreux, which escaped from Aboukir, and also a frigate.

On Lord Keith's return from England, Nelson came home, leaving Captain Troubridge in command of the squadron blockading Malta, which island capitulated in September 1800. Within three months after his return he separated from Lady Nelson, in consequence of his infatuated attachment to Lady Hamilton. This was a woman of questionable antecedents but perilous fascination, the wife of the British ambassador at Naples, with whom he was unhappily thrown into contact. The influence which she now obtained over him she continued to the end to exercise. That to the charms of an impure adventuress he sacrificed the wife to whom he had been tenderly devoted, is one of the saddest instances on record of the fatal influence of beauty. Let us compassionate the one frailty of a man in all else as gentle and generous as he was brave.

The character of Lady Hamilton is thus sketched in Mr. Clarke's Life of Nelson :—

"Emma Lady Hamilton, one of the most extraordinary women of the age, amidst all her faults, was greatly noted for her general attention and hospitality. In the voluptuous court of the Sicilian monarch, her fascinating person commanded a very powerful influence; but in a situation of so much delicacy and danger, she never forgot the character that was expected from the wife of an English ambassador, nor was deficient in any of those courtesies and friendly attentions which mark a liberal and humane disposition. From the arrival of the British squadron at Naples, she had exerted herself to support that good cause for which Admiral Nelson had been detached; and having in this respect rendered some service, the natural vanity of her mind led her to imagine, and to endeavour to make the noble admiral and others believe, that from her alone proceeded the means of performing those great events which threw such a splendour on the favourite object of her idolatry. Her leading passion was the love of celebrity: and it was this passion, added to the above delusion, which gradually brought on that fatal and highly-wrought attachment which she formed for the hero of Aboukir; for it was the hero, and not the individual, who had captivated her glowing imagination. Its ardour, as it increased, overpowered the natural kindness of her disposition, and eventually involved her in an endless succession of private altercation and public disappointment."

Nelson's life at this time, surrounded though he was by all the outward marks of popularity and success, was far from satisfactory. The 29th of September, the anniversary of his birth, when he completed his fortieth year, was celebrated with extraordinary splendour by Sir William and Lady Hamilton. At an expense of two thousand ducats, they entertained upwards of seventeen hundred of the nobility and gentry of Naples with a ball and supper, all the arrangements of which, as he himself remarked, were enough to fill him with vanity. "Every ribbon, every button, has Nelson, etc. The whole service is marked H. N., Glorious 1st of August." In spite of all this homage his mind could not reconcile itself to the general character and politics of the Neapolitans. Before his arrival he had written to the Commander-in-Chief, "I detest this voyage to Naples; nothing but absolute necessity could force me to the measure." Again, on the 30th September, he says, "What precious moments the courts of Naples and Vienna are losing! Three months would liberate Italy; but this court is so enervated that the happy moment will be lost. I am very unwell, and the miserable conduct of this court is not likely to cool my irritable temper. It is a country of fiddlers, poets, and scoundrels." Subsequent events furnished but too complete a justification of this seemingly harsh judgment.

A remarkable instance of the folly into which great men can fall when they suffer themselves to be led away from the path of duty by the allurements of pleasure, happened just about this time. One of Nelson's favourite amusements was to go about the streets in disguise, accompanied by Lady Hamilton, who could adopt any character and perform it to great advantage. Having taken a cheerful glass on a fine evening, he proposed to Lady Hamilton to have a ramble about the city; which was acceded to, and they accordingly sallied forth, laughing at all they met, but without being known until they entered a house of entertainment, where a party of English officers were enjoying themselves with their ladies. Here our hero and his friend indulged in the humours of the place, thinking that they were undiscovered ; but it chanced that the boatswain of the Foudroyant looked into the room with a midshipman, and recognised the admiral. The boatswain being a man of pleasant manners and genteel address, contrived to watch his Lordship and his companion from place to place, till they reached the ambassador's house, after which, the two shipmates, out of frolic, went to court, which was very easy of access to British officers. There the boatswain attracted the notice of the king, who entered into conversation with him, which ended by conferring on the man one of the orders of knighthood. This afterwards became known to Lady Hamilton, who followed the unfortunate chevalier with inexorable vengeance ; and the admiral, at her instigation, turned the boatswain, notwithstanding his new dignity, before the mast ; but the midshipman escaped with a reprimand for having been a party in a frolic which, to say the most of it, was far from deserving censure, and least of all from those who had been guilty of exhibiting in their own conduct an unpardonable degree of levity and indiscretion.

IN THE BALTIC.

Nelson sailed, March 12th, 1801, as second in command to Sir Hyde Parker, to the Baltic, with a fleet of eighteen sail-of-the-line, frigates, bombes, fire-ships, etc., amounting in all to fifty-three sail, having on board the 49th regiment, two companies of rifles, and a detachment of artillery. The fleet arrived in the Sound, and after some time lost in negotiations by Mr. Vansittart, anchored between the island of Huen and Copenhagen. Lord Nelson having offered his services in the attack on the Danish fleet, he was detached with twelve ships-of-the-line and smaller craft, making thirty-six sail, on the 1st of April, 1801, and anchored at dark off Drægo Point, two miles from the Danish line.

THE BATTLE OF COPENHAGEN.

The battle of Copenhagen requires less detail than that of the Nile, though it made the talents of Nelson, if that be possible, yet more conspicuous. The Danes were admirably prepared for defence. Upwards of a hundred pieces of cannon were mounted upon the crown batteries at the entrance of the harbour ; and a line of twenty-five two-deckers, frigates, and floating batteries, stretched across its mouth.

A Dane who came on board during the ineffectual negotiations that preceded hostilities, having occasion to express his proposals in writing, found the pen blunt, and holding it up, sarcastically said, "If your guns are not better pointed than your pens, you will make little impression on Copenhagen." He and his countrymen relied on the fortifications of the Sound as their outpost ; but the Swedish batteries were silent, and the fleet passed without damage. The soundings were made under Nelson's own eye ; day and night he was in the boat, till his health had nearly sunk under the unremitting fatigue.

The action was fought on the 2nd of April. Nelson had with him twelve ships-of-the-line, with all the frigates and small craft ; the remainder of the fleet was with the Commander-in-Chief, about four miles off. Three of his squadron grounded ; and owing to the fears of the masters and pilots the anchors were let go nearly a cable's length from the enemy. Had they proceeded they would have deepened their water, and the victory would have been decided in half the time.

Of all the engagements in which Nelson had borne a part, this, he said, was the most terrible. It began at ten in the morning, and at one victory had not declared itself on either side. A shot through the main-mast knocked a few splinters about the Admiral. "It is warm work," he observed, "and this day may be the last to any of us at a moment. But mark you," said he, stopping short at the gangway, "I would not be elsewhere for thousands."

Just at this time Sir Hyde made signal for the action to cease. It was reported to him : he continued walking the deck, and appeared to take no notice of it. The signal lieutenant meeting him at the next turn, asked if he should repeat it. "No," replied Nelson, "acknowledge it." Presently he called after him to know if the signal for close action was still hoisted, and being answered in the affirmative, said to him, "Mind you keep it so."

He now walked the deck moving the stump of his right arm in a manner which always denoted great agitation. "Doctor, you know," said he, to the surgeon, "what's shown on board the Commander-in-Chief, No. 39!" He was asked what that meant. "Why, to leave off action!" then shrugging up his shoulders as he repeated the words "leave off action"—"No, d—n me if I do! You know, Foley," said he to the Captain, "I have only one eye. I have a right to be blind sometimes.—D—n the signal! hoist mine for closer battle ; that is the way I answer such signals—Nail mine to the mast!"

Admiral Graves disobeyed that of the Commander-in-Chief in like manner, whether intentionally or by a fortunate mistake has not been explained.

The squadron of frigates hauled off. At the moment the Amazon showed her stern to the enemy, Riou was killed; almost his last words had been an expression of regret at being obliged to retreat. "What," said he, "will Nelson think of us!"

About two, great part of the Danish line had ceased to fire, some of their lighter ships were adrift, and many had struck. It was, however, difficult to take possession of them, partly because they were protected by the batteries on Amak Island, and partly because an irregular fire was made on the English boats as they approached from the ships themselves, the Danes being able to recruit their crews from the shore. This irritated Nelson; "he must either," he said, "send on shore and stop these irregular proceedings, or send in fire-ships and burn the prizes." In this part of the battle the victory was complete, but the three ships ahead were still engaged and exposed to a superior force. Nelson, with a presence of mind peculiar to himself, seized this occasion to secure the advantage which he had already gained, and open a negotiation.

He therefore wrote thus to the Crown Prince: "Admiral Lord Nelson has directions to spare Denmark when she no longer resists. The line of defence which covered her shores has struck to the British flag; but if the firing is continued on the part of Denmark, he must be obliged to set on fire all the prizes that he has taken without having the power of saving the brave Danes who have defended them."

A wafer was brought him for this letter; he ordered wax and a candle, saying, "It was no time to appear informal," and he affixed a larger seal than usual. Captain Frederick Thesiger was sent in with it. During his absence the remainder of the enemy's line eastward was silenced; the Crown batteries continued to fire till the Danish General Lindholm returned with a flag of truce, when the action closed, after four hours' continuance.

The message from the Prince was to inquire what was the object of Nelson's note? Nelson replied, "It was humanity;" he consented that hostilities should cease, and that the wounded Danes should be taken on shore, and he on his part would take his prisoners out of the vessels, and burn or carry off his prizes as he thought fit. He presented his humble duty to the Prince, saying "he should consider this the greatest victory he had ever gained if it might be the cause of a happy reconciliation between the two countries."

Having given this reply, he referred Lindholm to the Commander-in-Chief, and availed himself of the opportunity to get his ships out of the intricate channel from which had hostilities continued, they could not have disengaged themselves till the Crown batteries were destroyed. His proposal was accepted in the course of the evening, and a suspension agreed on for four-and-twenty hours, during which it was resolved that he should land and negotiate in person with the Prince.

Some difficulty occurred in adjusting the duration of the armistice. He required sixteen weeks, giving, like a seaman, the true reason, that he might have time to act against the Russian fleet and return. This not being acceded to, a hint was thrown out by one of the Danish commissioners of the renewal of hostilities. "Renew hostilities!" said he to one of his friends, for he understood French enough to comprehend what was said, though not to answer in the same language. "Tell him we are ready at a moment! ready to bombard this very night." Fourteen weeks were at length agreed to.

RAISED TO THE RANK OF VISCOUNT.

The death of Paul intervened, and the Northern Confederacy was destroyed. For this signal service, in which Nelson appeared not less conspicuous as a statesman than as an admiral, he was raised to the rank of Viscount. There was some, prudence, perhaps, in dealing out honours to him step by step—had he lived long enough he would have fought his way to a Dukedom.

When Britain was alarmed by preparations at Boulogne, Nelson was appointed to a squadron on that station. His attack upon the flotilla failed, because the divisions did not all arrive in time. The enemy's vessels were moored by the bottom to the shore and to each other with chains, and it was not possible to retain possession of those which struck, because as soon as this was attempted the French fired upon them, utterly regardless of their own men.

AFTER THE PEACE OF AMIENS.

The Peace of Amiens was concluded shortly afterwards; and when it was found equally incompatible with the honour and safety of this country to remain at peace with Bonaparte, Nelson went out as Commander-in-Chief to the Mediterranean.

We must pass on now to the concluding scene, the consummation of his labour and glory.

After having watched the Toulon fleet for nearly two years, ready at any time to give it battle with an inferior force, it escaped him, formed a junction with the Spaniards, and ran for the West Indies. With eight ships and three frigates, he pursued eighteen sail-of-the-line and six frigates with 12,000 troops on board. The mere terror of his name compelled them to fly before him ; false intelligence misled him, and they secured their return to Europe, whither they fled, without having accomplished any part of their purpose except that of reinforcing their own islands ; ours were preserved from pillage, invasion, and not improbable conquest by this pursuit, which is in all its circumstances unparalleled in naval history. Having pursued them to Europe, he delivered over his squadron to Admiral Cornwallis, lest they should make for Brest to liberate that fleet and place him between two fires : and then he returned to England, meaning to enjoy a little leisure with his friends.

He had not been at home a month when news arrived that the French fleet, now increased to thirty-four sail-of-the-line, had got safely into Cadiz.

When Captain Blackwood arrived at Merton with this news, Lord Nelson is stated to have treated it lightly, having no intention to go to sea again, and contenting himself with saying, "Let the man trudge it who has lost his budget." "But," observes one historian, "amid all this allegro of the tongue to his friends at Merton Place, Lady Hamilton observed that his countenance, from that moment, wore occasional marks of he penseroso in his bosom. In this state of mind he was pacing one of the walks of Merton garden, which he always called the quarter-deck, when Lady Hamilton told him that she perceived he was low and uneasy. He smiled and said,—"No ! I am as happy as possible ;" adding, that he saw himself surrounded by his family ; that he found his health better since he had been at Merton ; and that he would not give a sixpence to call the king his uncle. Her Ladyship replied that she did not believe what he said ; and that she would tell him what was the matter with him. That he was longing to get at those French and Spanish fleets ; that he considered them as his property, and would be miserable if any other man but himself did the business ; that he must have them as the price and reward of his long watching, and two years' uncomfortable situation in the Mediterranean ; and finished by saying, "Nelson, however we may lament your absence, and your so speedily leaving us, offer your services immediately, to go off Cadiz : they will be accepted, and you will gain a quiet heart by it. You will have a glorious victory ; and then you may come here, have your otium cum dignitate, and be happy." He looked at her Ladyship for some moments ; and, with tears in his eyes, exclaimed, "Brave Emma ! good Emma ! if there were more Emmas, there would be more Nelsons. You have penetrated my thoughts. I wish all you say, but was afraid to trust even myself with reflecting on the subject. However, I will go to town." He went accordingly, next morning, accompanied by her Ladyship and his sisters. They left him at the Admiralty, on the way to Lady Hamilton's house in Clarges Street ; and soon after received a note informing them that the Victory was telegraphed not to go into port, and begging they would prepare everything for his departure.

He reached Portsmouth only twenty-five days after he had left it ; numbers followed him to the shore, and many when they saw him embark knelt down and blessed him, a proof of public love of which perhaps our history affords no other example. The wind was against him, and blew strong ; nevertheless such was his impatience to be upon the scene of action that he worked down Channel, and after a rough passage arrived off Cadiz on his birthday, September 29th, 1805, on which very day the French Admiral, Villeneuve, received orders to put to sea on the first opportunity.

THE BATTLE OF TRAFALGAR.

From this time till the 21st of October, when the battle of Trafalgar was fought, Nelson never came in sight of land ; he feared that if the enemy knew his force they would not venture out, notwithstanding their superiority. This was the case ; Villeneuve had called a council of war on hearing that Nelson had taken the command ; and their determination was not to leave Cadiz unless they had reason to believe themselves one-third stronger than the British force. Many circumstances tended to deceive them into such an opinion, and an American contributed unintentionally to mislead them by declaring that Nelson could not possibly be with the fleet, for he himself had seen him only a few days before in London.

Relying upon this and upon their superiority, which was in truth sufficiently great, though they imagined it greater than it was, in an unhappy hour they sailed out from Cadiz. On the 19th the signal was made that they were at sea. In the afternoon of the next day it was signified that they seemed determined to go to the westward ; "and that," said Nelson in his Journal, "they shall not do, if it be in the power of Nelson and Bronte to prevent them."

He had previously arranged his plan of attack. The order of sailing was to be the order of battle ; the fleet in two lines of sixteen ships, with an advanced squadron of eight, the fastest sailing two-deckers. The second in command, having the entire charge of his line, was to break through the enemy; about the twelfth ship from the rear he would lead through the centre; and the advanced squadron was to cut off three or four ahead of the centre. They were so to proportion this to the strength of the enemy, that they should always be one-fourth superior to those whom they cut off. The only difference to this plan on the day of action was that the fleet bore up by signal in two columns.

The British force consisted of twenty-seven sail-of-the-line. The enemy's was thirty-three, and their superiority was greater in size and weight of metal than in numbers—4,000 troops were on board, and the best riflemen who could be selected were dispersed through the fleet.

The plan of defence was as original as that of attack. The ships of the enemy were formed in a double line, every alternate ship being about a cable's length to windward of her second ahead and astern.

Nelson never went into battle without a full sense of its dangers, and always seems rather to have prepared his mind for death than to have banished the thought of it. On the morning of the 21st he wrote a prayer in his Journal, followed by an extraordinary memoir, in which he solemnly bequeathed Lady Hamilton as a legacy to his king and country. He left also to the beneficence of his country his adopted daughter, desiring she would use in future his name only. This memoir we give here in full:—

"Whereas the eminent services of Emma Hamilton, widow of the Right Honourable Sir William Hamilton, have been of the very greatest service to our king and country, to my knowledge, without her receiving any reward from either our king or country:

"First, that she obtained the King of Spain's letter, in 1796, to his brother the King of Naples, acquainting him of his inclination to declare war against England; from which letter the ministry sent out orders to the then Sir John Jervis, to strike a stroke, if opportunity afforded, against either the armaments of Spain, or her fleets: that neither of these was done, is not the fault of Lady Hamilton; the opportunity might have been offered.

"Secondly, the British fleet under my command could never have returned the second time to Egypt, had not Lady Hamilton's influence with the Queen of Naples caused letters to be wrote to the governor of Syracuse, that he was to encourage the fleet being supplied with everything, should they put into any port in Sicily. We put into Syracuse, and received every supply; went to Egypt, and destroyed the French fleet.

"Could I have rewarded these services, I would not now call upon my country. But as that has not been in my power, I leave Emma Hamilton, therefore, a legacy to my king and country; that they will give her an ample provision to maintain her rank in life.

"I also leave to the beneficence of my country, my adopted daughter, Horatia Nelson Thompson, and I desire she will use, in future, the name of Nelson only.

"These are the only favours I ask of my king and country, at this moment, when I am going to fight their battle.

"May God bless my king and country, and all those I hold dear! My relations it is needless to mention; they will, of course, be amply provided for."

He had put on the coat which he always wore in action, and kept for that purpose with a degree of veneration: it bore the insignia of all his orders. "In honour I gained them," he said, "and in honour I will die with them."

When it was certain that the enemy could not avoid an engagement, he became highly animated, saying he should not be content with less than twenty of them.

Captain Blackwood was walking with him on the poop when Nelson asked him if he did not think there was a signal wanting. The Captain replied, he "thought the whole of the fleet seemed very clearly to understand what they were about." He had, however, scarcely spoken, before the signal was made, which will be remembered as long as the language and the name of England shall endure—Nelson's last signal—"England expects that every man will do his duty." It was received with a shout throughout the fleet, an answering acclamation, made sublime by the feeling which it conveyed. "Now," said Nelson, "I can do no more. We must trust to the great Disposer of all events and the justice of our cause. I thank God for this great opportunity of doing my duty."

Captain Blackwood, being about to return to his ship, took him by the hand, saying he "hoped soon to return and find him in possession of his twenty prizes." He replied, "God bless you, Blackwood; I shall never see you again."

As usual, Nelson hoisted several flags, that they might not be shot away. The enemy showed no colours till late in the action, when they began to feel the necessity of having them to strike. The Santissima Trinidad, Nelson's old acquaintance as he used to call her, was therefore only distinguished by her four decks; to the bow of this opponent he ordered the Victory to be steered.

It was not possible to break the enemy's line without running on board one of their ships. Before this could be done, and before the victors fired a shot, fifty of her men were killed or wounded, and her mizen top-mast, with all her studding sail, and their bows on both sides, shot away. In this state she ran on board the Redoutable, which, firing her broadsides into the English flagship, instantly let down her lower deck ports for fear of being boarded through them.

Captain Harvey, in the Téméraire, fell on board the Redoutable on the other side; another ship in like manner was on board the Téméraire, so that these four ships, in the heat of battle, formed as compact a tier as if they had been moored together, their heads all lying the same way. The lieutenants of the Victory immediately depressed their guns and fired with a diminished charge, lest their shot should pass through and injure the Téméraire; and because there was danger that the enemy's ships might take fire from the guns of the lower deck, whose muzzles touched her side when they were run out, the firemen of each gun stood ready with a bucket of water, which, as soon as the gun was discharged, he dashed at the hole made in her sides by the shot. The Victory passed astern so as to play upon the Bucentaure, Villeneuve's ship, and the Santissima Trinità, with her larboard guns, and upon the Redoutable from the other side.

THE DEATH OF NELSON.

In the prayer which Nelson wrote before the action, he prays that humanity after victory might distinguish the British flag. Setting an example himself, he twice gave orders to cease firing upon the Redoutable, supposing that she had struck, because her great guns were silent; and as she carried no flag, there was no means of ascertaining the fact.

From this ship, whose destruction was twice delayed by his wish to spare the enemy, he received his death. A ball, fired from her mizen top, struck the epaulette on his left shoulder: he fell with his face on the deck. "They have done for me at last, Hardy," said he, "my backbone is shot through." Yet not for a moment losing his presence of mind, he observed, as they were carrying him down the ladder, that the tiller ropes were not yet replaced, and ordered that new ones should be rove immediately; and that he might not be seen by the crew he took out his handkerchief and covered his face with it, and the insignia upon his coat. Had he but concealed them from the enemy, England perhaps would not have received with sorrow the tidings of the battle of Trafalgar.

Certain, by the sensation in his back and the gush of blood which he felt every minute within his breast, that no human aid could avail him, after the wound had been probed, he ordered the surgeon to return to the wounded and assist those to whom his services could be useful, "for," said he, "you could do nothing for me." The pain he suffered was so severe that he wished himself dead. "Yet," said he in a lower tone, "one would like to live a little longer too;" doubtless that he might hear the completion of the victory which he had seen so gloriously begun.

His thoughts now fluctuated wholly between his glory and his love. "I am going fast," said he; "it will be all over with me soon. Let my dear Lady Hamilton have my hair, and all other things belonging to me." Afterwards he observed, "What would become of poor Lady Hamilton if she knew my situation!"

Upon inquiring how many ships had struck and hearing fourteen or fifteen certainly, but it was impossible as yet to ascertain, "That's well," said he, "but I bargained for twenty;" and then he emphatically exclaimed, "Anchor, Hardy, anchor!" To this the Captain replied that he supposed Admiral Collingwood would now take upon himself the direction of affairs. "Not while I live, Hardy," cried the dying Nelson, intellectually endeavouring to raise himself from the bed; "no, do you anchor, Hardy."

Presently, calling Hardy back, he said to him in a low voice, "Don't throw me overboard," and desired that he might be buried by his father and mother, unless it should please the King to order otherwise. "Kiss me, Hardy," said he. Hardy knelt down and kissed his cheek, and Nelson said, "Now I am satisfied. I have done my duty. Thank God! I have done my duty." These words he repeatedly pronounced, and they were the last which he uttered.

NATIONAL SORROW.

The death of Nelson was felt in England as something more than a public calamity. Men started at the news and turned pale, as if they had heard of the death of a dear friend. An object of admiration and affection, of pride and hope, was suddenly removed, and it seemed as if people had never till then known how deeply they loved and revered him. What the country lost in its great naval hero, the greatest of all English history, was scarcely taken into the account of grief. So perfectly indeed had he performed his part, that the maritime war might from that day be considered at an end : the fleets of the enemy were not merely defeated, but destroyed ; new navies must be built, and a new race of seamen reared for them, before the possibility of their invading our shores could again be contemplated.

"It was not," says Southey in his Life of Nelson, "from any selfish reflection upon the magnitude of our loss that we mourned for him : the general sorrow was of a higher character. The people of England grieved that funeral ceremonies, and public monuments, and posthumous rewards were all which they could now bestow upon him whom the king, the legislature, and the nation would have alike delighted to honour ; whom every tongue would have blessed ; whose presence in every village through which he might have passed would have wakened the church-bells, have given school-boys a holiday, have drawn children from their sports to gaze upon him, and 'old men from the chimney corner' to look upon Nelson ere they died. The victory of Trafalgar was celebrated, indeed, with the usual forms of rejoicing, but they were without joy ; for such already was the glory of the British navy, through Nelson's surpassing genius, that it scarcely seemed to receive any addition from the most signal victory that ever was achieved upon the seas : and the destruction of this mighty fleet, by which all the maritime schemes of France were totally frustrated, hardly appeared to add to our security or strength ; for, while Nelson was living, to watch the combined squadrons of the enemy, we felt ourselves as secure as now, when they were no longer in existence.

"There was reason to suppose, from the appearances upon opening the body, that, in the course of nature, he might have attained, like his father, to a good old age. Yet he cannot be said to have fallen prematurely whose work was done ; nor ought he to be lamented who died so full of honours, and at the height of human fame. The most triumphant death is that of the martyr : the most awful that of the martyred patriot ; the most splendid that of the hero in the hour of victory : and if the chariot and the horses of fire had been vouchsafed for Nelson's translation, he could scarcely have departed in a brighter blaze of glory. He has left us, not indeed his mantle of inspiration, but a name and an example which are at this hour inspiring thousands of the youth of England ; a name which is our pride, and an example which will continue to be our shield and our strength. Thus it is that the spirits of the great and the wise continue to live and to act after them."

The testamentary papers of his lordship were proved in Doctors' Commons, on the 23rd of December, 1805, by his brother, Earl Nelson, and William Haslewood, Esquire, the executors. In his will, dated May 10th, 1803, he directed that, in case of his dying in England, he should be buried in the parish church of Burnham Thorpe, by the side of his deceased father and mother, and in as private a manner as might be, unless His Majesty should signify it to be his pleasure that his body should be interred elsewhere. After specifying some minor bequests to his relations and friends, he directed that the residue of his personal estates and effects, with certain exceptions, should be turned into money, and invested in the funds so as to afford a clear yearly income of £1,000 to his wife, in addition to all former provisions made for her, and in addition to the sum of £4,000 lately given to her. The estate and dukedom of Bronte he limited in such a manner as to accompany the barony of Nelson, with which limitations the new titles of Earl and Viscount Nelson of Trafalgar and of Merton were made to correspond. The insignia of the various Orders with which he was invested, were to be transmitted in the nature of heir-looms to the successive possessors of the barony and dukedom. To Lady Hamilton he gave his house and furniture at Merton, with seventy acres of the land belonging to it, to revert, after her death, to his lordship's right heirs, and the residuary estate he bequeathed in equal thirds to his brother and his two sisters.

To this will were added seven codicils, all, excepting the first, which relates to the bequests to Lady Hamilton, in the handwriting of Nelson himself. The second gave to his adopted daughter, Horatia Nelson Thompson, the sum of £4,000, to be paid six months after his decease, or sooner if possible, and he left his dearest friend, Emma Lady Hamilton, her sole guardian, till she should attain the age of eighteen years. "This request of guardianship," he says, "I earnestly make to Lady Hamilton, knowing that she will educate my adopted child in the paths of religion and virtue, and give her those accomplishments which so much adorn herself, and I hope make her a fit wife for my dear nephew, Horatio Nelson, who I wish to marry her, if he should prove worthy, in Lady Hamilton's estimation, of such a treasure as I am sure she will be." In subsequent codicils he gave to Lady Hamilton the net yearly sum of £500 to be paid out of the rental of his estate at Bronte, the sum of £2,000 and all his hay at Merton, and he desired that the annual sum of £100 might continue to be paid to the widow of his brother, Maurice.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

"Well for the whole, if there be found a man
Who makes himself what nature destined him.
The pause, the central point to thousand thousands,— Stands fixed and stately, like a firm-built column,
Where all may press with joy and confidence."—SCHILLER.

THE DUKE'S POSITION AMONG THE ENGLISH NATION.

"THE great space which the name of the Duke of Wellington has filled in the history of the last fifty years, his brilliant achievements in the field, his high mental qualities, his long and faithful services to the Crown, his untiring devotion to the interests of his country, constitute claims upon the gratitude of the nation which a public funeral, though it cannot satisfy, at least may serve to recognise.'

These lines occur in an official letter indited at Balmoral by the great Earl of Derby, the "Rupert of Debate," at that time Prime Minister of England. It was written, this official letter, on no ordinary occasion, and was intended for publication in the press throughout the country, that England might know how the Sovereign valued the services and regretted the loss of an illustrious subject, who, long bowed beneath the weight of years and honours, had just passed to his rest.

For, on the evening of the 14th September, 1852, a rumour ran through London that "the Duke" was dead. The report was at first received with incredulity, for there had been no previous intimation that the grand old hero was sick. That good, grey head, bent and feeble with age, was so well known among all classes in London, and in the neighbourhood of that fortress on the pleasant Kentish shore, where the old Warden of the Cinque Ports, amid surroundings of Spartan simplicity, sat working day by day, even when he had passed, by twelve years, the allotted threescore and ten years of human life—that at first it seemed scarcely possible the old familiar face would now be seen no longer among the living. The event seemed to come upon the public by surprise; and men suddenly paused to think how great a figure it was that was suddenly withdrawn from the stage of the world.

But when the morning brought confirmation of the news, and it was known that the Duke of Wellington had died at Walmer, after a few hours' illness, the general sense of loss manifested itself everywhere. The newspapers appeared for several days with mourning borders; in the Thames the vessels had their flags half-mast high; the church bells tolled, and many persons put on mourning. Since that day, nearly half a century before, when the glorious news of Trafalgar came, saddened by the tidings of the death of Nelson, no such general feeling of sorrow had been felt for a public man; no such general sense that a Prince had fallen in Israel. The Duke had become interwoven with the life of his time. In the army, in the senate, in society, his presence was potent. It was felt that a wise voice was silenced for ever in the councils of the nation; and at a time, too, when wisdom and experience could ill be spared. For the second French Empire had just been set up, and in the direction of Russia there was arising a cloud, no bigger than a man's hand, that was soon to darken all the horizon with the thunder-storm of war. It was everywhere felt that in the life just ended, in the fulness of years and honours, was embodied the tremendous conflict against the mightiest soldier the world had ever seen. The history of that eventful period, in which England alone of the nations of Europe could boast that her soil had remained unprofaned by the footsteps of a foreign foe, all the remembrances of that time seemed to come back across the vista of almost forty years; and amid the first flush of exultation over his victories, the name of the Duke had hardly been so much a household word as when that glorious life, useful and active to the last, had appropriately closed, in the old sixteenth-century stronghold, where he commanded as Warden.

THE WELLESLEY FAMILY; SCHOOLDAYS AND YOUTH OF ARTHUR WELLESLEY.

Arthur Wellesley, the hero of the Napoleonic era, was the third son of the Earl of Mornington, an Irish nobleman, chiefly remembered for his musical taste, and as the author of the popular glee, "Here in Cool Grot." The family name, Wellesley, or, as it was originally spelt, Wesley, had been adopted on the succession of the Earl's father, in 1728, to the estates of Gerald Wesley, Esq. Under their former name of Colley or Cowley, Arthur Wellesley's ancestors had removed to Ireland from Rutlandshire in the time of Henry VIII. It was on the old Wellesley estate, at Dangan Castle, county Meath, that Arthur Wellesley was born, in March 1769. His mother, who is said to have been exceedingly clever, was a daughter of Lord Dungannon. He received his education at Eton, and must, we should think, have been just the youth who would thoroughly enjoy himself at a public school—strong, active, with excellent health and indomitable pluck, thoroughly able to take his own part. In those days the army was looked upon as offering a favourable field for young men of aristocratic family and moderate abilities; and as young Arthur was known to possess one and supposed to possess the other of these qualifications, while he was considered to be destitute of the talent required for University distinction, he was destined for the army; and to give him some preliminary knowledge of things martial, he was sent to a military college at Angers, in France; and in March 1787, being then eighteen years of age, was gazetted to an ensigncy in the 73rd Regiment.

ARTHUR WELLESLEY BECOMES A SOLDIER ; BIRTH AND PATRONAGE ; RAPID PROMOTION.

In those days of purchase and patronage, a youth of the social rank of Arthur Wellesley, or Wcsley, as he continued to write his name, seldom lingered long on the lower steps of the ladder of promotion. The young officer's advance was certainly rapid. In nine months he was a lieutenant in the 76th Regiment, whence he exchanged, first into the 41st Foot, and afterwards into the 12th Light Dragoons. He was only twenty-two years old when, in 1791, he got his captaincy in the 58th Foot. A few months afterwards he exchanged into a crack cavalry regiment, the 18th Light Dragoons. In time of peace, in those days of purchase and exchange, family interest, rank, and money, were the things that decided promotion. All these young Arthur Wellesley possessed, and very fortunately for him he had mounted all the lower steps of the ladder by these easy means when the breaking out of the great war opened a field for his genius. By that time, 1793, the aristocratic young soldier had mounted two more steps: he had become major in the 33rd Foot, and now, at twenty-four years of age, was lieutenant-colonel of that corps. He had, moreover, already sat in the Irish Parliament for three years, and had been aide-de-camp to the Earl of Westmorland, the Lord Lieutenant.

The first scene of war in which young Colonel Wellesley was called upon to take part was not exactly one of victory. When, in 1791, the French Republic had determined to hold its own in battle against the nations of Europe, William Pitt, who then swayed the destinies of England, determined to join in the fray, for the upholding of tottering thrones against the spread of democracy. An army was despatched into Holland, under the Duke of York, the second son of George III., and a second, under Lord Moira, was sent, via Ostend, to assist him.

THE DUKE OF YORK'S ARMY; WELLESLEY'S FIRST SERVICES.

The strength and spirit of the enemy had been grievously underrated. "One Englishman can beat five Frenchmen at any time," says Goldsmith's disabled soldier; and the expedition to Holland seems to have been organized on this somewhat over-sanguine theory. The troops of the Duke of York were everywhere discomfited, and after enduring hardships and disasters of every kind, were forced to re-embark for England, with sadly diminished numbers, and no great accession of fame. At home the failure excited anger as well as ridicule; and that wicked wag Gillray, the caricaturist, perpetrated a horrible cartoon, in which the Duke of York is depicted presenting the keys of Paris to his illustrious father, in the presence of the assembled court: the old king, starting up eagerly from his throne, with outstretched hands to grasp the prize, exclaiming, "What, what—what! Keys of Paris! Keys of Paris! Give us hold, give us hold. It's Veni, vidi, vici, with you, lad. Hey, hey, hey!" Though it was certainly not Veni, vidi, vici with young Colonel Wellesley any more than with his commander, he contrived in this disastrous campaign to show what stuff he was made of. At Schyn del, with his gallant 33rd, he drove back an advancing column of the enemy with great loss; at Meteren he forced a confident body of Republicans to abandon a meditated attack; and at Geldermalsen maintained his position in the face of a far superior force of the enemy. He returned to England with the reputation of a gallant and promising officer.

COLONEL WELLESLEY IN INDIA ; CAPTURE OF SERINGAPATAM.

A prospect very different from the failure "upon the fields of Flanders" was opened to Arthur Wellesley in 1796, when the 33rd was ordered to India. Voyages to India in those days were slow affairs; and in almost every case a call was made at that convenient half-way house, the Cape of Good Hope. Thus the 33rd took ten months to get to Calcutta, arriving there, with its lieutenant-colonel, in February 1797.

The next year the Governor-General, Lord Mornington, Colonel Wellesley's elder brother, became aware of a dangerous conspiracy, that threatened the very existence of English rule in India. Tippoo, Sultan of Mysore, the treacherous son of Hyder Ali, "the tiger," had revived the favourite dream of the disaffected native princes "to drive the English into the sea," and, moreover, intended to achieve his purpose by the old means, the help of the French.

General Harris, who commanded the operations against Tippoo, warmly acknowledged in his reports to Lord Mornington the valuable assistance he received from Colonel Wellesley, who was soon after placed in command of one of the three divisions of the army that advanced upon Seringapatam to punish the rebellious son of Hyder Ali. At Sedaseer Tippoo was put to flight after a brave resistance. At Mullavelly he was for the second time defeated, the infantry under Colonel Wellesley bearing the brunt of the battle, which was decided by a bayonet charge of the famous "thirty-third." At Seringapatam, the capital, he lost his life. The city was besieged, and taken by storm; and here again, the commander of the operations, General Harris, and his coadjutor, General Baird, were indebted to the judgment, coolness, and gallantry of Colonel Wellesley, who was placed by Harris in command of the fortress after its capture.

Colonel Wellesley had been brought very prominently forward—and he was the Governor-General's brother. It was not to be wondered at that these two facts were represented by the disappointed as closely bearing upon each other. Lord Mornington thereupon wrote to General Harris to clear himself from any imputation of secret favouritism. "With respect to the language," he says, "which you say people have held of my brother's appointment to command in Seringapatam, you know that I never recommended my brother to you, and of course never suggested how, or where, he should be employed; and I believe you know, also, that you would not have pleased me by placing him in any situation in which his appointment would be injurious to the public service. My opinion, or rather knowledge and experience, of his discretion, judgment, temper, and integrity, are such, that if you had not placed him in Seringapatam, I would have done so of my own authority, because I think him in every point the most proper for that service."

SERVICES AGAINST DHOONDIA WAUGH AND THE MAHRATTAS; ASSAYE AND ARGAM.

The next year Colonel Wellesley had a brilliant opportunity of vindicating the sagacity of General Harris in his appointment. A Mahratta trooper, Dhoondia Waugh, liberated by the British from the dungeons of Seringapatam, where he had been captured by Tippoo, collected a large force from among the late Sultan's disbanded followers, called himself "the King of the two worlds," and by the adhesion of various discontented and warlike tribes, became truly formidable in a country where, at that time, rebellion was always smouldering. Wellesley put himself at the head of a small force, and after a persevering pursuit of Dhoondia for three months, over a difficult and hilly country, overtook and defeated him and his 5,000 horsemen at Conabgull, where the robber chief was slain.

A far greater field was, however, opening to Wellesley. It was against the Mahrattas that his name was first to obtain a world-wide celebrity. Three great chiefs of that nation, Scindiah, Holkar, and the Peishwa, had long been hostile to each other. The Peishwa, defeated and driven from his territories by a combination against him of the other two, applied to the British for succour. Major-General Wellesley (he had lately gained another step) was appointed to the command of a division, and took the strong fortress of Ahmednuggur, a very important position. Scindiah, the hostile Mahratta chief, with the Rajah of Berar, commanded an army of 38,000 cavalry and 18,000 infantry, with 200 pieces of artillery and 500 zamboraks, or camel guns. Wellesley and Colonel Stevenson agreed to divide their army, which consisted of about 17,000 men; intending to form a junction at a given point for a combined attack upon the enemy. Thus it was that, at the head of a force of 8,000 men, only 1,800 of whom were British, Wellesley suddenly found himself confronted by the whole hostile army, numbering nearly 60,000 men. Wellesley, moreover, had only seventeen guns to oppose to the hostile artillery. But here we have to notice that wonderful union of qualities that made the General what he was. His usual character was that of a cool, cautious man, rigid in calculating the peril of a movement, and not to be swayed or influenced by the excitement of the moment. But where a great thing was to be done, he could greatly dare; and he proved it in this his first grand conflict, the famous battle of Assaye.

The risk here was great, for Stevenson had not yet come up, and the hostile army was eight times the strength of his own. But science might counterbalance the inequality of numbers. The Mahrattas were stationed between two streams meeting at an angle. Wellesley saw at once that by taking up a position near the point of confluence of the streams, he might attack the enemy's infantry where the hostile cavalry could not manœuvre. He availed himself of the opportunity, and as the few guns he had were totally inadequate to cope with the enemy's heavy artillery, he captured the guns on the right by a bayonet charge. With respect to the masterly position he took up, the great commander afterwards said, "My doing this has been called a stroke of genius; I call it common sense." It was, indeed, to the perfection of common sense in Wellington's military career that a large amount of his success was due. The battle of Assaye, after a hard contest, ended in the complete triumph for the British, purchased, however, at a heavy price; more than a third of the attacking force being killed or wounded.

Scindiah was half ruined by the destruction of his army. Like Xerxes,

"He counted them at break of day,
And when the sun set, where were they?"

He now sued for peace, and an armistice was granted. But the restless Mahratta would not keep the conditions, and Wellesley inflicted a second defeat on him at Argaum, on the 28th November, 1803, from which he never recovered. The storming of the Fort of Gawilghur concluded the campaign most triumphantly, Scindiah and the Rajah of Berar both making their submission, and ceding large territories to the English.

RETURN TO ENGLAND; INJUSTICE OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY; PUBLIC SPIRIT OF WELLESLEY.

In March 1805, the successful General quitted the country to whose annals he had contributed so remarkable a page. A sword of honour, of the value of £1,000, presented by the inhabitants of Calcutta, a service of plate worth two thousand guineas from the officers, fêtes and addresses at Bombay, Madras, and elsewhere, testified to the estimation in which his deeds were held in India. But the Government of George III. gave him nothing beyond a knighthood of the Order of the Bath, which made him Sir Arthur Wellesley; and that eminently commercial corporation, the East India Company, ignored him altogether. "I have served the country in important situations for many years," wrote Wellesley to a friend, with very natural chagrin, "and have never received anything but injury from the Court of Directors, although there is not an instance on record, or in any private correspondence, of disapprobation of any one of my acts, or a single complaint, or even a symptom of ill temper, from any one of the political or civil authorities in communication with whom I have acted."

He left behind him a grand and glorious name in India. Just, humane, and vigilant, inflexible in maintaining discipline, quick in seeing and rewarding merit, and above all, imperturbable in the discharge of his duty, and alike unmoved by good or evil fortune, he was the very man in whose hands authority, in those troublous times, might be confidently and safely placed. He was thoroughly a soldier, never at a loss, never showing exhaustion of mind or body. He knew how to work—no man more,—but he could play too. "Not a man in his army," writes one of his companions, "seemed more devoid of care." Full of animation and urbanity, no reproving look checked the joke or suppressed the laugh of those about him. "Come away!" he would call out; and off he went at full speed after his gallant greyhounds, who commonly obtained much of his attention during a march,—and, game abounding, the General, and any officers not required to be with their regiments, who felt disposed to enjoy the coursing, were able to beguile the time with the exhilarating sport.

One great feature in his conduct, that showed itself already in India, and became more and more marked during his subsequent career, was his subordination of his own interests and predilections to the claims of duty. "I never have had much value," he says, in a letter written in March 1801, "for the public spirit of any man who does not sacrifice his private views and convenience when it is necessary."

OPERATIONS AGAINST DENMARK; WELLESLEY'S SERVICES.

The next undertaking upon which Sir Arthur Wellesley was employed was one which has left something like a stain on the character of the English Government of that day; though Wellesley is free from that stain, having simply carried out with eminent ability the commands laid upon him in his capacity as a general. It was the celebrated, or rather the notorious, expedition against Denmark.

Napoleon had roused the righteous anger of England by his insolent decree for the blockade of the British Isles, whereby all British produce, merchandise, and manufactured articles, and all property belonging to British owners, were declared prize of war. But Napoleon's power terminated with the land; over the sea he had no sway since the fatal day of Trafalgar. Denmark still possessed a fleet; and the British Government feared that this fleet would soon be a weapon in the hands of the French emperor, "that at his will he might do danger with;" and with Shakespeare's Brutus, the British Government added, "Then lest he should, prevent." Accordingly, without any warning or intimation, a large naval armament, having on board an army of 20,000 soldiers, was despatched to the Baltic; and the astonished Crown Prince was informed that the Danish fleet and material of war must be given up to the British, to be held by them until the conclusion of the contest, lest Napoleon should seize the ships and employ them for the subjugation of England. Naturally enough the Crown Prince protested, and refused compliance. The fleet had blockaded the island of Zealand; and after a three days' bombardment Copenhagen was obliged to surrender, and the Danish fleet was carried to England,—a striking instance that in spite of the advance of civilization, as applied to the usages of war, the old mediæval maxim had not yet become obsolete—that “those shall take who have the power, and they shall keep who can.”

The capital had surrendered; but the Danish Lieutenant-General Castenskiöld was still in the field with 14,000 men; and against him Sir Arthur Wellesley was detached with a force of some 5,000. But though his men were full of zeal, Castenskiöld did not at first think fit to give battle to Sir Arthur, but retreated from a very favourable position. When at last it came to a conflict the Danes were put to the rout almost at the first onset; and Wellesley gained great credit during the period that followed for the excellent discipline preserved among his troops, who paid for what they consumed, and even with the permission of the General helped the country people to get in their harvest,—many of the Danes having been compelled to quit their homes and join the army. Seldom has an invading force left so good a name in an enemy's country as the British troops under Wellesley left among the Danes; thanks to the vigilance of their commander in maintaining order, regularity, and discipline among them.

NAPOLEON'S SUPREMACY IN EUROPE; AFFAIRS OF SPAIN IN 1808.

The great qualities of the English General were now to be displayed on a far wider field. Not only national but European interests were to be confided to his care. Napoleon had successively humbled the great continental powers, and grasped at nothing less than universal dominion. In 1805 the great battle of Austerlitz had paralysed Austria. Prussia had been rendered powerless by the tremendous defeat of Jena, in October 1806; and through the battles of Eylau and Friedland, in 1807, Russia had in her turn been compelled to bow under the iron hand of the conqueror. The glory of the great soldier had dazzled the eyes of the fickle Emperor Alexander; and at the treaty of Tilsit, a kind of friendship had been established between the French and the Russian autocrat. Spain and Portugal were now to be taken in hand by the indefatigable setter-up and putter-down of thrones, who from the Tuileries issued his commands to King and Kaiser. He duped the miserable Spanish King Carlos IV., and the still more pitiful-spirited Ferdinand Prince of Asturias and heir-apparent to the throne, into a forced surrender of their rights to the Spanish crown. The old king had, indeed, been almost powerless for some time, his influence being entirely neutralized by the intrigues of the minister Godoy, the precious “Prince of peace.” His retirement was rather a benefit to him, and certainly to the country he misgoverned; and that Ferdinand was equally worthless as a ruler that shuffling potentate abundantly proved in after years. But in 1808, when the British Government resolved to interfere in the affairs of the Peninsula, the imbecility and treachery of Ferdinand VII. were yet to be developed by future events. Napoleon had despatched large armies into Portugal. The royal family had fled to their colonial possession of the Brazils, and Junot, a brave but incapable French general, who owed his fortune to having attracted the attention of Napoleon by cool courage and presence of mind, many years before, at the siege of Toulon, was established in Lisbon as governor, with the title of Duc d'Abrantes. In Spain, Murat, the brother-in-law of Napoleon, had been appointed regent, at first in conjunction with Don Antonio, the uncle of Ferdinand, and afterwards alone. A rising at Madrid against the French troops quartered there in great numbers had been put down by a massacre. Fifty thousand French soldiers were quartered in Spain, and Joseph Bonaparte, the emperor's brother, was proclaimed king. Various provinces rebelled against the new order of things—Catalonia, Valencia, Galicia, Estremadura, and Andalusia. In the Asturias, “guerra al cuchillo”—“war to the knife”—was declared against the French. At Seville a national government called the Supreme Junta was formed, and in other towns subordinate Juntas acted in co-operation with the chief power. There seemed a fair chance of expelling the French from Spain and Portugal; and accordingly an expedition, consisting of eleven battalions of infantry, the 29th Foot, with a body of dragoons, and a small force of artillery, was despatched to the Peninsula in July 1808, under the command of Sir Arthur, now Lieutenant-General Wellesley.

WELLESLEY IN THE PENINSULA; ROLIÇA; VIMIERO; CONVENTION OF CINTRA.

Considering the possession of Lisbon as the first necessary object, Sir Arthur disembarked his forces in Mondego Bay, northward of that city; and fully appreciating the importance of time, which in military operations he declared to be everything, he advanced at once against Junot. He had been joined, on landing, by General Spencer, with 4000 or 5000 men. Sir

Brent Spencer was a splendid officer, zealous and determined, sure to carry out in first-rate style any duty entrusted to him, and believing greatly in the cold steel, or charging with the bayonet. At Roliça the first encounter took place, a hotly-contested affair, won at the cost of 480 men in killed, wounded, and missing; two gallant colonels, Lake of the 29th and Stewart of the 9th, being among the dead. This first encounter gave the French a very respectful opinion of the man whom Napoleon had contemptuously nicknamed the Sepoy General. Reinforced by Generals Anstruther and Acland, who most opportunely arrived, Sir Arthur, whose forces now amounted to 16,000 men, always energetic, and ready to run great risks where a great prize was to be won, determined to follow up his success and march upon Lisbon. So he pushed on and took up a position at Vimiero. But now arrived Sir Harry Burrard, an officer senior to himself in standing, and unfortunately one who thought to win, like Fabius, by delay. He was for waiting until Sir John Moore should arrive,—and this when success depended on instant action.

Events here favoured Wellesley. Junot had become thoroughly alarmed at his progress, and advanced against him with all his available force. On the 21st of August was fought the battle of Vimiero. Four hours after the commencement of the combined attack by Generals Solignac and Laborde on the British position, the French were in full flight, having lost nearly 3000 men in killed, against the British 800. "To Lisbon!" was now the word among the victorious ranks of the pursuing British; but Sir Harry Burrard was "senior officer;" he assumed command, and halted the army. Sir Arthur remonstrated and protested; but he had no choice but to obey.

Next day brought another commanding officer, Sir Hew Dalrymple, senior to the Fabius Cunctator who had so disastrously checked a victorious career. Sir Hew approved of Wellesley's plan, and desired that the army should advance. But on the morrow General Kellermann brought proposals from Junot for the evacuation of Portugal by the French. Then followed that unfortunate Convention of Cintra, in which the firstfruits of the Peninsular War were wantonly thrown away. Junot and his army, caught as they were in a trap, and in the power of their foes, were allowed to carry away their plunder from Portugal, and to depart in British vessels to their own country. The concession was monstrous in its absurdity, and naturally aroused a storm of indignation in England. Sir Arthur did what he could to make the conditions somewhat less favourable for Junot and his men. But he had understood that the whole scheme of the campaign was overthrown when that first fatal halt was called. "Well, gentlemen," he had said, turning to his staff with bitter irony, "we may as well go and shoot red-legged partridges."

DISASTERS IN SPAIN; GENERAL WELLESLEY'S REPORT; RESOLVE TO RENEW THE WAR.

Wellesley thereupon determined to quit the army of the Peninsula. "If I could be of any use to the men who have served me so well," he wrote to a friend, "I would stay with them for ever; but as matters are situated I am sure that I can be of no use to them; I am convinced that they cannot render any service, and I am determined to go home immediately." Accordingly he returned to England. Soon after Sir Harry Burrard resigned, Sir Hew Dalrymple was recalled, and Sir John Moore took the command of the forces in Spain. A kind of investigation was held by a board of general officers concerning the Convention of Cintra; but nothing definite was done. The days of Admiral Byng had gone by.

Sir John Moore was entirely over-weighted in the task he had undertaken. That he committed mistakes is certain. It is equally certain that he did his duty as a soldier and a gentleman, without fear and without reproach, till that day of mournful glory when, after repulsing the pursuing foe, "he lay like a warrior taking his rest" in the grave hastily dug on the ramparts of Corunna. In March 1809 the Ministry took the judicious step of consulting Sir Arthur Wellesley on the question whether the Peninsula should be left to its fate; or if not, in what way the war might be best carried on. The great soldier sent a written reply, wherein, in plain language, luminous with common sense, he summed up the necessary conditions of success. Not less than thirty thousand men must be employed, four or five thousand of these to be cavalry, with a large body of artillery; the whole army, native and foreign, be put under British officers; ample reinforcements to be sent as required, and 30,000 stands of arms with clothing and shoes to be forwarded to Lisbon for the Portuguese army.

The prospect of success for an expedition despatched under better conditions induced the Ministry to try again in Spain. This time no such blunder was made as placing any inefficient senior over Sir Arthur's head. As Marshal-General of the armies of Portugal, Sir Arthur received full authority to do what he would with the troops; and earned a shout of congratulation from the Portuguese, who welcomed him "as if conquest and his name were one." He disembarked once more on the banks of the Tagus, on April 22nd, 1809.

CAMPAIGN OF 1809; THE GENERAL'S DIFFICULTIES AND TRIALS.

They were foemen worthier of his steel with whom he had to try conclusions than the shallow Sabreur Junot. Marshals Soult, Victor, and Mortier were all officers of distinguished ability, the first-mentioned especially; and well supplied as they were with men and war material, to encounter them was a task that tried the skill and persistence even of the victor of Assaye. His first achievement was the passage of the Douro in the face of the enemy: a most difficult operation, which put the English in possession of the town of Oporto. So unexpected and rapid was the manœuvre, and so precipitate the retreat of the French, that it was told with glee how Sir Arthur sat down to the dinner that had been prepared for Marshal Soult.

Here, as elsewhere, the energetic commander was prevented by the neglect of others from following up his success. Money was doled out scantily, and the troops were often in want of necessaries. The soldiers, too, showed an inclination to carry on war according to the principles followed by the French armies, and began to plunder as they passed through towns and villages. Wellesley was not the man to allow such irregularities. The provost-marshal was promptly brought upon the scene, and severe corporal punishment, and even the execution of various culprits for plundering, convinced the men that their leader was not to be trifled with. It is told how on one occasion an ill-starred rascal had stolen a mirror from a house and actually carried it on his back for some distance, intending to dispose of it at the first opportunity. Unfortunately for him, the commander-in-chief spied him trudging under his ill-got booty. Trial, sentence of death, and execution followed immediately; and the unhappy wretch was left swinging from the branch of a tree, with the unlucky mirror that had brought Nemesis upon him dangling like a backboard behind him. The soldiers of the succeeding brigades, as they came marching along, glanced up at the "warning example," and wagged their heads gravely at each other. "Atty" (a familiar form of Arthur) "has been here!" they said.

The greatest of Sir Arthur's trials, however, arose out of his association with the Spanish general Cuesta, a feeble, wayward, effete old gentleman, mortally jealous of the stranger, who, he considered, was superseding him, and full of pride and punctilio. The Commander-in-Chief must have smiled grimly to see this doughty veteran going forth to battle in a carriage drawn by nine mules; or holding a review of his men, seated on a pile of cushions placed on the ground for his convenience, and thus literally realising the idea of a feather-bed soldier. Moreover he was excessively self-opinionated, and fancied himself able, without foreign intervention, to drive the French out of Spain. Had Cuesta been an Englishman under his orders, Sir Arthur would have brought him to his senses by a very summary process. As it was, he dealt with him as one of the difficulties of the campaign, with admirable patience and tact.

BATTLE OF TALAVERA; WELLESLEY A PEER; RENEWED DIFFICULTIES; LINES OF TORRES VEDRAS.

The situation was indeed such as to tax the energies and try the firmness of the strongest of commanders. The army of Joseph Bonaparte, commanded by Marshals Victor and Jourdain, and by General Sebastian, comprised sixty thousand men, admirably posted at Talavera. The British forces numbered only twenty thousand, with thirty guns,—and many of the men were quite young soldiers, recently drafted from the militia. Cuesta's army was present, but rendered no assistance; indeed, during the whole Peninsular War, the Spanish regular troops were worse than useless. The battle of Talavera was contested on the 27th and 28th of July, 1809, against great odds; and never had the self-reliance and firmness of Sir Arthur been more severely tried than on that memorable occasion. Talavera de la Reyna is also noted for the use made by the British army of the bayonet, "a species of combat," said the general orders, "which on all occasions so well accords with the dauntless character of British soldiers." Something of the feeling of chivalry here mitigated the fierceness of war. French and English alike recognized in their opponents "foemen worthy of their steel," and during a pause in the combat, while both armies were removing their dead from the field, many soldiers, coming down to a small stream that flowed between them, actually, as Lord Castlereagh observed in his speech proposing a vote of thanks to Wellesley and the army, "shook hands in token of their reciprocal admiration of the bravery, skill, and firmness displayed on both sides."

For this achievement Sir Arthur Wellesley was raised to the peerage. He became Baron Douro of Wellesley and Viscount Wellington of Talavera and of Wellington in the county of Somerset; a pension of two thousand a year was also voted him.

But his trials had only commenced. Exaggerated notions prevailed in England regarding the amount of support the English troops would receive in the Peninsula, and supplies were withheld, until the army was half-starved. Napoleon sent Massena, with more than a hundred thousand men, to the seat of war. It became imperatively necessary to fall back, and withdraw the army from Spain into Portugal. What the difficulties were against which Lord Wellington had to contend will appear by the following terse and soldierly despatch, sent to his brother Marquis Wellesley, who had just superseded the incapable Frere as British Minister. It is dated only a few days after the victory of Talavera:—

"DELEYTOSA, August 8th, 1809.

"TO MARQUIS WELLESLEY.

"I am happy to find that the Junta have taken measures to supply the armies. Your lordship will receive my sentiments upon the permanent arrangements to be adopted for this purpose, by the courier who will deliver this letter. In the meantime I must inform your Excellency, that if the Government have not already made great exertions to supply us, and if we do not experience the immediate effects of these exertions, by receiving a plentiful supply of provisions and forage, we must move away in as many detachments as there are roads from hence to the frontiers of Portugal. I assure your Excellency that since the 3rd the army had had no bread till yesterday, when about 4000 pounds of biscuit were divided among 30,000 mouths.

"The army will be useless in Spain, and will be entirely lost, if this treatment is to continue; and I must say, that if any efficient measures for our relief had been adopted by the Government when they first received the accounts of our distresses from the want of provisions, we ought before now to have received the benefit of them. There is this day again no bread for the soldiers.

"I must at the same time do the late British Minister the justice to declare that I do not conceive that this deficiency of supplies for the army is at all to be attributed to any neglect or omission on his part. It is to be attributed to the poverty and the extremely bad state of the country; to the inactivity of the magistrates and people; to their disinclination to take any trouble except that of packing up their property and running away when they hear of the approach of a French patrol; and to their habits of insubordination and disobedience of, and to the want of power in, the Government and their officers."

Thus, in his plain, straightforward, and sensible way, did the Commander set forth the true position of affairs. With him to recognise a danger was to find out the remedy. The question now was how to maintain the British army in the Peninsula in the face of overwhelming forces of the enemy. Wellington answered it by planning and carrying out the splendid design of the Lines of Torres Vedras.

These famous defences consisted of a double chain of earthworks, redoubts, and entrenchments, stretching at some distance north of Lisbon, from the Tagus to the Atlantic, in two nearly parallel lines, and thus cutting off completely from the rest of the country, the corner of Portugal in which the capital was situated. The outer line measured from the Atlantic to the Tagus twenty-nine miles, the inner or principal line twenty-four miles. Over and over again these lines proved like a sea-wall against which the waves of the French attack were broken and hurled back.

GUERRILLA WARFARE, 1810; BATTLE OF BUSACO; INEFFICIENCY OF THE REGENCY OF PORTUGAL.

By the end of 1809 it became evident that to hold the frontier of Portugal was the utmost the British could attempt, in view of the largely augmented armies of Napoleon in the Peninsula. Accordingly, for six months they were posted along the Portuguese frontier; the native levies at the extremities, the British towards the centre of the position. The peasantry, excited by the priests, and led on by partisan chiefs of no little talent, among whom the wily Mina and the daring Juan Martin Diaz, better known as the Empecinado, or "blackened-faced," were the most remarkable, now carried on that savage and barbarous guerilla warfare which, while it exasperated the combatants on both sides, could have no real bearing upon the main issue. Many stories are told of the ferocious valour of the guerilla warriors; but Wellington himself had the lowest opinion of them, as useless for regular operations, and tending, by their utter want of subordination and discipline, to introduce assassination, torture, and other atrocities into the system of warfare.

The battle of Busaco, on the 27th of September, in which Wellington's force of 24,000 maintained itself successfully against Massena's army of more than 80,000, was the chief military event of the war in 1810. Soon after this, on the 8th of October, the British army and its Portuguese allies took up their position behind the defences the admirable forethought of their great chief had provided for them. Massena found it impossible to force the lines; and after lingering some months at Santarem, looking in vain for an opportunity of taking his vigilant enemy at a disadvantage, broke up his camp and withdrew. "Every horror making war hideous attended this dreadful retreat," says Sir William Napier, the eloquent historian of the Peninsular War. "Distress, conflagration, death in all modes—from wounds, from fatigue, from water, from the flames, from starvation, on every side unlimited ferocity! I myself saw a peasant bounding on his dog to devour the dead and dying; and the spirit of cruelty, once unchained, smote even the brute creation." Wellington himself, who, pursuing Massena, saw with his own eyes the state of things, expresses in his despatches his regret at being obliged to declare that the conduct of the French during this retreat was marked by a barbarity seldom equaled, and never surpassed. As if the Commander had not enough to annoy and depress him, in the face of a foe greatly superior in numbers, the Regency of Portugal, and especially Principal Souza, thought fit to interfere with his plans, and to endeavour to thwart them; whereupon Wellington, in a letter which he requested the recipient to communicate to the Government, spoke out in most unmistakable style. "Inform the Regency, and above all Principal Souza," he writes, "that I know best where to station my troops, and where to make a stand against the enemy: and that I shall not alter a system framed upon mature consideration upon any suggestion of theirs. I am responsible for what I do, and they are not; and I recommend to them to look to the measures for which they are responsible, which I long ago recommended to them, viz., to provide for the tranquillity of Lisbon, and for the food of the army, and of the people, while the troops shall be engaged with the enemy." Of Principal Souza he spoke with uncompromising severity: "Either he must quit the country," wrote the offended General, "or I shall."

THE FORTRESSES—BADAJOZ, ETC.; BATTLE OF ALBUERA.

Three important fortresses had fallen into the hands of the French—Almeida, Ciudad Rodrigo, and Badajoz. After the brilliant victory gained at Fuentes d'Onoro over Massena, the French garrison of Almeida, which was besieged by the British, managed to escape by night in a very ingenious manner, and joined their comrades of Massena's army.

"The lion went to sleep,
And the lambs were at play,
The eagle spread his wings,
And from Almeida flew away,"

sang the wits of the camp, in allusion to the lion and the lamb, the badges of the 2nd and 4th regiments, who had allowed the enemy to evade them. This was one of the mishaps of which the many adverse critics made the most in their endeavour to prove that the war was mismanaged. Marshal Beresford was entrusted with the duty of regaining Badajoz; and the first of the three sieges of that fatal fortress began. It was soon found to be a tremendous task. The place was of great strength, and the French garrison fought desperately. When the siege had only proceeded a week, as Colonel Napier expresses it, "Five engineers and seven hundred officers and soldiers of the line were already on the long and bloody list of victims offered to this Moloch, and yet only one small battery against a small outwork was completed." The French made a gallant fight. Four hundred of the British were killed in repelling a sortie. But the news of the approach of Marshal Soult caused the siege to be at once abandoned; and on the 16th of May was fought the bloody battle of Albuera, between the English and the French forces, under Beresford and Soult respectively. Within four hours eight thousand French and seven thousand of the British fell. Of the heroic gallantry of the troops there is no doubt; but whether the battle itself was not, as Colonel Napier opines, a huge mistake on the part of Beresford is a very serious question. Only eighteen hundred of the nine thousand British soldiers who marched up the fatal heights of Albuera, escaped unwounded. The private soldiers had an idea that they had been uselessly sacrificed, and loudly lamented the absence of their great chief.

TAKING OF CIUDAD RODRIGO,—DESPERATE FIGHTING—THE HORRORS OF WAR.

Badajoz was now besieged for the second time. But the means for carrying on the operations were wanting. Philippon, the French commander, had greatly strengthened the defences. Two attempts to storm the breach failed; and after a loss of 400 men, the second siege of Badajoz was abandoned like the first. Ciudad Rodrigo, the third fortress, was besieged in January 1812. The heavy artillery soon opened breaches in the walls, and on the 19th a general order began with the words: "The attack upon Ciudad Rodrigo must be made this evening at seven o'clock." Mackinnon, Crawford, Napier, Picton, and others of the best officers in the army were engaged in this affair. "The signal for the assault," says the report of an eye-witness, "was the discharge of a rocket. It rose from one of the batteries. 'Now, lads, for the breach!' cried Crawford; and off started the Light Division in double quick. A tremendous fire from the ramparts, of canister, shell, grape, round shot, musketry, and fire-balls, saluted the advancing column; still, 'Forward!' was the word. Crawford fell at the very first discharge. Pausing not, for safety only lay in suddenness and expedition, the divisions pressed onward, springing into the ditch, clambering up the escarp, and boldly facing terrific showers of bullets. No impediment was respected for a moment—men and officers dashed forward, confronting danger with intrepid indifference, and driving the garrison before them. The great breach is won—the curtain is assaulted—an explosion takes place, and Mackinnon is killed. The lesser breach is in the hands of the Light Division—Napier is cheering on the men—a shot shatters his arm—he falls, but, a hero in his agony, he calls out, 'Never mind me! push on, my lads—the town is ours!' Abandoning the breach, the French spring the mines, fall back, and keep up a tremendous fire from the houses."

The town was taken, at a cost of 1300 men on the British and about 300 on the French side; and then the most horrible scene of the war-drama began. So long as there was work to be done, the soldiers were heroes in their display of united discipline and courage; but the victory once achieved, they ranged through the conquered city like evil spirits let loose. Drunkenness, robbery, murder, disgraced the day of triumph. The men seemed to have gone mad, so utterly had they lost all self-control. They fired from the windows upon the unarmed and terrified inhabitants; they ill-treated and, in many cases, slew the townspeople, without distinction of age or sex. A frenzied band even made an attempt to fire the powder magazine, and almost succeeded. The men even attacked their officers, who tried to interfere, and hours after the town had been taken, numbers of men fell by the hands of the infuriated inhabitants. Besides Mackinnon, Ciudad Rodrigo cost the country a brave and able soldier in the person of General Crawford. Napier, one of the "three heroic brothers," escaped with the loss of an arm.

HONOURS AND REWARDS; THIRD SIEGE, AND CAPTURE OF BADAJOZ; ADVANCE TO MADRID.

The thanks of Parliament, an earl's coronet, and an additional annuity of £2,000 a year, testified the sense of the majority of Lord Wellington's countrymen as to the importance of the capture of Ciudad Rodrigo; but there was a large minority who, considering the whole war a mistake, objected to the increased annuity, and impugned the tactics of the Commander. Impervious alike to detraction and flattery, Lord Wellington, in spite of the obstacles cast in his way by the supineness of the Government at home and the jealousy and ill-will of the Spaniards, went steadily on his way, calm, secret, and imperturbable. He had planned an important and dangerous undertaking for the next year—nothing less than a third siege of Badajoz. Twice the operations against that fatal fortress had miscarried; it would never do to fail a third time. Accordingly the labours of the army were herculean. The men worked in the trenches up to their waists in water. They were working against time, moreover, for Soult and Marmont were hastening up to relieve the place; while within the walls stern Philippon, with his 5,000 soldiers, was determined to hold out to the last. All the terrible incidents of Ciudad Rodrigo were repeated in tenfold intensity before Badajoz; on the night of the assault, that of the 6th April, 1812, nearly 4,000 men perished; the whole British loss during the siege was above 5,000, the French lost about 2,000. After the town was taken "commenced that wild and desperate wickedness," says Colonel Napier, "which tarnished the lustre of the soldiers' heroism. Shameless rapacity, brutal intemperance, savage cruelty, and murder-shrieks and piteous lamentations, groans, shouts, imprecations, the hissing of fires bursting from houses, the crashing of doors and windows, and the reports of muskets used in violence, resounded for two days and nights in the streets of Badajoz!" Some plunderers were at length hanged in the public square by Wellington's orders; and at last, exhausted by their own excesses, the soldiers were brought back to obedience.

Now that the frontier fortresses were in his hands, Lord Wellington could once more advance into Spain, to fight a great battle. At Salamanca a complete victory was gained over Marmont, who was badly wounded, and lost between 6,000 and 7,000 soldiers as prisoners to the British. Then the word was, "Forward for Madrid!"

The reception in Madrid was most enthusiastic. The whole population flocked out to meet the advancing troops with "Vivas!" and jubilation. The great chief himself afterwards told, with a smile, how he was, on dismounting, "vehemently embraced, and handed over from one female to another, until he became fairly exhausted by their vehement attentions."

SIEGE OF BURGOS; DISASTER AND RETREAT; 1813; LAST ADVANCE INTO SPAIN; VITTORIA.

From Madrid Lord Wellington moved onward to Burgos, in Old Castile, an exceedingly strong fortress. He laid siege to this important place; but his artillery train was totally inadequate to the work, and after vigorous but futile endeavours continued for a month, it was necessary to raise the siege. On the night of the 21st of October, in profound silence, and with the wheels of the gun-carriages muffled with straw, the British troops retreated from Burgos towards the Agueda. It was a bitter reverse. The men were half-starved, in desperately bad humour, ragged and turbulent. They drank to excess whenever they could get a chance, straggled from the line of march, plundered, and otherwise misconducted themselves, so that the peasants turned upon them in wrath, while the enemy pursued them relentlessly, and the retreat from Burgos cost the army 7,000 men. For the brilliant victory of Salamanca Lord Wellington had been advanced a step in the peerage, and was now Marquis of Wellington; but the end of the campaign had not, in this instance, crowned the work, and the British army was once more in cantonments on the frontiers of Portugal.

But elsewhere great events had startled Europe. Napoleon's enormous army had perished in the Russian snows; and in the campaign of 1813 in Germany, the Emperor required every soldier not indispensable elsewhere; Soult was recalled from Spain with 20,000 men; and there was no longer the probability that immense bodies of men would be poured through the Pyrenees. Now was the time for a grand effort, and Wellington felt that the campaign of 1813 would decide the Peninsular War. In May he began his last great march into Spain, in one extended line, intending to drive the scattered bodies of the French before it, towards the Pyrenees. It was a grand design grandly executed. Napier tells how Wellington, fully conscious that he was crossing a modern Rubicon as he passed the frontier-stream into Spain, rose in his stirrups, looked back on the fair land he was quitting, and, with a wave of his hand, exclaimed, "Adieu, Portugal!"

Before the march of the British, the French continued to fall back. An attempt to defend the passage of the Ebro against the advancing army was foiled by a skilful manœuvre of the English commander, who passed the river at a higher point. Again the French retreated; but at length, on the 21st of June, they made a stand at Vittoria. On that eventful day, such a victory as he had never yet gained rewarded the patient and indomitable heroism of the great commander. Marshal Jourdain and King Joseph Bonaparte were completely routed. The French were driven from all their positions, lost a great number of prisoners, 151 cannon, 415 waggons of ammunition, and all their baggage, treasure, and provisions. Dalhousie, Colville, Pictou, Beresford, Stewart, and a whole phalanx of brave officers shared with their chief the honour of the day. The road northward to Bayonne was blocked with carriages, specie-waggons, oxen, sheep, horses, asses, milch cows and mules. "Such a jumble never was witnessed before; the finery of palaces mixed up in one heterogeneous mass." Some of the pursuing soldiers made a bolt from the ranks in passing, filled their pockets with dollars and doubloons, and drank "Success to the British arms, and confusion to the enemy" in goblets of Burgundy and hock. There was no doubt as to the excellence of King Joseph's cellar. A soldier of the 87th Regiment handed in a singular trophy, in the shape of Marshal Jourdain's baton. This was despatched to England to the Prince Regent, who in return sent Wellington the staff of an English Field-Marshal.

ADVANCE THROUGH THE PYRENEES; NIVE, NIVELLE, ETC.; THE PEACE OF VIENNA, 1814.

Napoleon now sent Marshal Soult to Spain, to endeavour to stop the onward march of the victor; but it was too late. The French were discouraged, the English and their allies elated with the flush of recent victory. That Soult did all that was possible is evidenced by the fact that the British force was diminished, in its march through the Pyrenees, by 7,300 officers and soldiers in less than a fortnight, while the

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

French lost nearly double the number. Against all difficulties and resistance, the army still pressed onward. San Sebastian was besieged, and taken by an assault whose heroic features were tarnished, alas! by subsequent excesses, more atrocious, if possible, than those that had disgraced the British arms at Ciudad Rodrigo and Badajoz. "The disorder continued," says Napier, "until fire, following the steps of the plunderer, put an end to his ferocity by destroying the whole town." Pampeluna capitulated after a blockade; and now the army advanced into France. Glad must Wellington have been to leave behind him the soil of Spain. "In this devil of a country, where I have carried on war for five years," he writes to the French General Dumourier, then living in London, "I have always found, with your Henry IV., that with little armies we accomplished nothing, and with great ones we die of hunger." Nive, Nivelle, Orthes, and Toulouse, scenes of new victories, were added to the names inscribed on the British banners; and then came the abdication of Napoleon at the beginning of April 1814,—and on the 18th Soult capitulated, and for the time Wellington's task was done.

Peace being now concluded, and the Bourbons restored in France in the person of Louis XVIII., the admiration and gratitude of the nation was shown in the parliamentary vote of £400,000 on Lord Wellington, that he might support the dignity of a dukedom to which he was raised. He arrived in England just at the time when the monarchs of Prussia and Russia, the venerable 'Marshal Vorwärts,' better known as Prince Blücher, Platoff, Hetman of the Cossacks, and a multitude of other celebrities, were being feasted in England in honour of a peace which all believed to be permanent. And after a most effusive reception from the Prince Regent, and an amount of public applause which must have bored him exceedingly, the Duke started for Paris, having been appointed Ambassador at the French Court; and presently was despatched to replace Lord Castlereagh at the Congress then being held at Vienna to settle the boundaries of the states of Europe.

1815, RETURN OF NAPOLEON; FLIGHT OF LOUIS XVIII.; WELLINGTON ASSUMES THE COMMAND IN BELGIUM.

While the members of the Congress were proceeding with their work in leisurely diplomatic fashion, each trying to obtain for the nation he represented the greatest procurable number of plums from the "Cabinet" pudding, there came upon them a piece of intelligence startling as a clap of thunder from a clear sky: Napoleon had escaped from Elba, and had landed, with a few hundred soldiers, in the south of France!

The report seemed incredible, but it was true. In a remarkably short time the restored Bourbons had contrived to disgust the nation that had at first received them with acclamations, by a senseless disregard of public opinion, by ungenerous treatment of the army, whose veteran officers were cashiered, or superseded by members of noble families, flourishing what Béranger calls "innocent" sabres, and by a foolish partiality for returned emigrants hungrily demanding preferment, and for Jesuit priests anxious to reimpose the old yoke of the Church. Napoleon's progress to Paris was a triumph. At Grenoble, the 5th regiment of the line, marching out to oppose him, burst into a great shout, not of defiance, but of jubilant welcome, when the well-known figure in the cocked hat and the grey coat advanced alone to meet them. Everywhere the soldiers declared for their old chief. Marshal Ney, who had assured Louis XVIII. that he would bring back the disturber of Europe in an iron cage, went over to Napoleon like the rest. Bonaparte established himself once more at the Tuileries, and the Bourbon king and his followers hastened with all speed to put the Belgian frontier between themselves and their enemy. The great powers at once determined to enter into no negotiation with Napoleon, but to treat him as a man with whom there could be neither peace nor truce. "I now recommend you to put all your force in the Netherlands at the disposal of the King of France," wrote the Duke to Lord Castlereagh. "I will go and join it if you like it, or do anything else that Government choose." The Duke was appointed to head the struggle, of whose dimensions few or none at that time could judge; and with what consummate skill, coolness, and common sense he carried to a triumphant termination the task entrusted to him is known to the most superficial reader of history. Napoleon's plan was to attack the allies in detail; his sole chance consisted in forcing a contest, and defeating one army before the others could join. Belgium wished for reunion with France, and Belgium accordingly was to be the theatre of the campaign. Wellington at once saw that the policy of the allies must be to bring the greatest possible number of men into the field at once, to make the war short and sharp. He established his head-quarters at Brussels at the beginning of April 1815, and was indefatigable in urging the foreign allies to make haste. Old Blücher, the fire-eating Prussian marshal, was ready and willing enough; but Schwartzberg, the Austrian commander-in-chief, was more deliberate.

CAMPAIGN OF 1815; MARCH FROM BRUSSELS; LIGNY AND QUATRE BRAS; POSITION NEAR MONT ST JEAN.

The army was not such as the Duke would have wished to command. His splendid regiments of the Peninsula—the men who would go anywhere and do anything—had been in part disbanded, and in part had been sent to Canada, or employed in the foolish war against the United States of America. Many of his soldiers were recruits, hastily drafted into the line from the militia; and not a few fought the campaign in their militia jackets. But “their hearts were in the trim,” and zeal and valour were in some measure substitutes for experience. And many of the good Peninsular commanders were there to second their old chief—Picton, Alten, Colville, Clinton, Ponsonby, Halkett, Lord Uxbridge, most dashing of cavalry officers, Lord Fitzroy Somerset, and a score of others. The troops under Wellington’s command amounted to 78,500 men, British, Belgians, Hanoverians, Brunswickers, etc. Marshal Blücher had about 80,000 immediately available, besides 30,000 in more distant positions. Napoleon had about 130,000 men to oppose to these forces; and his plan was to crush the Prussians and the English separately, before the two armies of the Lower and Central Rhine should be ready to attack him. On the 12th of June Napoleon quitted Paris to join his army on the Belgian frontier. On the evening of the 15th was that ball of the Duchess of Richmond in Brussels, that “sound of revelry by night” immortalized by Byron’s verse. The Duke had received intelligence that the enemy had crossed the Sambre; but he directed that the ball should proceed, that all appearance of hurry and alarm might be avoided. All night the regiments were assembling, and marching out of Brussels in perfect order, towards Quatre Bras. Next day, the 16th, Napoleon fell upon the Prussians at Ligny, and, after a severe struggle, forced them to retreat upon Wavre. Meantime the British infantry were engaged hour after hour in a tremendous combat at Quatre Bras against Marshal Ney, whose cuirassiers thundered against the squares in vain, and who at length retired discomfited to France. The British army lost 5,000 men and officers in this hard-fought field. The Highlanders especially suffered severely.

As Blücher was in retreat upon Wavre and Gembloux, Wellington had to abandon the idea of attacking Ney at Drasne. He accordingly caused the whole army to fall back upon Waterloo, and took up a position in front of Mont St. Jean, south of the village of Waterloo, across the road leading to Brussels, with the forest of Soignies in his rear. The French had advanced as the British retreated, and the evening of the 17th found the two armies encamped on ridges opposite each other, with a shallow valley between them. In advance of the English position were two farmhouses, or rather chateaux, La Haye Sainte and Goumont, better known as Hougomont. The latter Wellington considered the key to his position, and fortified as strongly as circumstances would allow; and the Coldstream Guards, under Byng, Macdonnell, and Saltoun, with some of the brave Brunswick troops, were appointed to defend it.

Wellington had communicated with Blücher at Wavre: he would give battle to Napoleon next day if Blücher would send two Prussian corps to support him. The stout old “Vorwärts” replied that he would come with the whole army. The night was marked by torrents of rain, that rendered the roads a quagmire.

THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO, AND ITS RESULTS.

At noon on Sunday, the 18th of June, the famous battle of Waterloo began, with a tremendous attack on Hougomont, by Prince Jerome, with six battalions of infantry. On the part of the British, it was throughout a battle of endurance. “Napoleon did not manoeuvre at all,” wrote the Duke in his account. “He just moved forward in the old style in columns of attack, and was driven off in the old style.” It was a battle of giants, a fitting termination to the tremendous strife of a quarter of a century. All the attacks were beaten back. Sometimes the regiments formed squares, which the French cuirassiers strove in vain to break; sometimes tremendous charges of the French cavalry were met by counter-attacks by the Scots Greys, Dragoons, and Life Guards; the slaughter was terrific, and continued until the June sun was in the west. “Hard pounding, gentlemen,” observed the imperturbable Duke, as he rode about the field, encouraging all by his presence. “Let us see who can pound longest.” And again, “We must not be beaten; what will they say in England?” A cold, stern man, to all outward appearance, was Wellington; but he knew how to appeal to the soldier’s heart. Meanwhile, the best of his old friends were falling rapidly around him. Picton was down, and brave Sir William Ponsonby, and hundreds of gallant officers besides, and yet the question "who could pound longest" was undecided. Blücher kept his word. Through muddy roads, in which the cannon frequently sank to their axle-trees, the Prussian army struggled on from Wavre, and reached the field in the afternoon, in time to render most efficient assistance, at the cost of 1,200 men killed, and more than 4,000 wounded; a list of casualties sufficiently demonstrating that they were long and hotly engaged. Napoleon hoped, or affected to hope, for the arrival of Grouchy, who had been detached to pursue the Prussians. Night had almost come when the last grand effort was made in the advance of the Imperial Guard under Ney. Every one knows the story of the tremendous climax of that day,—with what a thunderous shock the encountering forces met,—how at the critical moment, when the foes were reeling from the fire poured into them by the Guards, the eagle eye of the British leader saw that the right time had come,—how the order was given for the whole line to advance,—how the British, burning with the battle-fury pent within them during twelve hours of unexampled endurance, poured down from the heights they had occupied all day, and the French columns wavered, broke, and fled.

During the whole of that night the pursuit of the vanquished army of Napoleon was kept up by the Prussians. About 40,000 men on the French side perished. The English loss also was terrible. Of an army of 67,000 which had encamped on the field on the night of the 17th, 14,000 men were reported "killed, wounded, or missing." The Duke himself wrote to Schwartzberg: "Our battle of the 18th was a battle of giants, and our success complete. Pray God that I may be so far favoured as never to have another; for I am much afflicted at the loss of old friends and comrades." The march upon Paris, the occupation of France by an enormous foreign army to secure the Bourbon throne, the surrender of Napoleon and his exile to St. Helena, were the immediate consequences of the victory of Waterloo.

WELLINGTON AS A POLITICIAN; HIS QUARREL WITH HUSKISSON.

The Duke was accustomed to say that his public life ended in 1815. But by "public" must here be understood "military" so far as active service is concerned; for a long political career yet lay before him, a career in which he showed to far less advantage than in his own vocation, sometimes indicating a disposition to manage a Cabinet as he would have ruled his camp, in despotic fashion; but from first to last actuated by a sense of duty. Accustomed to exact implicit obedience himself, he looked upon a wish of the Sovereign as equivalent to a command, and considered himself bound to obey; and thus was betrayed more than once into a false position. He backed the King unhesitatingly in the miserable "pains and penalties" proceedings against Queen Caroline. In refusing to take office under Mr. Canning, in 1827, he sacrificed to aristocratic prejudices a man who during his Peninsular difficulties had been his firmest friend in Parliament; and, moreover, after repudiating the idea that he wished to be Prime Minister,—"Knowing my incapacity for filling the post of First Minister, I should have been mad, and worse than mad," he had said in the House of Lords, "if I had even entertained the insane project,"—within a few months the Duke was Prime Minister. The King wished it, and the King's wish to him was law.

That he could diplomatically take advantage of a slip made by an unwelcome colleague is evidenced by the way in which he got rid of Mr. Huskisson, on the strength of a letter written with a very different purpose by that unlucky Canningite. To the assurance of Lords Palmerston and Dudley, Huskisson's friends, that the letter in question was "all a mistake," he replied categorically, "It was no mistake—could be no mistake—and should be no mistake."

THE DUKE AND THE REFORM BILL; HIS REASONS FOR WITHDRAWING HIS OPPOSITION TO THE MEASURE.

In the question of Parliamentary reform, the Duke's opinion was very decided. He detested the idea of a reform bill, and opposed it uncompromisingly. "From its adoption," he declared in the House of Lords, "we shall date the downfall of our constitution." But when the question became one of reform or revolution, the Duke's strong common sense came to his assistance. "The King's Government must be carried on," he said; the King wished him to give way, having sent a circular to the non-contents in the House of Lords requesting them to absent themselves from the division on the Reform Bill; and the Duke left the house accordingly without voting.

In 1832 the Duke was one of the most unpopular men in England; his windows were broken, and he himself was insulted as he rode through the streets. He was imperturbable as ever, the Iron Duke. He caused iron shutters to be put over the windows; and it was characteristic that he never had them removed to the day of his death twenty years afterwards. When the mob cheered him on his return to Apsley House, after he had given up the Reform Bill contest, he quietly pointed to the iron shutters, and turned away with a grim smile.

On this occasion of the passing of the Reform Bill, as on many others, the Duke evidently listened to the promptings of his strong common sense, even against his inclinations and his prejudices, of which latter, it may be frankly confessed, he had not a few. Speaking in his place in the House of Peers, in the month of July 1833, he uttered some remarkable words, which may be taken as explaining much of his public conduct on various occasions when he was accused of inconsistency. "If the world were governed by principles," he said, "nothing would be more easy than to conduct even the greatest affairs; but in all circumstances the duty of a wise man is, to choose the lesser of any two difficulties which beset him." He had evidently considered the two threatening evils of 1832 to be the Reform Bill and revolution, and acting up to his own principle, he chose "the lesser of the two."

THE DUKE INSTALLED AS CHANCELLOR OF OXFORD UNIVERSITY.

The year after the Reform Bill agitation, when it was found that that measure had not brought the millennium, and public feeling had had time to cool down, Wellington's popularity returned. His somewhat factious opposition was forgotten, and he was once more "the Duke" of whom all were proud. On the 12th of January, 1834, the death of Lord Granville left the Chancellorship of Oxford vacant, and the Duke was elected with one voice. Oxford, strongly Conservative, and justly proud of her new Chancellor, gave the Duke a tremendous reception. The "Chancellor's prize poem, recited by its author, Mr. Joseph Arnould, of Wadham, of course contained an allusion to the hero of the day; and great cheering greeted the lines in which, after speaking of Napoleon, his victories and his pride, the poet went on to say:—

O'er seas of blood his sun of glory rose,
And sank at length, mid tempest, to repose,
When, on that field where last the eagle soared,
War's mightier master wielded Britain's sword;
And the dark soul a world could scarce subdue
Bent to thy genius—Chief of Waterloo!"

THE DUKE'S LAST RETURN TO POWER; THE PEEL ADMINISTRATION; CLOSING YEARS; EULOGY IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Soon afterwards the Whig Ministry of Earl Grey, which had been gradually losing influence in the country, went out of office, and the King once more sent for the Duke to form an administration. This time Wellington refused to take the Premiership; and on his advice Sir Robert Peel, who was travelling in Italy, was sent for; post-haste. On his arrival a Conservative Government was formed, Sir Robert taking the seals of the Treasury, while the Duke became Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The arrangement did not endure long. A coalition between the Whigs and the Radicals proved too strong for the new Ministry. Left in a minority upon various important questions, Sir Robert Peel resigned, and his administration went with him.

Here the Duke's active political life may be said to have ended. He continued to occupy his place in the House of Lords, and to take a lively and intelligent interest in all great questions brought forward for discussion. He often spoke, and always with grave emphasis and luminous sense. When Queen Victoria succeeded to her uncle, she gave a large part of her confidence and respect to the venerable Duke, who was godfather to one of the Royal Princes, Arthur, born on the 1st of May, 1850.

It is characteristic that the last speeches he made in the House of Lords were in favour of a bill for the reorganisation of the militia.

All the astringencies of his character had now been forgotten, and there was not a more honoured presence in London than that of him whom, in London and on the Kentish coast, and at his seat of Strathfieldsaye, the gift of the nation to its hero, people used to call "the old Duke." It was well observed by the statesman who spoke his eulogy in the House of Commons when the grave at length claimed him: "Never did a person of such mark live so long, and so much in the public eye. In the golden saloon and in the busy market-place he might be alike observed. The rising generation will often recall his words of kindness, and the people followed him in the streets with a lingering gaze of reverent admiration. Who indeed can ever forget that classic and venerable head, white with time, and radiant with glory?"

A DOUBTFUL POINT IN HISTORY.

ARTFUL woman or simple maid,—inspired prophetess or evil sorceress,—which was Joan of Arc? In "the first part of Henry VI.," the Maid of Orleans has been depicted as among the worst of women; this has done much to cloud the fair fame of the wonderful peasant girl; but it was written in times too near her own to be free from the prejudice with which England regarded the Maid who had been the means of wresting from English rule the fairest cities of France, and from Henry VI. the crown of that beautiful country. Joan was burnt as a witch. To some minds that settles the matter. For such she was a witch; and not even the endless proofs to be found in the chronicles of the period would satisfy them to the contrary. But even to those who come to examine her story with unprejudiced minds, ready to believe in or condemn her, as they may be guided by impartially weighing the evidence for and against her,—even to them there remains the one great question, Was Joan of Arc inspired, or did she only believe herself to be so? Let us trace out her fascinating story, and try, as best we can, to answer this question, each one for himself, as he reads.

THE BIRTH OF JOAN.

Domremi, the birthplace of Joan of Arc, was but a small village situated on the left bank of the Meuse, about five leagues from Vaucouleurs. On the night of the 6th of January, 1412, tradition tells us that the inhabitants of this quiet little humble place were suddenly uplifted with an unaccountable but irresistible sensation of joy. And yet nothing very unusual had happened. The only event that occurred in the village that day was an ordinary incident enough. A daughter had been born to Isabeau Romée and Jacques d'Arc, her husband. The mother had previously dreamed that she had given birth to a thunder-bolt: but now a little girl-child lay in her arms, perfect in limb and feature, and till many years had passed over her head, the good Isabeau thought no more of her extraordinary dream.

The child was baptized by the name Jeanne at the picturesque old church of the village, which was dedicated to St. Remi.

Religious fanatics were numerous both in England and France at that time, when superstition held a dark and powerful sway. Among these was a visionary named Marie of Avignon, who declared that she had seen the miseries of France in a vision, and that armour was brought to her, but that she was told it was not for her but for a young girl who was to come after her, who should save France from her enemies.

An older prophecy than this declared that France should be ruined by a wicked woman, and saved by a virgin. As we proceed with the story we shall find who the wicked woman was. The virgin, of course, was Joan of Arc.

JOAN'S CHILDHOOD.

Jacques d'Arc and his wife, who was called by her maiden name of Romée, a frequent custom in those primitive parts, were God-fearing people, poor but respectable, honest and hard-working.

They brought up their children—three sons and a second daughter called Catherine—in the fear of God. They were made to confess to the priest regularly, and to observe all the days and ceremonies of the Church of Rome. Jeanne was a good girl, no trouble to her mother.

When quite a child she knew her Creed, Ave, and Paternoster, and loved to wander about the beautiful old church. Her mother appears to have been a busy, practical woman, who found life full enough with her household cares, her husband, and her five children. But Jeanne's godmother found time to tell the child long stories of elves and fays, and about the Gaulish saints who held mysterious but unmistakable communications with men and women. These last made a great impression on Joan, who was imaginative and of a highly emotional temperament. She was never weary of hearing of these saints who talked with and appeared under various forms to men. Her godmother, too, in common with all Frenchwomen of the time, liked dwelling upon the prophecy that France was to be saved by a girl. We may here trace the first germs of the future belief in supernatural communications and in her own destiny which afterwards so strongly influenced Joan. She pondered on these things, and in the long, lonely days, when she kept sheep for her father, she had plenty of leisure to brood over them.

JOAN'S GIRLHOOD.

As Joan grew out of childhood, her devotional feeling increased. She attended matins and vespers constantly, and often prayed between the hours of service, both in church and in the fields. She was a serious girl, fond of reverie and solitude, but she could play merrily with her young companions at times. Two girls of the village, Hauviette and Guillemette, were great friends of hers, and she dearly loved little Mengette, a child much younger than herself. She gave the bell-ringer little cakes to make him more regular in ringing the church bells for service. Everyone loved her for her gentleness and good-nature. She was kind to children and old people. The curé of the village said he "had never known so beautiful a soul." Her chief delight it was in the painted glass windows of the old church. She would remain for hours gazing at them and at the image of the Virgin and Child. She would gather flowers in the fields and make garlands for them. She loved to pray for France and for the "gentle Dauphin," as she always called the uncrowned son of Charles VI.

She grew a tall girl, with a beautiful face and a fine figure, which her free open-air life had developed to perfection. She could not write nor read, but could ride a horse, and, as she said at her trial, long after those peaceful days at Domremi, "she would yield to no woman in the province in spinning or sewing."

When Jeanne was thirteen, she was running one day in a field with Hauviette and Guillemette and other girls of the village, when suddenly she was impelled forward with such speed that she left her young companions far behind. When at last she stopped, out of breath, she heard a voice say, in a tone of command, "Return to your mother." This was the first time she heard the voices which came to her so frequently in after days. After this they were seldom stern, but very soft and sweet (moult belle, et douce). When that day she was standing in the garden of the cottage, a soft voice said to her, "Jeanne la Pucelle, child of God, be wise and good, put your trust in God, for you must go into France." At that time only the provinces which formed the crown domain were called France.

From that moment Joan felt herself to be set apart for a peculiar destiny. She dedicated herself to the service of God. She saw radiant visions of St. Michael, St. Catherine, and St. Margaret; and again and again the voices came to her, pointing out what she was to do. She loved these voices, and began to "sit loose" to home ties, and to things of the earth only. Gentle and docile as ever, she yet lived in a state of exaltation and religious fervour. She spent hours in the church on her knees, praying for France and longing again to see the delightful visions, and hear the voices. More than ever she loved the beautiful old church.

Just at this time the province of Champagne was overrun by the Burgundians, who took Domremi and set fire to the church. The villagers had to fly, taking with them the few portable possessions they could seize in the hurry of the moment.

The D'Arc family sought shelter for a fortnight in a small inn at Neufchateau. Perhaps nothing could have occurred better calculated to shake Joan from her dreams and to make of the gentle girl a wide-awake, indignant woman. She loved her village and her home, and of her church she revered every stone. The enemies of her "gentle Dauphin" had burned it down, had scattered her friends, and desolated the village. She felt moved with a righteous wrath against the sacrilegious Burgundians who had sided with the English against the lawful heir to the throne.

Joan was now sixteen. For three years she had brooded over the voices and the visions, feeling each year more sure that Providence had chosen her to be the woman who should save France. She had told no one of these things, not even her father and mother, but one day, out of the fulness of the heart the mouth spake, and a neighbour gathered from her that it was her intention to go into France. The neighbour told Joan's father, and he, though he knew Joan to be a pure and a good girl, said that rather than see her go away with the garrison at Vaucouleurs he would throw her into the river and drown her with his own hands. Some girls of Domremi had followed the garrison; and the good man, not conceiving of the mission his daughter believed herself charged with, could imagine no other reason for her wishing to leave her home. In his fear, he tried to make her marry a young man who loved her, and who said she had promised to marry him; but Joan, who had sworn herself to celibacy when first she heard the voices, denied this, and before the bishop, whereupon the young man gave up his claim.

After this the voices bade her go to Vaucouleurs; and when she asked her father's leave to visit her mother's brother, who lived there, he gave it. Arrived at her uncle's, she told him of what she deemed her mission, and he at once set down his handsome young niece as mad—just as any uncle of the present day might do. He told her not to talk nonsense; but she persisted in telling him the whole story, and with such evident belief in the truth of what she said, that eventually she convinced him, and he promised to speak to the Governor of Vaucouleurs, a Royalist, called Baudricourt. Her voices had told Joan that Baudricourt would not heed her the first time, nor the second, that she asked, but that on the third appeal he would give her an escort to the Dauphin. For a long time Baudricourt treated her as a madwoman; but Joan, full of her mission, talked of it to every one, until at last the report about her swelled to such dimensions that Baudricourt was afraid if the Dauphin should hear of it, he might blame him for not having sent the Maid to him that he might judge for himself as to her pretensions. First, however, he had her put to the test as a sorceress. The curé presented to her a sacred garment, and instead of turning away from it as a sorceress must have done, she fell on her knees; and, kneeling, approached it. After this, Baudricourt wrote to the Dauphin about her, but that indolent Prince took no notice. Jeanne became desperate, and at last by force of will and energy of character, won two influential gentlemen to believe in her. Bertrand de Polongy and John de Metz both swore that they would conduct her to the King. The people of Vaucouleurs voluntarily undertook the cost of her outfit. Her uncle and a friend of his bought her a horse. Her long hair was cut off, and man's attire purchased for her, and in the spring of 1429, she set out on her journey, full of hope, joy, and courage, delighted at last to see the way opening before her to her great task. Many of the inhabitants of Vaucouleurs wept as she rode from the city; but she said, "Do not pity me. It was for this undertaking I was born."

THE STATE OF FRANCE.

We must leave Joan on her way to the Dauphin, while we glance as briefly as possible at the condition of France, when the Maid was sent by her "voices" to rescue that unhappy country. Henry V. of England had been so victorious in France that, assisted by the imbecility of the reigning monarch of that country, Charles VI., he found no difficulty in making a league with the Duke of Burgundy, and the extraordinary Treaty of Troyes was entered into. By this it was arranged that Henry should marry the Princess Catherine, daughter of Charles VI., and that during the life of the latter king, Henry should act for him as regent, Charles being imbecile. The treaty provided that on the death of Charles, Henry V. of England should succeed to the throne of France, and his heirs after him, to the exclusion of the Dauphin, the natural heir. The Duke of Burgundy was to ally his army with those of Henry V. and of Charles VI., in order to overcome the adherents of the Dauphin, who was pronounced an enemy to the state, and the concluding clause of the treaty provided that no peace should be concluded with the lawful heir to the throne without the consent of the contracting parties.

Such a treaty as this, drawn up and concluded upon the very soil of France, makes one wonder at the anomalous position of the heir to the throne, and at the universal enmity that was felt towards him by the other Powers. Henry's share in this is easily explained by his desire to secure the throne of France for himself and his heirs. As to Charles VI., he was incapable, owing to his mental deficiency, of even knowing what he was doing when he signed such a treaty against his own son. His wife, Isabella of Bavaria, was a wicked and unscrupulous woman, who had taken advantage of her husband's weakness to secure large sums of the public money for herself. The Constable of France, the Comte d'Armagnac, had, with the consent of the Dauphin, seized this money, and Isabella never forgave her son his share in the transaction. She hated him; and he, then only sixteen, revenged himself by pouring into his father's ears an account of her misconduct with Bois-Bourbon, a gentleman of her household. Whether there were any truth in this or not, Charles VI. had Bois-Bourbon tied in a sack and thrown into the Seine. He sent the Queen to prison at Tours. It may be imagined that the conduct of the Dauphin in the matter in no way lessened the bitterness with which his mother regarded him. The Duke of Burgundy managed to extricate her from her prison; and when this powerful potentate entered into an alliance with Henry, Isabella was only too glad to throw her influence into a plot that would, if successful, exclude her son from the throne.

As to the Duke of Burgundy, he hated the Dauphin because of the murder of his father, Duke Jean-sans-Peur, who had been assassinated in the presence of the Dauphin. The reigning Duke burned to avenge his father upon the natural heir to the throne of France, and willingly allied himself with Henry V. of England for that purpose.

The vices and crimes of Isabella had made her so notorious throughout France that it was commonly believed that she was the person referred to in the prophecy of Merlin, which said that France was to be ruined by a woman. The first part of the prophecy thus fulfilled, it was natural that a superstitious people should be looking abroad for the "virgin" through whom, said the same prophecy, France was to be saved, and the reception of Joan by the masses may therefore in a great measure be attributed to Isabella herself.

Henry V. of England, having married the Princess Catherine, followed up his victories on French soil, and after taking several cities, entered Paris in triumph, in his capacity as Regent, side by side with the King of France. After this Henry again pursued his victories over the Dauphin's army, and drove him beyond the Loire. The Dauphin was indolent, vain, and led by favourites. He was easily discouraged, and after these reverses, retired into Auvergne.

In the same year an heir was born to Henry V., and nine months after Henry himself died, in the very zenith of his power. The historian Holingshed records a remarkable utterance made by him upon his death-bed: "Henry, born at Monmouth, was destined to reign briefly, and conquer largely; but Henry, born at Windsor (his son), will reign long and lose all,"—a prophecy that was fulfilled to the letter. Henry died in 1422; and six weeks later the unfortunate King Charles VI. followed him to the grave.

Charles, the Dauphin, was now twenty years old. The infant King of England, Henry VI., was not yet a year old, and for him the Duke of Bedford acted as Regent in France, and the Duke of Gloucester in England. Both these Dukes were his uncles, being brothers of the late Henry V.

The Duke of Bedford was an able and clever politician. He was determined to secure the crown of France for his infant nephew, and the indolent Dauphin was no match for him, nor for the bold Burgundy. Bedford's army was that which had won the famous battle of Agincourt, and the prestige of this splendid victory kept up their belief in themselves and overawed the French. The possessions of England in France at this crisis were as follows:—The whole of Gascony, Normandy, Artois, Flanders, Champagne, Picardy, and the city of Paris. Besides these won by right of conquest, there was Guienne, which came to England as a marriage portion with the wife of Henry II.

The Dauphin was crowned at Poitiers, and was thenceforth styled King of France by his adherents; and after this coronation the serious strife between Bedford and himself began, Bedford having warily conciliated the powerful Burgundy, and secured his adherence by marrying his sister, the beautiful Anne. In this distracted state of the country, it may be imagined that the condition of the peasantry was most deplorable. Accounts of their sufferings had reached Joan in quiet Domremi, and made her heart ache for her country.

For six years after the death of Charles VI., war continued to rage. The English were almost continually victorious, and eventually, in October 1448, laid siege to the large and important town of Orleans, the key to the south of France. With stupendous walls and towers, a dense population, and a noble old cathedral, it was a magnificent city; and the English, encouraged by their successes, determined to possess it. The citizens rightly regarded it as the last bulwark of the monarchy of France, and they determined to make every effort and every sacrifice in order to repulse the English. Loyalists felt that here was indeed the crisis in the destiny of Charles the Dauphin, and the eyes of all

France and England were fixed on the struggle going on in and around the noble city. The siege was prolonged through the winter, and the inhabitants, hoping for help from the King which never came, and irritated by disappointment, at last offered to surrender the city to the Duke of Burgundy. He, however, knew that Bedford would never agree to his accepting such an offer; and the Orleanists, receiving no reply to their overtures, sank into a state of despondency. Twenty thousand English were encamped round Orleans. Charles, too, became despondent, and thought the misery of the people was owing to him. He began to doubt if he were the true heir to the throne, and thought himself under the curse of God. He had serious thoughts of giving up all claim to the throne, and of leaving France.

Such was the position of affairs and the condition of France when Joan of Arc was on her journey from Vaucouleurs to the Dauphin.

JOAN'S JOURNEY TO THE DAUPHIN.

The journey from Vaucouleurs to Chinon where the court of Charles the Dauphin was, was long and full of dangers. The country was for the most part in the hands of the English, but Joan's courage never failed, and her firmness and resolution inspired those who were with her. She was full of confidence, and delighted, after weary months of waiting, to be at last on her way to do something towards her enterprise. She had changed in some respects from the gentle, timid Joan of Domremi, shy of strangers and retiring in manner. Her voice, soft and sweet as it was, and always remained, had an imperious ring in it, and took a deeper tone. Her manner was full of authority, and her mode of speech was often imperative and full of command. She felt herself to be no longer Joan the shepherd girl, but Joan the envoy of God, to redeem France from her invader and the horrors of war. Her devotional feeling was, however, all unchanged. In whatever town or village they halted, Joan attended the church, and induced her men-at-arms to do so too, to offer up thanks for their safety and prayers for France. Her influence over these men was wonderful, as it afterwards was over the men of the army of France. Abrupt as her manner was, there was a gentleness and sweetness of nature about her that won its way to the hearts of men, and her courage and endurance, wonderful in a woman, were not without their charms to men who knew how to appreciate such qualities.

Charles was at Chinon with his wife, Maria of Anjou, his son, who afterwards became Louis

XI., and his wife's mother, Yolande, Queen of Sicily, always his firm and judicious friend and adviser. La Trémouille, the favourite of Charles, was a man who thought only of his own interests. Charles was too weak and indolent to resist his counsels, and many of the sad and cruel mistakes made by the Dauphin may be attributed to the evil influence of this bad man. The character of Charles reminds the student of history of that of the Stuarts, weak, unstable, indolent, forgetful of benefits, and ungrateful. In addition to these bad qualities, Charles VII. was heartless and a libertine. His was one of those characters to which prosperity seems necessary to bring out the best traits. When he became acknowledged King of France, he wonderfully improved, only to feel the more acutely the ingratitude and bad behaviour of his son, Louis the Dauphin. When Joan arrived at Chinon, La Trémouille and the Archbishop of Rheims, who had become wealthy during the weak, lax rule of Charles, did their best to prevent her gaining access to him; but Yolande persuaded him to see her. But even with the order for her to pass in the King's own writing, Joan found the usual delays, which so fretted her active, energetic spirit. Several days passed before she saw the King, whose indolence and hesitation lost him many good things. At length the Maid was conducted into his presence by the Count de Vendôme. Charles thought to put her to the test by dressing very plainly and standing back among his nobles, and gave orders that no one should point him out to her. Joan, however, singled him out directly, threw herself on the ground, and embraced his knees. "There stands the King," said Charles, still further to try her, pointing to a richly dressed young noble who stood near.

"In the name of God, it is you and no other, most gentle Dauphin. I am Jeanne the Maid, and am sent by God to regain for you the kingdom which is yours, and to make war on these English. Why do you not believe me? I tell you truth, that God has pity on you and on your people. St. Louis and St. Charlemagne are on their knees before Him, praying for you."

When Joan was asked how she had recognised the King, she said her voices had pointed him out to her.

Charles raised her from her knees and spoke graciously to her. He led her aside and asked her for some sign whereby he could be assured of the truth of her mission; whereupon she told him of something known only to God and himself. Charles, in his despondency, seeing how everything went against him, and not recognizing that it was his own indolence and vacillation that caused the greater number of his reverses, had been at last led to imagine that he could not be the true heir to France. The vices of his mother gave only too much countenance to such a supposition, and her strong opposition to his succeeding to the throne furthered the idea. He had prayed to God to send him some sign that he was the lawful son of Charles and the rightful heir to the crown. When he asked Joan for a sign she said to him: "I tell you from God that you are the true heir to the crown of France and the son of the King." Immediately a wonderful change came over Charles. The despondent look of misery that had hung over him for months disappeared, and a bright smile lighted up his face. The handsome young King looked as he ought always to have looked,—energetic, eager, and full of life. Alan Chartier said of him, "One would say that the King had been visited at this moment by the Holy Spirit." He told the assembled court that he believed in Joan, ordered the palace to be always opened to her, and desired that she should be honourably treated and cared for.

Joan would never tell anyone what she had said to the King. During her trial, her judges pressed her hardly upon this point, but her reply was always, "Pass over that." She held it sacred, as she did everything that related to her King. It was only after her death that her confessor related the facts, and—things revealed in confession being held by the Roman Church to be sacred and inviolate—he would probably never have done so, had it not been in vindication of her character at the second trial, which took place twenty-five years after her death.

While at court, Joan gained the affectionate admiration of the two queens, and of all who observed her gentleness, humility, and devoutness of bearing. She was delighted at having gained so great a step as to induce the King to believe in her mission, and was bright, merry, and good-natured to those about her. The knights were delighted with her management of her horse and the way in which she wielded the lance.

The priests still suspected her of sorcery, and Charles, to satisfy them, sent Joan to Poitiers to be examined by several theological doctors of the University of Paris assembled there. There she was lodged at the house of a citizen named Jean Rabateau, whose wife soon came to love Joan. All good women loved her, no unworthy proof of the purity of her nature and the sweetness of her disposition. The commissioners examined this peasant girl, who could neither read nor write, for two long hours. They asked particulars of her birth and childhood, of her parentage and her surroundings in her native village. Her replies were dictated by a native shrewdness and an instinctive avoidance of dangerous topics. "In what language do your voices speak to you?" asked one of the doctors who spoke with a broad provincial accent. "In a better than yours," said Joan,—an answer that caused a good many covert smiles in the assembly. They wanted a sign; but Joan said she would give them a sign at Orleans. "Give me men-at-arms," she said, "I will go and will raise the siege, in the name of God, and will conduct the Dauphin to be crowned at Rheims." (The Dauphin had already been crowned at Poitiers, but the anointing of the holy oil preserved at Rheims was deemed so essential to the making of a king that no French sovereign was considered to be really so until his consecration in that city.) "He shall be restored," continued Joan, "and Paris shall be his after his coronation, and the Duke of Orleans shall be released from his captivity in England." After a second examination, the Bishop of Castres pronounced that the Maid had certainly been sent by God, that they had found her to be a humble virgin, pious, honest, and simple, and that she should be taken to Orleans in furtherance of her mission. Even the Archbishop of Rheims agreed to this declaration.

Some ladies who visited her at Poitiers, and who were struck by the anomaly of the gentleness and modesty of her manner and her masculine attire, asked her why she did not wear women's clothes. She replied that she had to serve the "gentle Dauphin," and could do so best in man's attire. Long afterwards she said her voices had desired her to wear it.

After the examination, Joan returned to Chinon, where Charles gave her splendid lodging and horses, and ordered a handsome suit of armour to be made for her.

JOAN AT ORLEANS.

After a long delay, Charles and his Council agreed to send Joan to Orleans in command of a convoy which was to take provisions to the inhabitants. When she was offered a sword, she said that her voices had told her where to find a sword, at the back of a shrine to her favourite St. Catherine, at the church of Fierbois. It was found where she directed, and she took possession of it. Her banner was prepared under her own directions. It was of white silk, embroidered with gold fleurs-de-lis, and displayed a figure of the Saviour seated on a throne, with a globe in His hands. An angel held a fleur-de-lis, which the Saviour seemed to be blessing. Above were the words that Joan assumed for her motto, "Jhesus Maria." On the other side of the banner was a figure of the Virgin.

On the 25th of April, 1429, when she was in her eighteenth year, Joan arrived at Blois to join the convoy which she was to command. From here she sent the following letter by her herald to the Earl of Suffolk, who commanded the English before Orleans:—

"King of England! Be just before God to the blood-royal of France. Surrender to the Maid the keys of all the good towns you have taken by violence." The English commander naturally laughed at this bold language; but the soldiery had heard so much of her, that they had set her down at once as a witch, and were terrified when they heard that she was coming to Orleans. The Orleanists, on their side, were immensely elated, and thus, before Joan had even left Blois, the fame of her had gone abroad, and had already benefited the King's cause.

On the road to Orleans, Joan advised that the line of march should be along the north side of the river, so that on reaching Orleans it would not be necessary to cross it. The captains, however, deceived her, and while pretending to carry out her commands, marched along the south bank. When Joan discovered this, she was very angry, especially when it was found that the boats Dunois had brought out could only, when laden, land two leagues east of the city. There was every sign of a coming storm. The leaders wished to delay, but Joan would not hear of it; and when the boats were laden, the wind suddenly changed and became favourable. The superstitious ascribed this change to her supernatural powers, and the belief in her became stronger than ever.

The English offered no obstacle, and the provisions were safely landed in Orleans. Joan entered Orleans that night, in the midst of a terrible storm of wind, rain, thunder and lightning, and received an enthusiastic welcome from all within its walls. She rode straight to the cathedral on her cream-coloured charger, and entered, the troops following, with as many of the citizens as could enter, and a Te Deum was sung for thankfulness that the supplies had safely reached the hungry inhabitants of Orleans. "The people could not feast their eyes enough on the sight of her," says an old chronicler. They followed her in crowds. Joan's lodging was at the house of Jean Boucher, and his little daughter shared her room. Joan knew that her enemies were watching for an opportunity of maligning her, and she was careful to guard her reputation in every way. She united the wisdom of the serpent to the gentleness of the dove. On the 4th of May, she was resting in her room, and while she slept, some of the Orleansists made a sally and attacked one of the English forts. Joan suddenly sprang from her slumber, and crying that "her voices were calling her," had herself hastily armed, mounted her horse and galloped off, her horse's feet striking fire from the stones. She made her way to the point of combat, and for many hours the battle raged,—her first combat. The English at length were driven back. Joan led her division, and succeeded in storming the fort. Only those who took shelter in the church were saved, and these by Joan's intercession. Seven hundred English perished within the fort alone, and the earth before it was strewn with dead.

The fighting over, Joan the heroine was gone ; and Joan, pure woman, was weeping over the wounded and slain, and succouring those who were not past help.

On the 6th, Joan and Dunois took the fort of St. Augustine from the English by assault, and put the garrison to the sword. But one important fort now remained in possession of the English, Les Tournelles, and this Joan wished to attack at once ; but the captains thought this too rash an undertaking. They held a council and excluded Joan, and determined not to attack the fort. Joan rose early and armed, and notwithstanding all the obstacles that the French leaders—Dunois, La Hire and Gaucourt—had placed in her way, she led her men to the attack. Les Tournelles was defended by three of the greatest of the English commanders—Suffolk, Talbot, and Gladsdale. Joan was in great danger, and the three French captains, hearing of what she had done, came to her assistance with their men. From six in the morning the battle raged all day, and at noon, Joan, seeing that the French were discouraged, being constantly driven back by the English, jumped into the fosse, and setting a scaling-ladder against the wall, was about to climb when an arrow pierced her between the neck and shoulder. Poor Joan cried with pain and fear, like any simple girl, but she pulled out the arrow with her own hand, and had the wound dressed with oil. The English were heartened, and the French disheartened, by seeing the Maid fall ; and when she returned, the captains told her they meant to retire, and renew the attack the next day ; but she entreated them to persist, and they, partly out of admiration for her courage in returning to the fight in spite of her wound, agreed to persevere. While the men ate and drank and rested awhile, Joan retired to a neighbouring vineyard to pray. When she returned, she said to a gentleman who stood near her : " Watch when my banner touches the fort ;" and a few minutes after the wind blew it against the wall. " It touches, Joan," he said ; whereupon Joan cried out to the troops : " Go in now, all is ours." The French renewed the attack with ardour, and the English, daunted by the sight of the Maid, who, they had hoped, was seriously wounded, no longer offered the determined resistance of the morning. By evening Les Tournelles, the last stronghold of the English before Orleans, was taken, and Joan re-entered the city in triumph, all the bells ringing out joyous peals, and the inhabitants rushing out to gaze upon the glorious girl who had worked such wonders for them. The next day the English retreated, and thus, in one week from the date of her entering the city, Joan had raised the siege and given the English the first serious repulse they had met for years. Here was a " sign " indeed, enough to convince the most sceptical that the Maid was to do a great work for France. The siege was raised on Sunday the 9th of May, 1421, and the inhabitants celebrated high mass in the cathedral with Joan, and followed her about from church to church, in joy and thankfulness for their great deliverance.

THE CORONATION AT RHEIMS.

On the Monday following her great victory, Joan, though still suffering from her wound, left Orleans to go to Charles at Loches. She knew that her work was but begun ; and with the impatience of all noble minds who see a great task before them, she longed to be at work again. Charles met her at Tours. Her journey had been an ovation. All France rang with the name of the " Maid of Orleans." The King, as well he might, received her with all honour, as though she had been a queen. He offered her nobility, and desired her to take the royal lilies of France for her arms, with a crown and a drawn sword. Joan was too intent on her purpose to pay much attention to these offers. She entreated the King to come with her at once to Rheims, there to be crowned with the sacred oil. " I can only serve you for one year," she said. " Let me serve you while I can." But Charles, knowing that Rheims was in the hands of the English, and that the way there was infested by their men-at-arms, listened more readily to the counsels of La Trémouille and others, who advised him to wait until the English should be banished beyond the Loire. In vain Joan prayed him to trust to her. She even told him that her voices had said to her, "Fille Dé, va, va, va ! Je serai à ton aide ; va !" "Daughter of God, go, go, go ! I will be thy help ; go !" She would have convinced Charles, only for his evil advisers. As it was, she persuaded him to raise an expedition to drive the English beyond the Loire. He promised that when the way was thus made safe for him, he would go to Rheims. Could Joan fail to feel contempt for this unmanly king, who loved his ease and feared his enemies ? She seemed still to hold him in reverence as her king, the appointed of God to rule over her country, and she never for an instant relaxed her efforts to place him firmly upon the throne of France.

The Duke d'Alençon, just released from being imprisoned by the English, was given command of the army raised ; but Charles bade him follow the advice of the Maid in everything he undertook. The town of Jargeau, strongly fortified and defended by the Earl of Suffolk, was taken by the army, and the Earl of Suffolk taken prisoner. After this, Joan re-entered Orleans, where the enthusiasm of her welcome may easily be imagined. Other victories followed that of Jargeau, notably that of Patay, and Joan thought that now surely the King would go to Rheims to be crowned ; but after much weak hesitation and even ill-humour, the King said that the other Loire fortresses held by the enemy should first be taken. When Joan was informed of this cowardly decision, she burst into tears of disappointment and anger, and left the court, taking up her quarters in the camp. The brave fellows who had fought so hard for the miserable, half-crowned King, under the glorious banner of the Maid, could readily sympathize with her, and such murmurs were raised against the inaction of the King, that he and his counsellors were obliged to yield ; and on the 29th of June, 1429, to Joan's great joy, Charles and an army of 12,000 men set out for Rheims. The town of Auxerre refused to surrender to the King, but supplied the army with provisions, on handsome payment. At Troyes, the King remained five days before the gates, expecting the town to surrender ; and finding it did not do so, was meditating returning southward again. Joan dissuaded him, and promised that in three days Troyes should be his. She at once prepared for an assault, and gave yet further proofs of her marvellous aptitude for the science of war. Her generalship had before now amazed the most experienced leaders. When asked how she knew so well what to do, she said that her voices told her. On this occasion, Joan is said to have directed the men "better than two of the best captains could have done."

The inhabitants of Troyes, seeing the preparations made, and bethinking them of Joan's invincible success in her undertakings, resolved to surrender ; and on Charles promising to let the garrison depart with all their goods, they opened the gates, and the King entered in state on the Sunday. The next town of importance was Châlons, which welcomed the King ; and here Joan, to her delight, met some friends from Domremi. She spent some happy hours with them, asking about her old friends. They were surprised at the simplicity of her manner, now that she was the most famous woman in Europe. One of them asked if her great destiny did not sometimes frighten her. "I fear nothing but treachery," she replied.

A few days later, the army reached Rheims, which surrendered to the King ; and on the 16th of July, Charles entered the city with all state and ceremony.

On the following Sunday the King was crowned and anointed with the holy oil. The spectacle was an imposing one, and as Joan looked on from her place of honour near the King, it may be imagined that her heart overflowed with joy and gratitude. She saw her beloved monarch crowned through her efforts ; and when the ceremony was concluded, she threw herself at his feet, her eyes streaming with tears, and for the first time she addressed him as "king." "Gentle King," she said, "now is fulfilled the pleasure of God, whose will it was that you should come to Rheims to receive your worthy coronation, showing that you are the true king, to whom the kingdom should belong."

Joan's father was present at the coronation, and was treated with great honour by the people of Rheims. The town paid his expenses, and gave him a horse whereon to perform the return journey to Domremi. One of Joan's brothers had fought with her during the campaign of the Loire. He afterwards assumed the title of nobility given to Joan and her family, and called himself Du Lis. The King asked the Maid what boon he could give her in return for her services, and she replied that she would like best that her native village should for ever be free from taxation for her sake. For three hundred years there appeared in the books of the Collector of Taxes, opposite the name of Domremi, the simple words: "Nothing, for the Maid's sake."

Joan had now accomplished her purpose, and touched the zenith of her glory. The fame of her spread from France into other lands. Crowds followed her wherever she went. Knights assumed her device on their banners. Medals were struck, and statues made, all bearing the name of Jeanne. All vied with each other in doing her honour.

THE GLORY FADES.

Authorities differ as to whether Joan, after the coronation of Charles VII., wished to retire to her humble home, and the quiet, uneventful life of a peasant girl. When she had explained her "mission," months before, she had said nothing of what lay beyond the coronation. It appeared as though her task should be ended here. Perhaps Joan felt it ended, but with a very natural feeling shrank from the thought of the colourless, eventless days at Domremi, after these months of active, stirring life. Her spirit may have been at war within her, or she may, on the contrary, have felt it her duty to give her utmost services to the King, in expelling the English from France. However this may be, a change came over Joan. She was no longer bright and happy. She wept often, and at mass sobbed and cried. She never again was the merry Joan, who made those about her smile at her sallies of fun. Did she feel that she was disobeying the saints, in whom she so firmly believed?

Joan's depression may be accounted for by the fact that her king had disappointed her. He would not trust her, after all she had done for him. He turned from her advice to those who counselled him as they knew he would like; who took advantage of his weak indolence to gain their private ends.

Could we believe that Joan was really inspired, and that the voices and the visions were not the result of the strong imagination of an emotional and passionate nature, we should be inclined to assert that, after Rheims, the inspiration abandoned her. From this point in her story the glory fades. Joan achieved no more splendid victories; but this might have been owing in great measure to the irresolution of the King, who thwarted all her best plans, as we shall see in following the story.

JOAN BEFORE PARIS.

Now that the King was crowned, Joan set herself two tasks,—the expulsion of the English from France, and the deliverance of Charles of Orleans from his captivity in England. In pursuance of the first, she begged the King to press forward to Paris, then held by the English, and to trust to the loyalty of the French in that city. Elsewhere, many thousands had acknowledged him as their lawful king, now that he had been crowned at Rheims and anointed with the holy oil. Joan was convinced that it needed but a bold stroke to secure Paris. Months of treachery and hindrance and secret opposition lay before her. The blind selfishness of the King and those round him were greater enemies to France than the English or Burgundians. The King was too self-indulgent to listen to Joan's advice. Charles went about, receiving the keys of various towns that sent in their submission to the newly anointed king, and as those further south sent in offers of adherence, the King left the road to Paris, in order to pursue his pleasant and dignified task of receiving the keys. Arrived near the Loire, he could scarcely resist the temptation of crossing it and retiring to his inglorious ease. The moment was almost lost for regaining Paris. Bedford, discomfited by the coronation of Charles and the success of the French arms, was trying to patch up a new alliance with the Duke of Burgundy. His adherence to the English was shaken by the French success. Had the attempt been made to regain Paris while this was the state of affairs, it would almost infallibly have been successful. Charles, turned back from his purpose of crossing the Loire by a slight check which his troops, marching southward against their will, were unable or reluctant to resist, approached Paris, but was induced by La Trémoille to agree to a fifteen days' truce with Burgundy. The delay was fatal. The Duke promised that at the end of the fortnight the gates of Paris should open to the King. At the expiry of the time, he tried to temporize, and the King was willing enough to listen to anything that would defer the evil day of taking the field. Joan, however, had seen through Burgundy's designs from the beginning, and, too impatient to delay longer, she said to Alençon, "Fair Duke, have ready your men and those of the other captains, for I must go and see Paris, nearer than I have seen it yet." Alençon, as disgusted as Joan with the weakness of the King, was only too glad to obey her. On the 23rd, the army left Compiègne, and in three days arrived at St. Denis. Joan longed for the King to join them there, but he lingered at Senlis. At last Alençon fetched him, and the troops received him with delight. "Now," they said, "the Maid will get Paris for him."

Joan was greatly troubled at this juncture by the conduct of her army. While she had led them before Rheims from conquest to conquest, her influence had been strong with them. They regularly performed their devotions, and not an oath or profane word was to be heard in the camp. "By my bâton," was the strongest expression Joan allowed. Now, after months of inaction, the troops had become demoralized. The soldiers relapsed into habits of blasphemy and pillage, and shameless women, once banished by Joan, came about the camp. At St. Denis, one of these came in Joan's way, and the indignant Maid struck her with the flat of the sword obtained from the shrine of St. Catherine, and broke the sacred blade. The troops thought this a bad omen, and even the King was annoyed, and told her she ought to have taken a thick stick for such a use.

The first attack on Paris was made on the 8th of September; and after hours of desperate fighting, the captains sounded a retreat, in spite of Joan's entreaties, and even tears. She had been wounded, but declared she would not leave the side of the fosse till Paris was taken. De Gaucourt had her removed by force. The next day the attack was about to be renewed, when a message was received from the King commanding the return of the troops to St. Denis, and ordering the Maid to return there too. She would not. She knew of a bridge over the Seine which would afford a good point of attack, and she agreed with her captains to renew the assault on the next day. Will it be believed that when they arrived at the bridge, they found it had been cut down by the King's own command? Charles suspected their intention, and had had the bridge destroyed during the night. Henri Martin says: "All comment will fall short of the facts. There is not in modern history a crime comparable to that of Charles against God and his country; and also nothing is comparable to the greatness of Jeanne d'Arc."

Charles soon after returned to his life of slothful ease in the south. Only a disorganized remnant remained of the army that had been led against Paris. As for Joan, she took off her armour and hung it up, with the sword she had used since St. Catherine's was broken, before the image of the Virgin Mary in the church of St. Denis.

CAPTURE.

At St. Denis, for the first time, Joan disobeyed "her voices." They desired her to remain there, but Alençon and others pointed out to her that her country needed her services all the more for the perverseness and selfishness of the King, and she once more took arms and joined Charles in the south. Often and bitterly did she regret having rejoined the army "against her Lord's will."

While Charles was before Paris, La Hire was conquering the English in Normandy. Alençon, seeing that nothing was to be expected from the King, wished to join La Hire, and asked Charles to allow the Maid to go with him. For this he went in person from his estate in Anjou. But the King refused his request, and Alençon and Joan, comrades in so many victories, bade each other adieu never to meet again.

Shortly after, the garrison of an English fortress on the Loire proving troublesome, D'Albret, a brother-in-law of La Trémouille, was sent against it, and this trouble approaching him too nearly for his comfort, Charles was willing enough to send Joan to quell it. She accompanied D'Albret.

They attacked Pierre-le-Monstier, and at the first repulse the French fled. Here, as on many a previous occasion, Joan saved the day by her personal bravery. She remained when all but half-a-dozen had fled. A gentleman rode back to her, pointing out the risk she ran. She looked as if she did not understand him. "There are fifty thousand with me, helping me," she said. The flying soldiers heard her, and ran back, renewing the attack with ardour; and in an hour or two the place was taken. Soon after, the army returned to Bourges from want of funds to carry on the campaign, and Joan spent four months at court in the inaction that she hated. She was sad and unhappy, but consoled herself by visiting the poor and giving largely in alms. She was "pricked to the heart till her work was done," she said, for she knew "she could not last more than a year," and here were the precious months slipping away and nothing being done. She prayed to her saints to tell her what to do. The voices had been silent since her disobedience at St. Denis. Her conscience was ill at ease. In answer to her prayers no counsel came, only again and again the disquieting assurance, "Before St. John's day you will be taken." Poor Joan was to expiate her fault in bitter sufferings.

Bedford had not been idle during the winter. It is unnecessary to enter here into a detailed account of his proceedings. Suffice it that he had managed to strengthen his hands, and his arrival was daily expected by the cities that had given in their submission to the rightful king. Bedford was to bring Henry VI. with him as the King of France. This boy was then (1430) eight years old. The people of Rheims were in great fear of Bedford, and they wrote to the Maid telling her of the peril they were in. She replied, reassuring them, and with her whole heart she pleaded with the King to be allowed to raise an army for the defence of this and other loyal cities. The King denied her; and one morning, at the end of March, Joan left Sully, where Charles was on a visit to La Trémouille, and rode off with a small company, without saying farewell to the King, whom she never saw again.

The Duke of Burgundy was successfully attacking the fortresses about Compiègne; and the English, now again in league with Burgundy, were daily expected. Thither went Joan with her faithful little company. She was riding to her doom, as she well knew; but Joan's was one of those grand natures in which physical and moral courage are equally developed. On May 18th she arrived at Compiègne, and was repulsed in two encounters with the enemy. Her prestige was gone, and she felt it. But for the admiration felt by the French soldiers for her personal daring and fine qualities, she would have retained no influence over them.

On the 24th of May, Joan led a sortie from Compiègne, leaving a party of the besieged to defend the bridge and causeway. While she was fighting, reinforcements of English came to the aid of the Burgundians. The French, largely outnumbered, retreated towards the city. Joan, with her usual self-forgetfulness, rode to the rear to cover the retreat of the troops. With her faithful friends about her, she charged back often thus keeping the foe from harassing the French. Arrived at the drawbridge, the troops safely crossed, some of them in boats; and when Joan and her devoted band turned to cross, they found the portcullis lowered and the drawbridge raised against them. Sir Guillaume de Flavy, the Governor of Compiègne, had done this, fearing, he said, that the English would rush across the bridge into the town. Joan fought bravely, but was soon taken prisoner. She was known by her crimson and gold surcoat, and was dragged off her horse from behind. No effort from Compiègne was made to save her. Her friends were made prisoners, too, and Joan was taken before John of Luxembourg, at Margny, where the English and Burgundian captains flocked to see her, "more joyful than if they had taken five hundred men-at-arms."

Did Guillaume de Flavy betray her? There is no evidence to show that he did, and we may give him the benefit of the doubt. But what shall we say of the people of Compiègne, who saw this brave girl of eighteen, who had come to defend their city, made a prisoner before their eyes, and yet kept their gates shut against her, and made no effort to save her?

The bitterness of captivity must have been intensified indeed by the ingratitude and heartlessness that met poor Joan on every hand.

THE TRIAL.

John of Luxembourg, into whose hands Joan had fallen, was a vassal of the powerful Duke of Burgundy, whose hatred for Charles, before referred to, would naturally extend to one who had so powerfully helped him to regain so much of his kingdom. The King and others who should have been Joan's friends, knew into what unscrupulous hands she had fallen, and when the news of her capture reached them, might have been expected to rush to her rescue. They acted very differently. Charles made no sign. He made no offer of ransom. In his heart he was glad she was taken. He was jealous of her. He knew that the populace thought more, far more, of her than they did of him, and his vanity—that feeling which is always most powerful in the weakest natures—was wounded. He knew himself a coward. She was braver than most men. He felt small when Joan was by. She was good and pure. Her very presence rebuked his vices. He was glad to be rid of her, and would not raise a finger to save her from her enemies. Craven, mean-souled king! One turns with loathing and contempt from the contemplation of such a character.

Where were Alençon, La Hire, and Dunois? Did they make no effort to save her? We hear of none. Only the people wept for Joan. She was prayed for in the churches of the towns where she was known. At Tours a procession of barefooted priests entreated Heaven to deliver her.

The Duke of Burgundy expected Charles to make overtures for the ransom of the Maid. He knew him too well to expect him to take arms for her; but nothing being heard from the King, he began to speculate what he should do with his girl-prisoner. Bedford had a Te Deum sung in the churches of Paris to celebrate her capture; and the next day the Vicar-General of the Inquisition of Paris wrote demanding that "the sorceress" should be given into their hands. Burgundy took no notice of this, but, as we shall see, it was not lost on others. He was waiting for offers of ransom from Charles, and for offers of purchase from Bedford. The former never came, the latter did, speedily enough. Joan was taken in May, and before winter came, she was sold to the English for ten thousand livres. Bedford cast about for some means to kill her, without incurring disgrace and odium, for Joan was a prisoner of war and no more. He bethought him of the application of the Inquisitors, and found ready to his hand the Bishop of Beauvais, who had lost his diocese through the intervention of Joan.

He was promised the archbishopric of Rouen if he should succeed in getting Joan condemned to death.

While Joan was prisoner at Beaufort, before she was sold, she won the hearts of the wife of John of Luxembourg and his aunt, the Countess de Ligny. They treated Joan with much kindness; and knowing what stress her enemies laid upon her wearing male attire, they tried to induce her to wear women's clothing, but she would not. "The time is not come yet," she said. While here she heard that Compiègne was hard pressed and, shortly after, that she had been sold to the English. It was too much for her. She seemed to lose control of herself, and, in her mad desire to escape, she threw herself from the top of the tower where she was allowed to take daily exercise. She was found insensible, but uninjured after a fall of sixty feet! She was very ill for days, not only physically but mentally, for she "had disobeyed her voices," she said, and "they blamed her for it;" even while they consoled her with the news that Compiègne should be delivered. On the 26th of October, the siege was raised, the Comte de Vendôme having taken three of the forts held by the enemy.

The University of Paris wished Joan to be tried in Paris, but Bedford decided upon Rouen, where the Maid was brought in December 1430. Two months elapsed before the trial was begun. The shame of Joan's terrible fate is equally divided between France and England. Of the forty assessors who condemned her, all but three were French, as were the judge, the recorders, and the ushers. The University of Paris and the Inquisition sanctioned the proceedings. The princes, captains and statesmen who paid the assessors were English, and so were the guards, who never left her day or night, and loaded her with insult, filling her ears with blasphemous utterances. Well might Joan call the English "goddams," as she always did. Oaths and curses were the most frequent words upon their tongues.

The trial lasted four months. As a preliminary every inquiry was made as to Joan's previous life. The reports were all in her favour. Testimony as to her purity, goodness, and piety poured in, and was unwelcome indeed to those who hated her. The greatest secrecy was observed as to the trial. No one was allowed to know what was going on. Consequently the historians of the period have little to say on the subject; but fortunately the judicial record has been preserved intact, and by it and other documents learned Frenchmen have been enabled to do tardy justice to one of the noblest and best of women.

On the 21st of February, 1431, Joan the Maid, then aged nineteen, began her long and weary trial by some of the most learned theologians and doctors of France. The Bishop of Beauvais was president—he who had forbidden her to be allowed to attend mass during the last two months,—a terrible deprivation to Joan, who loved the services of her Church.

She was examined as to her parentage, childhood, mode of life at Domremi, and to all such questions she answered firmly and without reserve. When the assessors asked of more sacred things, she sometimes replied, but often said: "Pass that over." They asked her if she "were in the grace of God,"—a subtle question, meant to lead her into difficulty. She answered: "If I am not, may God bring me into it; if I am, may He keep me in it." "Was it God who made you adopt the dress of a man?" "All that I have done has been by the command of the Lord." They asked if she had heard the voices since her imprisonment. "I heard them yesterday," she said. "They told me to answer boldly and God would help me." One of the assessors asked if she would return to woman's dress, and she answered: "Give me one, and I will wear it, if you will let me go home to my mother; otherwise I will not have it." There was a protection in her masculine dress which she could not explain to these men.

"Within seven years," said this wonderful girl, "the English shall lose a greater pledge than before Orleans. They shall lose all France." Asked how she knew this, she said: "By revelation, and I am very grieved that it is delayed so long."

The latter part of the trial was heard before lawyers, the assessors not being present, though they were forbidden to quit Rouen till the conclusion. On the 27th of March the formal accusation against her was drawn up. In it she was accused of being a sorceress, diviner, false prophetess, invocator of evil spirits, a magician, a disturber of the peace, and of scandalously putting on the dress of man. The questions in the rest of the examination were founded on these accusations. Her judges found that nothing said by Joan was likely to criminate her, so, on the 9th of May, they had recourse to torture, in order to make her deny her mission and thus destroy men's belief in her. When Joan was told what was wanted of her, and with what she was threatened, she said: "You may tear me limb from limb, and send the soul out of my body, but I will tell you nothing more; and if I did speak differently in the torture, I would afterwards tell you that you had forced me so to speak." In spite of illness (for she had had a fever in the prison) and the weary strain of the four months' trial, Joan's spirit was still unsubdued. Her judges, whether moved by her bravery, or afraid of killing her, would not put her to the torture that day, and when a few days later they put it to the vote, a large majority was against administering it. On the 23rd of May, Joan was told that her trial was ended, and that on the following day she was to appear before the tribunal to receive sentence.

LAST DAYS.

On the 24th of May, Joan was led forth to be preached to in public in the churchyard of the Abbey of St. Ouen, and either publicly to abjure her sacred mission or to receive sentence. She was led through crowds of English and French, all anxious to behold the marvellous Maid who had been so powerful against the former, and for the latter. The English greeted her with groans and execrations, but many of the French were silent, pitying her in her youth and forlornness, and remembering all she had done for France. Two scaffolds had been erected, one for Joan, the other for the Bishop of Beauvais and some of the assessors. The sermon was preached by one Erard, who stood on the platform with Joan. She let pass all that he said against herself, but when he called her king schismatic and heretical, she, faithful to the faithless and ungrateful Charles, said: "By my faith, sir, my king is a good Christian." After the sermon a form of recantation was handed her, and she was asked to abjure. Some of those about her, anxious for her escape, advised her to agree. Joan was firm; and the Bishop's voice was soon heard reading the sentence of death. The executioner was ready, waiting for her. She looked at him and at the English soldiers, thirsting to see her die. The poor girl, faltering, weak with long imprisonment and illness, lonely, forsaken, abandoned by all who should have helped her, said in a quivering voice, "I will submit to the Church." Poor Joan! she knew she had always submitted to the Church, and she may have thought there could be little harm involved in saying words so good as these. Who can be hard upon her, only nineteen as she was, and life, as it were, but opening before her, for this weakness of a moment? The form of recantation was read to her, and she repeated it like a child, smiling at the long words and her own stumbles over them. Joan could neither read nor write, and had no acquaintance with long words. She probably knew little of the sense they conveyed. A document was given her to sign and, still smiling, with hopes of life and liberty shining within her, she made a mark upon the paper. Who shall tell what dreams of quiet Domremi danced through her mind as she scrawled the great "O" upon the paper? Thoughts of her mother and father, the village friends, Hauviette, Guillemette, and Mengette, perhaps. She had seen none of them for so long. They dared not visit her in prison, for she was in the hands of the enemies of France. Little did she know what she was signing. Her enemies had substituted for the abjuration a confession of all the crimes imputed to her, and it was to this that Joan, smiling and almost gay again, was putting her clumsy mark.

When she got back to prison she was told that she was pardoned on condition that she never put on man's attire again, but that she was to be kept in prison all her life, and fed on bread and water only. Thus quickly faded her hopes of liberty. Her unmanly judges insisted on her changing her clothes for those of a woman in their presence. She was then chained to a block as before, and five gaolers—three constantly in her prison, day and night, and two outside the door—were placed to guard her.

A few days later Joan was found in man's clothing again, and of this her judges were soon informed. Her gaolers had taken the woman's clothing from her, and left her the choice between man's attire or none. Thus was Joan tricked into disobedience. There are hints of darker insult, repelled by the gentle, modest girl, and of her bruised face and distress and tears. Death must have been a merciful release from a prison so full of horrors as was that of the brave rescuer of France.

Joan now recanted her abjuration, and said she had abjured "from fear of the fire." The Bishop assembled the assessors at a last Council, and all were unanimous that she had relapsed. Joan was ordered to appear the next morning in the old market-place at Rouen to hear her sentence. Two monks were sent to her cell to apprise her of her approaching fate. Human weakness again assailed poor Joan. "I had rather be beheaded seven times than burnt," she said, and her shrieks and sobs filled the prison. Just then the Bishop of Beauvais entered, and Joan turned to him: "My death lies at your door," she said. "For your injustice to me I summon YOU before God." The Bishop trembled.

She was allowed to receive the sacrament, and, greatly comforted by it, she was calm when the time came to go forth.

At nine o'clock on the 30th of May, 1431, she left the prison clothed in a woman's long gown, and wearing a mitre with the words, "HERETIC, RELAPSED, APOSTATE, and IDOLATRESS" upon it in large letters. When she reached the scaffold there was another long sermon to listen to. At its conclusion Joan prayed long, fervently, and aloud. All about her wept, even Beauvais. She forgave her enemies, prayed for the King, and then asked for a cross. An English soldier broke his staff and made her a rough cross from it. She kissed it and put it in her bosom, but begged some one to bring her the crucifix from a church hard by, and "to hold it lifted up straight before her eyes to the last steps of death, that the cross on which God had hung might, as long as she lived, be continually before her eyes." When it was brought she embraced it with tears, praying to God, St. Michael, and St. Catherine.

She was then taken to the pile, and fastened high upon it, so that her death agony might be prolonged. When first the flames reached her she shrieked with terror and pain, and cried out for holy water; but soon she became her calm, grand, heroic self. Weakness fell away from her as death approached. When she saw that the flames came near the priest who was holding up the cross before her eyes, she bade him good-bye, and told him to stand further off, but adding, "Lift the cross higher that I may see it!" He could still hear her speak. She said: "Jesus! Jesus! Mary! My voices! My voices!" No more shrieks of terror. No more groans of pain. She cried out triumphantly: "My voices have not deceived me—they were from God;" and with one great cry, "Jesus!" her head fell upon her breast, and Joan was free.

So ended her martyrdom. Thus closed the life of this wonderful girl.

AFTERWARDS.

In 1449, Normandy again became the property of the French nation; and in 1453, with the surrendering of Bordeaux, the last of the conquests of triumphant France, peace, freedom, and independence were restored throughout the country. The work begun by Joan completed, people remembered her prophecy, and began to think that some kind of justice should be done to her memory.

Joan's father had died of a broken heart after his daughter's death, but her mother still lived, and had striven hard to have the sentence pronounced upon Joan set aside. The city of Orleans gave Isabeau Romée a pension, all of which, with a great part of her little property, she spent in trying to stir up the authorities to do justice to the memory of Joan.

In February 1450, letters patent were issued by the Crown, constituting a commission to inquire and report into all the circumstances of the trial and death of Joan of Arc. The consent of the Pope was obtained; but it was nearly five years before this second process began. On the 7th of November, 1455, Joan's aged mother, leaning on the arm of the son who had fought by Joan in the campaign of the Loire, entered the cathedral of Notre Dame at Paris, followed by a train of clergy, lawyers, nobles, and women of high degree. Isabeau formally opened the proceedings by demanding that justice should be done to the memory of her daughter Jeanne. The proceedings were then removed to Rouen, as the fittest place to rehabilitate the memory of the poor girl and noble heroine who had there so unjustly suffered death. There were a hundred and twenty witnesses in all, and every one of them, without exception, testified to the truth, sincerity, and piety of her character.

On the 7th of July, 1456, in the great hall of the Archbishop's Palace at Rouen, the final sentence was pronounced. The twelve articles that had been drawn up against her at the former trial were declared to be false and calumnious, and condemned to be torn from the records and publicly destroyed. The whole trial and judgment were now pronounced to be false and calumnious, and thus null and void; and it was further declared that neither Joan nor any of her relatives had incurred any shadow of disgrace.

By order of the Commissioners this new judgment was publicly read in all the cities of France. It was read on the spot where she had suffered death, and a stone cross was raised there to her memory. The people of Orleans established a yearly religious festival in her honour, and took care of Joan's mother, now called Isabelle du Lis, until her death, which happened two years after the reversal of the sentence. The Duke of Orleans gave a grant of land to Joan's two brothers, in recognition of her services. All over France crosses, monuments, and statues were erected to the memory of the heroine of Orleans.

Thus, after twenty-five years, tardy but full justice was done to the memory of this wonderful girl, who united so many womanly qualities with the gifts of a superior mind, and added to them a high courage and daring surpassing that of even the bravest men.

HISTORIC DOUBTS.

Of late some doubt has been thrown on the account given by historians of the fate of Joan of Arc. In an able article published in Household Words some twenty years ago, the following curious particulars are recorded:—

"A few old records exist at Metz and Orleans, which tend to prove that she was alive long after the period of her martyrdom; and a short time ago these were collected and made the most of by Monsieur Delepierre, in an interesting tract entitled Doute Historique (Historic Doubt). When are we to take up again a fact in history and say to ourselves, 'This is settled beyond all doubt?' He begins by quoting the authority of the Père Vignier, an eminent antiquarian of the seventeenth century. This investigator, while examining the archives at Metz in the year 1687, found an entry to the effect, that on the 29th of May, 1436, 'La Pucelle Jehanne, who had been in France,' came to that town, and 'on the same day came her two brothers, one of whom was a knight, and called himself Messire Pierre, and the other Petit Jehan, an esquire,' who thought she had been dead, but 'as soon as they saw her they recognised her, as she did them.' The document goes on to state that on the next day they took her to Boguelon, and procured for her a horse, a pair of leggings, a cap, and a sword, and 'the said Pucelle managed the horse very well, and said many things to the Sieur Nicole, so that he felt sure this was she who had been in France; and she was identified by many signs as La Pucelle Jehanne de France who had consecrated Charles at Rheims.' After going to Cologne and many other places, where she was looked upon as the genuine Maid, she reached Erlon, 'where she was married to Monsieur de Hermoise, a knight;' and soon after this 'the said Sieur de Hermoise and his wife La Pucelle came and lived in Metz in the house which belonged to the said Sieur.'

"The Père Vignier did not set much value on this record (and we cannot blame his scepticism) until the next year, 1688, when he happened to dine with a Monsieur des Armoises, who after the entertainment gave him the keys of the family library, where, to his surprise and delight, he stumbled on a marriage contract between 'Robert des Armoises, knight, and Jeanne d'Arcy, called 'Maid of Orleans.' This confirmation of the Metz record satisfied him.

"Monsieur Delepierre then refers to some documents found at Orleans in 1740, which contain charges under the years 1435 and 1436 for money given to a messenger who 'brought letters from Jehanne la Pucelle,' and to Jehan de Lils (that being the title by which her brothers had been ennobled), 'to help him in returning to his sister.' There is a third entry, 'To Jehanne Dar-moises, as a present made to her on August 1st, 1439, after the deliberation of the Council of this city, for the services rendered by her at the siege, 210 livres.'

"As a last documentary evidence, there is a petition from her brother, previous to his being ennobled in 1415,—a date contradicted by the Orleans charge which was made in 1436. This petition represents that 'he had left his native place to join the King's service in company with his sister Jeanne la Pucelle, with whom, up to the time of her absence, and since then till the present, he had risked his life.'

"Monsieur Delepierre also urges that at the time of Joan's reputed execution in the year 1431, there was a common talk that she was not dead, but that the English had put another victim in her place. Thus the chronicle of Metz, after relating 'the story of her imprisonment, trial, and burning, concludes, 'Ainsi qu'on le raconte, car depuis la contraire a été prouvée' (As they relate, for the contrary has since been proved).

"He regards the period which elapsed between her condemnation and execution, and the extraordinary precautions which were taken to conceal her as calling for some explanation. He notices that several women who assumed the name of the Maid of Orleans were tried and punished as impostors, while no proceedings were taken against this Jeanne des Armoises, or De Hermoise or Darmoises. In conclusion, he considers that these various facts are only explicable on the supposition that some young woman was substituted for her at the burning pyre of Rouen, and that she continued a captive until the death of the Duke of Bedford in 1435, when she was released from prison, and returned to pass many more years in the world,"

THE GORDON FAMILY.

FOR seven centuries or more the Gordons have been a famous family in Scotland. Representatives of the warlike stock fought at Halidon Hill, at Flodden, and many of the great combats in which Scottish noblemen and gentlemen engaged.

The first Earls and Marquises of Huntly, the Marquises of Sutherland, the Earls of Aberdeen, the Viscounts of Kenmure, Melgund and Aboyne were of the Gordon race. Some became soldiers of fortune, and highly distinguished themselves in foreign service, especially Patrick Gordon, who-after many adventures, became a trusty friend of Peter the Great, and a general in the Russian Army. In the Jacobite risings of 1715 and 1745 there were Gordons in the field; and their services were not exclusively at the service of one side. The Pretender had Gordons for his allies; so had the Duke of Cumberland, who annihilated the Pretender's claim.

After the subjugation of the Jacobite party in Scotland, many regiments of Highlanders were formed, one of them designated the Gordon Highlanders, afterwards well known as the 92nd Regiment. It is now united with the 75th, and again bears its old name.

In the outbreak of 1745, Sir William Gordon, of Park, was an adherent of the Young Pretender and the Stuart cause; and a near relative, David Gordon, fought on the Hanoverian side in Lascelles' Regiment, a portion of the force commanded by Sir John Cope. This David Gordon had become acquainted with the Duke of Cumberland, second son of George II., at Edinburgh, about six years before the arrival of Charles Edward; and the Duke had condescended to be sponsor to Gordon's infant son, and permit him to bear his name, William Augustus. At the battle of Preston Pass, David Gordon was taken prisoner by the Highlanders, but afterwards liberated on parole, with many others of his countrymen. He looked to the New World as a field for activity, and with his son, young William Augustus, embarked for North America. About six years afterwards, he was accidentally killed at Halifax, Nova Scotia. His son, although not more than fourteen years old, entered the British army, and by the time he had reached the age of four-and-twenty, had seen a considerable amount of military service. Returning to England, he was quartered at Hexham, in Northumberland; and there, in soldier fashion in piping times of peace, varied the routine of his military duties by making love. A Miss Anna Maria Clarke, attracting the admiration of the gallant Gordon, the pair were united in matrimony in 1773. Three sons and four daughters blessed the marriage state; and the sons, as they grew towards manhood, all entered the army, maintaining the military traditions of the family. The third brother, Henry William, was born in 1786, and when of fit age entered the Royal Artillery. He lived to an advanced age, long enough to see his third son, Charles Gordon, begin his career of Conquest in China.

Being quartered at Woolwich, the young artillery officer, Henry William Gordon, was near Blackheath, and in that pleasant place laid successful siege to the heart of Elizabeth Enderby, the daughter of a wealthy merchant and ship-owner residing there. She, like Gordon, came of a remarkable family, not of historic and soldierly renown, but distinguished by the successful pursuit of mercantile adventure. Mr. Samuel Enderby, the father of Gordon's bride, was the owner of two of the ships chartered by the English Government to carry tea to Boston, in North America. The attack on these ships by the Colonists, and the throwing of the chests of tea into the harbour—the first overt act of the resistance to taxation by England, which led to the great and successful War of Independence—is a matter of history, with which we need not at present further concern ourselves. Enderby's chief business was in connection with the whale fisheries. The ships owned by his firm visited the Arctic Seas, and traversed the Southern Ocean. Not only did the house of Enderby realise an ample fortune from these whaling expeditions, but it was instrumental in making geographical discoveries, and in establishing settlements on the Australian coasts and in other remote regions.

Henry William Gordon, the officer in the Royal Artillery, was in his marriage a fortunate man, and many years of wedded happiness were in store for the pair, whose olive branches were numerous, five sons and six daughters surrounding the family table.

Three of the sons entered the army as soon as their earlier education was completed, and they had attained fit age.

One of the elder lads rose to be Sir Henry W. Gordon, K.C.B., and another, Major-General S. Enderby Gordon, C.B., Royal Artillery. The fourth son, and third soldier, of the family is Charles George Gordon, "Chinese Gordon." He was born at Woolwich on the 28th of January, 1833, and has therefore just completed the fifty-first year of his age. He received a general education at Taunton; but before he was fifteen years old was placed in the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, to prepare for the army, which his father held to be the noblest of professions, and most worthy of the descendant of a race of Gordons. If England had possessed an army of Amazons, no doubt some of the six daughters of that enthusiastic soldier would have held commissions.

Physically, young Charles George did not give much promise of success in the profession he had chosen. He had a delicate constitution (in later days hardened to an iron firmness), which probably stood in the way of his making a very prominent figure in the work of the Academy and military exercises.

His first commission, as second lieutenant in the Royal Engineers, was dated June 23rd, 1852, and on the 17th February, 1854, he attained the rank of lieutenant. One of his earliest professional duties was the preparation of plans for forts at the entrance of Pembroke Haven. The mutterings of war in the East had ripened into the thunder of the guns before Sebastopol, when, in November, 1854, the young officer received orders to prepare to embark for Corfu.

Hoping, almost against hope, he contrived to obtain a short leave of absence and await the issue of events. Before a month had passed, the exigencies of the Crimean War demanded more Engineers to be sent out, and among the officers selected was Lieutenant Charles George Gordon.

BEFORE SEBASTOPOL.

Lieutenant Gordon reached Balaklava in the Golden Fleece, on the first day of 1855. He was not immediately detailed for duty, but had a week or two to make himself acquainted with the state of affairs. A dismal state it was. Gordon was not one of those men who look behind them. Had he been, he might have thought that comfortable quarters and only routine work at Corfu, or even in the Australian colonies, would have been preferable to the privations to be encountered on the frozen heights of Balaklava, or the perils of the trenches before the beleaguered fortress. The hot blood of an ardent soldier flowed in his veins. He was ready to endure that he might achieve; and to his mind the single word "duty" was a reply to all suggestions.

It is not necessary to dwell on the details of the lamentable condition of the British army. Young Gordon's baptism of blood took place amid terrible surroundings. He saw little of the glory of war at first, but a very great deal of its background of misery. In due time he was ordered to the front, to do duty in the trenches. There he found that suffering almost to the limit of endurance had endangered discipline. His especial duty was to construct rifle-pits in advance of the trenches. This work was performed exposed to an almost incessant fire from the Russians, and it is said that he frequently ran great risks from the irregular and aimless fire of his own men and the French sentries. Some of those under his command deserted, others openly mutinied, driven to desperation by the privations they endured; many of his best and bravest followers and associates fell wounded and dying around him.

The young lieutenant took part in a rush at the great Redan fort, under the lead of Sir John Campbell, who commanded the Fourth Division of the attacking force, on the 18th of June, a memorable anniversary in military annals. The assailants were repulsed with great loss. Sir John Campbell was killed. Gordon escaped, certainly not owing his safety to not being in the front.

In less than a fortnight after the vigorous attacks on the Mamelon and the Redan, Lord Raglan, the English commander, died from an attack of dysentery. His brave heart had for some time struggled against the vicissitudes and fatigues of the campaign; but he was nearly seventy years old, and no longer possessed the physical powers of the young hero who led forlorn hopes in the Peninsula more than forty years previous. In a letter to home, Lieutenant Gordon says of the dead General, "I am really sorry for him; his life has been entirely spent in the service of his country;" and adds, showing how religious considerations were ever present to his mind, "I hope he was prepared, but do not know."

Sir Harry Jones, commanding the Engineers, in his official despatches, specially mentioned Gordon as an officer who had performed gallant service; and the French Government conferred on him the cross of the Legion of Honour. Promotion was not to be obtained, as, by the constitution of the corps of Engineers, unalterable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, promotion goes by seniority, and officers are never promoted out of the corps. It is noticeable that, serving in the trenches at the same time, was another officer, who has since made a great figure in the world, Garnet Wolseley, then captain in the 90th Regiment.

On the 7th September the French carried the great Malakhoff fort, and hoisted the tricolour on the massive tower. This was the signal for an attack by the English on the Redan, another stupendous work—an attack which proved unsuccessful. The fort was entered with a rush; but so deadly was the fire opened on the assailants that, after about half an hour's occupation, a retreat was inevitable. On no occasion during the war was more brilliant courage displayed. General Wyndham and "Redan" Massey are names that live in military annals.

Another assault on the fort was arranged for the following day, the Highland regiments to lead the storming party. When morning came the Redan was entered easily enough; the defenders had disappeared, had crossed the harbour, and the town of Sebastopol was in flames. Tremendous explosions had been heard in the course of the night. The Russians had exploded their magazines, sunk their larger ships, burnt the town, and were in full retreat from the fated Sebastopol. Gordon was selected to make a plan of the works, and describes the painful sights he beheld in the course of his duty. A party had been ordered to bury the dead, and Russians and English were interred in the ditch, the Rev. W. Wright, a military chaplain, reading over their bodies the funeral service of the English church.

Colonel Chesney, a distinguished officer, who had many opportunities of observing Gordon's ability and energy, has given this testimony: "In his humble position as an Engineer subaltern he attracted the notice of his superiors, not merely by his energy and activity, but by a special aptitude for war, developing itself around the trench work before Sebastopol in a personal knowledge of the enemy's movements, such as no other officer attained. We used to send him to find out what new move the Russians were making."

After the submission of Sebastopol, Gordon was ordered to accompany the expedition to Kinburn, a necessary sequel to the siege. This important position, near the entrance to the Sea of Azov, had been strongly fortified by the Russians; but it was captured by English forces, Gordon being conspicuous for his courage in the operation. Returning to Sebastopol in February, 1856, he was engaged for four months in destroying the docks, barracks, and other naval and military structures. The operations to effect the purpose were difficult, requiring no ordinary engineering skill; but Gordon proved equal to the occasion. A mass of ruins was all that remained of the most stupendous fortress and arsenal in the Russian empire, extended to overawe Turkey and maintain Muscovite supremacy on the coasts of the Black Sea.

SURVEYING AND MAP-MAKING.

The great work of demolition being completed, in May, 1856, Gordon was appointed assistant-commissioner, for arranging the new frontier lines of Russia, Turkey, and Roumania, a task for which he was especially qualified by his skill in surveying. He was under the orders of the chief British commissioner, Major Stanton, who was associated with French, Russian, and Austrian officers. Gordon's especial duty was, with a colleague, to trace about a hundred miles of boundary, and then to compare the Russian maps with their own. It was agreeable work, carried on in a charming country, and with a constant change of scene. In the discharge of these tasks he visited many interesting places, and wrote home describing the agreeable life he was leading. But, after all, he preferred the hardships and rough work of military duty, and when, as a result of the ability he had exhibited in Bessarabia, he was selected to join Colonel (now General) Lintorne Simmons, in the task of settling the Asiatic frontiers of Russia and Turkey, he applied to the home authorities for permission to exchange. The permission was not granted. His aptitude for the work was too highly appreciated to permit his services to be dispensed with, and the reply from the Horse Guards was the telegraphic message, "Lieutenant Gordon must go."

Six months were spent in England: and then he returned to Armenia, as commissioner to complete the work of delimitation. This work occupied him about nine months, and then he came back to England, and was engaged as Field-work Instructor at Chatham. Soon after his return, he received, in April, 1859, his commission as captain, and about a month afterwards was appointed adjutant, holding that position till June, 1860.

SERVICE IN CHINA.

Probably, while engaged in his duties at Chatham, no part of the world was less thought of by Gordon than China, destined to be, before a year was over, the theatre of his greatest exploits.

Another Chinese War was in prospect. In 1856, a misunderstanding having arisen between the British and Chinese authorities, in consequence of the latter having, in the Canton river, boarded a vessel having a British colonial register, the Treaty of Tien-tsin had been arranged, one main object of which was the opening of the Chinese empire to mercantile intercourse with the Western world; but in the year following the signature of the treaty, the British envoy was stopped on the Pei-ho river, on his way to Peking.

It was, of course, impossible that Great Britain could submit to this outrageous violation of treaty obligation, and France co-operated with this country in resenting it. The Taku forts, at the mouth of the Pei-ho river, in the Gulf of Pecheli, were bombarded and captured, and active hostilities commenced. Captain Gordon was ordered to join the force sent from England, and in July, 1860, he set out. On his arrival at Hong-Kong, he heard the news of the capture of the Taku forts. On the 11th of September he left for Tientsin, the port of Peking, at the mouth of the Pei-ho, stopping for one day at the great commercial port, Shanghai. On his arrival he found that one of his old colleagues in Armenia, De Norman, with Mr. Parkes, Mr. Loch, Captains Anderson and Brabazon, Mr. Bowlby (the special correspondent of the Times), and a party, twenty-six in all, had been treacherously captured under a flag of truce by the Chinese leader, San-ko-lin-sin, and subjected to many indignities and cruelties. An attack on Peking was at once resolved on by the allies, their determination being to strike such a blow at the very heart of Chinese authority as would show the determination and power of the Western nations. In October the British and French had invested Peking, and with little difficulty entered the great city, notwithstanding that it was surrounded by walls about thirty feet high, and twenty-five feet thick at the base, and had sixteen gates, each guarded by a watch-tower, with loopholes for cannon. In the military operations, Gordon, as usual, took a conspicuous part. The town was divided into three districts, one, Kin-kehing, containing the Emperor's summer palace, a superb edifice, filled with treasures, pleasure grounds, and several temples. The allied commanders resolved to destroy the palace, as a signal mark of their occupation of the town, and as likely to make a great impression, not only on the emperor and his ministers, but on the Chinese generally.

The accounts which reached the British of the treatment to which the prisoners had been subjected aroused general indignation, and intensified the zeal for action which animated the attacking force. It was asserted that some of them were tied tightly by the wrists until the flesh mortified, and they died in the greatest torture. They had been fairly well treated till they arrived at the Summer Palace, where they were imprisoned and tortured, with the direct sanction, it was supposed, of the emperor, who was in the palace at the time. Two days' grace were given to the Chinese to arrange for the surrender, the allies in the meanwhile placing batteries, and preparing for an assault, should it be necessary. About half an hour before the expiration of the time fixed the gate was opened, and the allies took possession. Ten days were then allowed for the payment of the indemnity demanded, equivalent to £10,000 for each Englishman and £500 for each native soldier who had been killed. The money was paid, Mr. Parkes and seventeen other prisoners given up, and a treaty signed.

Although the submission of the Chinese was so complete, and the payment of the indemnity so prompt, the intention to destroy the palace was carried out. The General gave the necessary orders, and posted proclamations explaining why this course had been determined on. Looking at the matter more than twenty years afterwards, it seems impossible not to regard this act as one of the most discreditably in our military annals.

A French writer describes the acts of pillage at the palace: "No pen can adequately describe the scenes which took place. Pillage had been authorized; the grand reception room, the bedchambers, the boudoirs, all the apartments were sacked. Articles of luxury of all kinds, national and foreign, have been carried away, or broken to pieces when they could not be moved. Clocks, watches, porcelain, wardrobes, containing dresses richly embroidered with silk and gold—probably from 70,000 to 80,000 articles—have been torn down and trampled under foot. The soldiers threw them about from one to the other, each carrying away as much as he was able. They used the curtains and draperies as cords to tie up the enormous packages with which they filled their vehicles; and in the camp they use them as bed coverings. A rush of French soldiers had, the day previous to this outbreak of pillage, penetrated into the apartments, armed with sticks, and broken all the windows. They said they had done so to avenge their countrymen maltreated by the Chinese."

A TRIP TO THE GREAT WALL OF CHINA.

After this act of destruction, Gordon remained in the Camp before Peking, till the 8th of November, when the allied forces left for winter quarters at Tien-tsin, and he went thither as commanding officer of the detachment of Royal Engineers. For his services at Peking he received a medal and clasp, and was shortly afterwards raised to the rank of brevet-major. At Tien-tsin he remained about two years, but availed himself of opportunities to make various excursions into the country, and of making surveys of districts previously unvisited by Europeans. His absence from his regiment on such occasions was generally of brief duration; but one excursion of greater length introduced him to a remote part of the vast country with which it is not much to say Englishmen generally and many of the Chinese themselves were profoundly unacquainted. The Great Wall of China has long enjoyed a renown as one of the wonders of the world, but it has been more talked about than visited by travellers. Very naturally this enormous work was an object of interest to an officer of Engineers, as the most stupendous specimen of defences against invasion in the pre-artillery period. He found a congenial companion in Lieutenant Cardew, of the 67th Regiment, with whom he set out on horseback in December, 1861, attended by a Chinese lad, who knew a little English, and acted as interpreter.

A FALSE PROPHET AND A REBELLION.

It is necessary now to refer at some length to one of the most important events in the modern history of China—the great Taiping movement, which attained enormous dimensions, and bade fair to change the royal dynasty. Without investigating the causes and conduct of that rebellion we should fail to understand the reasons why Major Gordon, by permission of the British military authorities, entered the service of the Emperor of China. The difference of opinion as to the objects and practices of the rebels which existed in this country was remarkable; and as we proceed in the narrative we shall see how Gordon was exposed to a perfect storm of misrepresentation and calumny. The heavier charges against him were satisfactorily disposed of, and others have been answered in the light of later and clearer information on the subject.

Trusting to the statements of certain missionaries, whose zeal may charitably be supposed to have outrun their knowledge, the religious public at home were led to believe that the Taiping rising was a great Christian movement, a kind of crusade against the false doctrines, immoral practices, and practical heathenism prevalent in the empire. That the leaders made a profession of a certain sort of Christianity is certain; that they troubled themselves about Christian practices is by no means satisfactorily established. The truth seems to be that the rebellion had a national and political origin, the object at first being to subvert the Mantchoo Tartar dynasty, which for more than two hundred years had been supreme, and replace it by the representatives of the native Chinese Sovereigns, known as the dynasty of Ming, who had been driven from the throne by the Mantchoos.

The Taiping rebellion originated in Kwang-tun, the south-eastern province of the empire, including the great commercial port Canton. Great discontent had existed in this province since the Opium War, 1842, and pirates, bandits, and members of secret societies kept the district in perpetual turmoil, and fomented the popular dissatisfaction. In 1850 a man named Hung-tan-tseun, of the peasant class, who had been occupied as a village schoolmaster in the Canton district, announced that he held a Divine mission to drive out the Mantchoos and re-establish the Ming dynasty. He speedily surrounded himself with a numerous body of followers, a great number believing in his claim to be an inspired prophet, but thousands more accepting him as leader in an insurrection against the Imperial government. Hung, it is said, had, as far back as 1817, applied to a missionary to baptize him, but the rite was refused on the ground of his imperfect acquaintance with the doctrines of Christianity.

The more eagerly followers crowded to the standard of the new prophet, the more extravagant grew his pretensions. He saw visions, announced that he was the divinely appointed champion of the poor and oppressed, and so gained the adherence of vast numbers, for the poor and distressed rose eagerly enough, grasped at every opportunity which promised to bring them relief, and were ready to believe anybody who, like Hung-tan-tseun, offered to lead them on the road to independence and, perhaps, to wealth. A few shrewd observers thought he was mad, but they were in the minority, and prudently did not obtrude their opinion on the subject. Hung made no concealment of his pursuit of a political object, as well as of a religious mission; announcing that the restoration of the Mings must be effected before the religious reform could be accomplished. He announced that God had specially revealed himself to him, and announced that he was the "younger brother" of Jesus Christ. Some of the missionaries who afterwards, strangely enough, defended his career, asserted that this phrase "younger brother" was an ordinary term of courtesy in use throughout the empire, and meant only a devoted follower. But it is certain that the followers of Hung understood the words in a very different sense, and regarded their leader as a Divine, or, at the least, a specially favoured and specially inspired person.

At the head of a considerable army—if an undisciplined rabble deserves the name—Hung traversed the province, ravaging as he went, and encountering, with varied success, parties of the Imperialist soldiery sent against him by the Mandarin commanding the provinces. Sometimes he was hard pressed, and had recourse to many stratagems to avoid capture.

The large town of Tai-tsin was captured and occupied, and there the Taipings received a large increase of adherents. In the early months of 1851, it was estimated that Hung had under his leadership an army numbering about three hundred thousand. In August, 1851, the rebels possessed themselves of the city of Yung-nan, in Quang-si, the province lying to the north of Quang-tun, and there he issued a proclamation in which he announced himself as the Heavenly King, and appointed five other subordinate kings, or Wangs, at first his own relatives (in this respect unconsciously imitating the example of the great Napoleon); but, as he punished the least disobedience on their part by decapitation, vacancies occasionally occurred, and they were filled by the appointment of the ablest fighting generals of his army. Some of them, intoxicated with their sudden elevation to kingly rank, exhibited considerably more ambition than was agreeable to the supreme Wang, and one even had the temerity to claim Divine honour, and asserted that he was the Holy Ghost. It may be added, rather unnecessarily, perhaps, after what has been already said, that he did not live long afterwards. The five Wangs were known as the Faithful King, the Eastern King, the Western King, the Warrior King, and the Attendant King. Of these high and mighty potentates, Chung-wan, or the Faithful King, possessed the greatest ability and energy. Of course, they were all greatly respected, unlimited power to administer bamboo flogging and decapitation being calculated to inspire a wholesome reverence in the minds of their followers; but it did not prevent the conferring of nicknames, by which they were more generally known than by the sounding titles conferred by the Heavenly King. Three of the Wangs were described as the Yellow Tiger, the One-Eyed Dog, and Cock-Eye; and not improbably the kings themselves regarded the epithets as rather complimentary, as Red Indian chiefs are pleased to be known as Great Snakes or Sitting Bulls.

PROGRESS OF THE REBELLION.

In the course of 1852 and 1853, several important cities were captured, the most important success being the possession of Hang-chow, the capital of the eastern province of Che-Keang, on the great river, Tien-tsang. In the time when the Mongols ruled in China it was the capital of the empire; and in later days its magnificence was proverbial. The possession of this rich and splendid city was a great acquisition to the Taipings, who appropriated an immense amount of treasure.

GENERAL GORDON.

An even greater achievement was projected and successfully performed—the capture of Nanking (or Nankin, as the name is commonly spelt by Europeans), the old capital of the Ming dynasty, and now known as the “southern capital;” ranking next to Peking, as the second city in the empire. It is situate on the Yang-tse-Kiang, that magnificent river which traverses the centre of the Chinese dominions from east to west, and brings down the products of some of the wealthiest districts. On the 19th of March, 1853, this renowned city was taken by assault, and the Taipings removed thither the treasure they had seized in Hwang-chow. Nanking itself was ravaged, and one of the architectural glories of China—the famous Porcelain Tower—erected in the fifteenth century by the Emperor Yang-Loh, and 322 feet high, was destroyed, apparently out of sheer wanton mischief.

The Heavenly King selected Nanking as the royal residence, and formed a Court on the model of the Imperial Court at Peking. The Chinese Government attempted, but unsuccessfully to drive out the rebels, who repelled them, and sent a considerable force northward, which plundered every town on its way, and even threatened the province of Pe-tche-li, in which Peking is situated. He had subjugated and devastated an extent of territory about equal in dimensions to the united area of England and France, and containing a population of at least 80,000,000. Wealth, which in its amount appears almost fabulous, was at his command, and he wielded despotic power. Notwithstanding his pretensions as a specially-inspired religious teacher, he was a gross sensualist, tyrannous, and atrociously cruel.

The papers laid on the table in the House of Commons, referring to the Taipings, contain many interesting letters and official despatches. It is not often, indeed, that a Blue-book is so readable.

The true character of the Taipings is shown in the official despatches and enclosed letters for private persons who had visited Nanking and who were enabled to form independent opinions.

AN INSULT TO GREAT BRITAIN.

When, in 1858, the Earl of Elgin, the British plenipotentiary, went up the Yang-tse river, he found the Taipings in possession of most of the important towns on the banks. The steamer in which he made the excursion was fired on from one of the fortified places. The fire was returned, and the town bombarded and entered. It was then discovered that the Taipings had evacuated it, having slaughtered most of the inhabitants; and the town was in ruins. The Taiping leaders afterwards asserted that the firing on the vessel with Lord Elgin on board was a mistake on the part of the commandant of the forts.

In May, 1863, the rebels gained a great victory over a hundred thousand of the Imperialists outside Nanking, and then advanced to Soochow, or Sou-tcheou, the former being the orthography most familiar to Englishmen. It is a very large and important city in the maritime province of Kiang-su, with a population estimated at about a million, and a great trade emporium, with access by the Imperial Canal, a waterway, about seven hundred miles, constructed to unite the Yang-tse and the rivers of the south, and give a comparatively easy access by water to Peking. The rebels, as usual looted the town; and so great was the amount of treasure captured that three weeks were occupied in removing it to Nanking.

MEASURES FOR THE DEFENCE OF SHANGHAI.

The English authorities had hitherto held aloof from the contest between the Imperialists and the rebels; but circumstances occurred which rendered it impossible the attitude of neutrality could be maintained. We and our allies, the French, were in open hostility with the Chinese; and, from a military point of view, the action of the Taipings, as a great embarrassment to the government, was favourable to us. But the great mercantile city, Shanghai, the most important seaport of China, was now threatened, and in Shanghai were large establishments and factories occupied by English, French, and American merchants. English merchants possessed ship-yards, docks, and engineering establishments. The wealthy Chinese merchants of Shanghai, alarmed at the near approach of the Taipings, had undertaken to provide the necessary funds if the governor of the province would enlist a force of foreigners to defend the city.

The Chinese authorities permitted the organization and equipment of a small force of foreigners under the leadership of an American named Ward a sailor filibuster, who had taken part in Walker's ill-starred expedition to Nicaragua. He was a brave man, and his experience of irregular fighting gained in America promised to be of service. With him was united, as second in command, another adventurer named Burgevine, who had seen a good deal of fighting in his time; but whose antecedents, like those of Ward, it was as well to allow to “rest in the shade.” The force led by these worthies consisted of American sailors, with a taste for seeing life, and a miscellaneous collection of rowdies, who might be trusted to take care of any probable loot that came in their way. The English and French ambassadors, decided to assist the authorities in protecting Shanghai from attack.

By the middle of 1860, the Taipings had advanced within twenty miles of Shanghai, and occupied a small town named Sung-Kiang. A reward was offered to Ward if he could retake this place; and, with a little force of about a hundred sailors, he attempted the feat. He had, however, greatly miscalculated the strength of the enemy, and was repulsed with considerable loss. Aided, however, by a body of Chinese soldiers, he made another attempt and was successful in driving out the Taipings. Being joined by more adventurous, he made various raids on the rebel position. His success, however, was of brief duration; and Chung Wang advanced towards Shanghai, but was driven back by British and French troops, the defence of the great commercial city being an object of the greatest interest to both nations. Great Britain, as a nation, had no wish to interfere with the Taipings, except so far as the defence of the great commercial ports against their attacks was concerned; and Admiral Sir James Hope, our naval commander-in-chief on the Chinese station, sailed up the river for the purpose of visiting those ports on its banks which had been opened up to foreign trade by the Convention of Peking. In February, 1861, the admiral reached Nanking, and entered into communication with the rebel leaders. An understanding was arrived at that there should be no interference with the river trade, and that for the space of one year Shanghai was to be unmolested by the Taiping army.

This convention was faithfully observed. The rebels passed the year in various endeavours to effect the occupation of the valley of the Yang-tse, but met with many reverses; and by the time when the year's truce had expired, were again in the neighbourhood of Shanghai. Hung, the rebel leader, then formally announced to Admiral Hope that he intended to make another attack on the port, receiving a reply to the effect that he would do so at his peril, for the force would certainly be resisted.

Chung Wang was ordered to march against Shanghai in January, 1862, and that act was the cause of the open co-operation of the allies with the force under Ward, who was at Sung-Kiang, with about a thousand Chinese, fairly well drilled, and led by European officers, under his command.

The English and French commanders, with Ward's force, and in conjunction with an army of Imperialists, resolved to clear the country from the Taipings for thirty miles round the town. Heavy fighting followed, and in it Gordon took part. The French admiral was killed, and Admiral Hope was wounded. In September Ward was killed, and Burgevine was appointed to succeed him as leader of the little army which he had commanded.

This worthy soon showed the metal he was made of. He went to Shanghai with a hundred 'picked men, well armed with rifles, entered the house of the mandarin who was the local treasurer, and demanded money for the payment of arrears to his men. The mandarin, who refused to comply with this demand, was struck by Burgevine, who sent his men into the treasury, with orders to take away forty thousand dollars. This act immediately led to his dismissal from the command of the contingent, by the governor of the province, Li-Hung-Chang.

and another British officer, Major Brennan, had been defeated in their expeditions; but on the very day of the repulse of the former (in February, 1863), in an attempt to storm the strongly-fortified town, Taitan, a despatch arrived sanctioning the placing a British officer in command of the force, and Brevet Major Gordon was at once appointed, and immediately set to work to complete the organisation of the army under his control. The commissioned officers were all foreigners, the

GORDON IN COMMAND.

In January, 1863, General (afterwards Sir Charles) Staveley, chief of the British forces in China, being applied to for advice and assistance, recommended Captain Gordon to the permanent command, if his Government should approve of its being taken by a British officer. Captain Holland, chief of Staveley's staff, took temporary charge of the "Ch'ang Sheng Chi'un," or "Ever-Victorious Army," the name with which the Chinese had glorified the foreign contingent, destined shortly afterwards to deserve the title. Holland majority American, and including English, French, Germans, and Spaniards. Their sensitiveness and national jealousies gave some trouble, overcome by Gordon's resolution and tact. The non-commissioned officers were all Chinese, selected from the ranks. The drill of the force was on the British model, and words of command were given in English.

THE GREAT CAMPAIGN.

It would require far more space than is at our disposal to relate all the events of the war against the Taipings. On the 25th of March, 1863, Major Gordon assumed active command of the foreign contingent. The district between Shanghai and the Imperial Canal is traversed by navigable canals and natural watercourses, which greatly facilitated Gordon's operations.

Two steam-vessels were placed at his disposal, and on board of them he embarked about a thousand infantry and two hundred of his artillery. Many British officers applied to General Brown, who had succeeded General Staveley as commander of the forces at Shanghai, for permission to join Gordon; and probably more would have done so, had not such a step involved, according to Horse Guards regulations, retirement on half-pay. Permission was given, subject to Gordon's approval, and he selected some of those whose qualifications appeared to be most suitable to the work to be done. Aided by this reinforcement of trained and competent officers, he was able to get rid of some of the old officers who had served under Ward and Burgevine, and whose notions of warfare were rather in accordance with the practices of those leaders than with the military discipline Gordon was determined to enforce. Brilliant success followed brilliant success. The name "The Ever-Victorious Army" was given to Gordon's force. The Taipings had possession of many strongly-fortified positions; but they were stormed and captured.

Shanghai is situated near the eastern extremity of a peninsula, formed by the Yang-tso on the north and the open sea on the east and south. Sung-Kiang, the head-quarters of the contingent force, is about twenty-two miles to the south-west of Shanghai; and the western limit of the peninsula may be approximately fixed at the Imperial, or Grand, Canal, which has already been mentioned. On this canal, and a little more than twenty miles to the west of Shanghai, is the great city of Soochow, one of the most important strongholds of the rebels; and a short distance farther west is the Taiho Lake, a sheet of water about forty miles in greatest breadth, and nearly of the same extent from north to south. Taitsan, thirty miles north-west of Shanghai, still remained in the possession of the rebels, and a road lead thence to Quinsan, another Taiping stronghold, and, beyond, to Soochow. A little consideration of the position thus described will show that the rebels held a formidable line of strong positions nearly across the peninsula, from Taitsan, on the east, to Soochow, on the west, the distance between these towns being about thirty five miles, with Quinsan, strongly fortified and garrisoned, in the centre. That this line of defence must be demolished before Shanghai could be considered to be in safety was evident, and before taking any further movements, Gordon set to work to mature a plan of operation.

'To make his army efficient was his first care. He reorganised it after the European model. It was nearly four thousand strong," and consisted of infantry regiments, with four siege batteries and two field batteries. The uniform was of dark sergo, with green turbans. The force, indeed, under the lead of the Americans, resembled a horde of brigands, rather than regular troops. Gordon at once substituted regular and liberal payment. An alteration which should have met with general approbation; but at which some grumbled considerably.

BURGEVINE'S MANŒUVRES.

He received cordial support from the Chinese governor of the province, the intelligent and able Li-Hung-Chang, a mandarin of the Yellow Button, and as we have already said, one of the most distinguished and influential of the Imperial officials. There had been intriguing at Peking, whither Burgevine had repaired after his dismissal, with the intention of appealing to Prince Kung, the chief administrator of the empire. His cause was warmly advocated by the American minister, who, it would seem, permitted his national sympathies to overrule his better judgment; but the representations of Li-Hung-Chang (or more briefly, Li, by which shortened name it will be convenient to refer to him in future) in favour of Gordon were so vigorous and earnest that intercession was of no avail.

EXECUTIONS OF PRISONERS.

Before the vigorous operation of Gordon, Taitsan fell, after desperate fighting, in which the loss on both sides was great.

Some of the Taipings were made prisoners by the Imperialists after the siege, and handed over to Governor Li. Seven of them were recognised as having been principally engaged in the treacherous act by which so many lives had been sacrificed, and it was resolved to make terrible examples of them by the infliction of death, accompanied by horrible tortures. When Gordon heard of this determination, he protested vigorously; but the prisoners were in the hands of mandarins over whom he had no control whatever, and he was powerless to prevent the execution. The wretched prisoners were, previous to decapitation, tied up and exposed to public view for about five hours, with arrows pierced through various parts of the body, and pieces of skin flayed from the arms.

This sanguinary punishment excited the indignation of the British commander, General Brown, who immediately informed Governor Li that the repetition of such an act would inevitably lead to the withdrawal of his troops, and the refusal of further assistance to the Imperial cause. Gordon.

GENERAL GORDON.

we have seen, made an ineffectual protest. The English residents were greatly shocked by the barbarity of the proceedings; and as bad news seldom loses much in travelling, by the time the intelligence had reached Shanghai and Hong-Kong, the executions—cruel enough, in all conscience, as it was in reality—was made even more horrible by the invention of additional details. Correspondents of the Shanghai Shipping News and other papers, writing under the signatures "Eye-witness," "Justice and Mercy," and other noms de plume, contributed most harrowing accounts, creditable to their power of imagination, if not to their scrupulous veracity. What the poor wretches suffered was bad enough, but not so bad as the so-called eye-witnesses alleged. The Bishop of Victoria, Hong-Kong, communicated with one of these writers, and at a private interview received such a terrible account of the executions that he immediately wrote to the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Lord John Russell, adding that there was no doubt of the truth of the statements he had received. Gordon wrote to the Shanghai Shipping News an earnest denial of his complicity in these cruelties.

Gordon was, of course, greatly annoyed by these imputations on his character, which represented him as an unscrupulous and mercenary soldier of fortune, ready to connive at any atrocities perpetrated by his allies. Difficulties of another kind were present. Notwithstanding the strict discipline he had endeavoured to establish in his force, the old Adam prevailed, and his Chinese soldiers looted considerably after the capture of Taitsan. Gordon resolved not to inflict immediate severe punishment, but further to develop his plans of military organisation.

• TROUBLES IN THE ARMY.

On more than one occasion a mutinous spirit was developed. Some of the officers, jealous of appointments made by Gordon, sent in their resignation, thinking to coerce Gordon, who, however, calmly accepted them; but, on the officers apologising, restored them to their position. On another occasion, some of the troops refused to fall in on parade, and, when threatened with punishment, set up loud groans. With a true instinct, Gordon picked out the ringleader, a corporal, and had him shot on the spot. The men, staggered by this display of energy, at once submitted.

The large city of Quinsan, strongly garrisoned by the rebels, had been invested by the Chinese army under General Ching; but no success was obtained till the arrival of Gordon, with his steamer the Hyson, and a flotilla of about fifty gunboats. A fierce bombardment drove out the garrison, who endeavoured to make their escape to Soochow; but the road passed near the canal, and a vigorous fire from the Hyson threw them into utter confusion, and an immense number were slaughtered.

Gordon and the Chinese general Ching did not work harmoniously together. The latter was disposed to take all the credit of the achievements of the "Ever Victorious Army;" but, finding what a lion he had aroused, made a very humble apology.

Burgovine, who had now taken service with the Taipings, opened communication with some of Gordon's officers, some of whom preferred the adventurer's unprincipled practice in the way of "loot" to the discipline enforced by the British leader. They gained nothing by their dissatisfaction. This time, as before, Gordon was their match.

ADVANCE ON SOOCHOW.

Several other successes against fortified towns followed, in the attack on which Gordon exhibited the utmost personal courage, leading storming parties, without arms generally, but directing his men with a small cane, which they named "the wand of victory." Preparation was then made for attacking the great city of Soochow, strongly fortified, and protected by long lines of redoubts. The defence was desperate, and more than one storming party was repulsed, with heavy loss.

In some of the actions prisoners had been made, and General Ching had cruelly executed some of them. Disgusted with these proceedings, Gordon resolved to resign his command, and the condition of his army strengthened his resolution. Already there had been numerous desertions from his force; many of his officers were discontented, and likely to repeat, under circumstances more favourable to their designs, the acts of insubordination, which he had previously subdued by his resolute attitude. He was, besides, in receipt of letters from his friends, and persons in authority at home, telling him that he was in a false position, and urging him to resign at once. The Chinese Government, from which he had earned the right to expect support, were indifferent or half-hearted; and even his friend, Governor Li, who had given him on several occasions great encouragement, had not yet learned to fully appreciate his character, and not unnaturally was disposed to listen to the representations made by his own countrymen.

The actual state of affairs, however, induced Gordon to reconsider his determination. Had he persisted, the "Ever-Victorious Army" would inevitably have been disbanded, no other officer being qualified to step into his place; and most probably the greater number of the men would transfer themselves, well-armed and trained as they were, to the Taipings, who, thus reinforced, might repossess themselves of the towns captured by

GENERAL GORDON.

Gordon, devastate the country, adding to the lust of plunder a spirit of revenge; and even Shanghai might be endangered. His arduous labour, his military successes, all might be rendered of no avail, if he, the master-spirit, threw up his position. It was not egotism, but experience, in some instances of a very painful kind, that made Gordon conscious of his own value.

AN ESCAPE FROM DEATH.

At a place named Putachow, on the great canal, an old bridge had partially been destroyed, and twenty-six of the Arabs had fallen in. One evening shortly afterwards, Gordon was sitting on the parapet of the broken bridge, enjoying a cigar, and perhaps taking a quiet survey of the great fortress occupied by the rebels, when the stone on which he was sitting was struck by two shots fired by some of his own men, who were ignorant of the whereabouts of their leader. When the second shot was fired, he prepared to descend from his elevated position, thinking, it may be supposed, that it was scarcely worth while to expose himself to further danger. In the little boat in which he had rowed to the bridge, he crossed the creek, on the other side of which was his camp, to enquire the reason why the shots had been fired. He had but just drawn clear of the bridge when that part on which he had been sitting fell with a crash, and his boat only narrowly escaped being smashed.

BURGEVINE'S OVERTURES.

Burgevine and some of the Europeans in the service of the Taipings soon wearied of their new masters, and the latter sent to Gordon at Putachow, asking him to have an interview with Burgevine, the conference to take place on a bridge between the lines of the opposing forces. Gordon acceded to this request, well knowing, from the treacherous character of the man, that he incurred a danger in doing so. Burgevine told him that he and his men had resolved to quit the rebel service; but they had reason to fear the action of Imperial authorities, whose reputation for dealing in a peculiarly decisive manner with those who had taken arms against them amply justified any apprehensions the renegades might entertain. Gordon undertook that the authorities at Shanghai should overlook the offences of the renegades, and even offered to receive some of the men into his own force, and assist the others to leave the country.

No definite understanding was arrived at; and it soon became evident that the artful and ambitious American had another card to play. Another interview was arranged, and at it Burgevine cautiously revealed his plans. He cared nothing for Imperialists or Taipings; but with the vivid imagination and the scorn of probabilities which appear to be natural to the filibustering mind, he had indulged in a vision of an independent kingdom in China, of which he would be the monarch. This was wild enough, but quite as wild was the expectation that he could induce a man of Gordon's stamp to join him in attempting such an enterprise. His suggestion was that he and Gordon should attack and capture Soochow, drive out both rebels and Imperialists, seize all the treasure in the city, and having the means to induce followers to rally round them, march on Peking, which would, of course, immediately succumb—the Manchoo emperor would be dethroned, and Burgevine would reign in his stead.

It was characteristic of Gordon that, although he must have entertained a sincere contempt for the double-dealing and treachery of Burgevine, he endeavoured to save him from the punishment which he thought it likely the Taipings might inflict on him on discovering the advances he had made to the English leader; and the plan of escape, unfortunately for him, frustrated, so far as he was himself concerned.

THE FALL OF SOOCHOW.

Gordon removed his headquarters from Quinsun to a position about eight miles from the east gate of Soochow. He was greatly impeded in his plans by the wilfulness and arrogance of the Chinese general, Ching, who did not choose to consult the English commander and act in concert with him. The British authorities at Shanghai were strongly of opinion that success at Soochow was impossible, so long as the English major was hampered by the independent action of the Imperial army. Gordon's hopes of a surrender of the city were discouraged by the obstinacy of Ching, who persisted in making futile attacks on the east gate, and so rendering negotiations almost impossible. The Shanghai merchants, and the British stationed there, openly asserted that unless Gordon was placed in supreme command of the allied forces, defeat would be inevitable. No attention was given by the Imperialist authorities to this demand, and the popular leader was left to do the best he could. His force was reduced in numbers; many of his men were prostrated by sickness, and in others, he well knew, a mutinous disposition was latent.

When Soochow was completely invested, four of the five Wangs in authority there, opened negotiations for the surrender of the place; but were stoutly resisted by Moh Wang, who held the first command, and who resolved to fight to the death.

A MURDER.

Moh Wang was soon made aware of the scheme of surrender, and sent for the six other Wangs, to consult with them on the subject. They assembled in the great reception hall, and the question of capitulation was fully discussed. Nothing could induce Moh Wang to consent to such an arrangement. He was for fighting to the last. One of the Wangs supported him; the others took the opposite side. Getting excited, the conference grew into a quarrel, and the fierce natures of the Wangs were aroused. One of the most violent, Kong Wang, sprang to his feet, rushed at Moh Wang, and stabbed him nine times in the back. The others then assisted him to carry the dying man into the outer court, and there he was beheaded.

Having disposed of opposition in this peremptory and barbarous manner, the surviving Wangs surrendered the city. Gordon, dreading the scenes which might follow the entrance of his men into the place, withdrew them to a considerable distance.

Gordon had stipulated with both Governor Li (who had joined the Imperialist army) and Ching, that so long as he held command, warfare should be conducted in accordance with the practice of the western nations; that prisoners, either taken in actual fight, or on voluntary surrender, should be treated with humanity. This had been promised; and, although he was well aware of the cruelties habitually practised by the Chinese military, yet, after his appealing to Governor Li, and the assurances he had received, he felt justified in supposing that he might depend upon their observance. General Ching, on his part, was lavish in his promises that Gordon's wishes in this regard should be complied with, and to these promises Gordon unfortunately trusted.

Returning from Quinsan, after re-establishing his force in their quarters, he entered Soochow unaccompanied, and was met by Ching, who told him that Governor Li had sent instructions that all those who surrendered were to be mercifully treated. This announcement greatly gratified Gordon, who had, during the negotiations for surrender, assured the Wangs that he could promise them honourable treatment on the part of the Chinese. This promise had been made on the faith of Li's assurances. On the following morning he again visited the city, and was informed that the Wangs were that day to go out and formally deliver the keys of the city to Li, who had arrived at the scene of action.

They went, and it was afterwards proved in the course of an official investigation, almost beyond the possibility of doubt, that, from the first, Li and Ching intended to deceive Gordon with fair promises, and to kill the Wangs directly they were in their power. With consummate hypocrisy, the surrendered chiefs were received with apparent, even effusive friendliness, and Li spoke to them of the rank and decorations they would receive from the Imperial Government in return for surrendering the city. General Ching then entered into conversation with them until a gang of executioners appeared on the scene, and the terrible deed was perpetrated.

The murder of the Wangs was but a sample of the remorseless barbarity of the Imperialists. It afterwards appeared the massacres of the inhabitants of Soochow, including women and children, took place with the full knowledge and sanction of Li and Ching. It has, indeed, been stated that thirty thousand lives were sacrificed, many in the most revolting manner.

General Brown, in his official report to Sir Frederick Bruce, the ambassador in China, fully exonerated Gordon from any complicity in, or even knowledge of the terrible occurrence; and the consuls representing foreign nations at Shanghai passed resolutions expressive of abhorrence at the conduct of the Imperialists. Subsequently, however, Li defended the execution of the Wangs on the ground of their suspected treachery, and the necessity of making a terrible example of the leaders of the great rebellion. Gordon was greatly excited, and pursued Li with a revolver, determined to take his life as a penalty for his cruel double-dealing; but he, however, contrived to evade him; and Gordon recovered the habitual control of his temper. The matter was discussed in the House of Commons; but Gordon was personally exonerated from any share in the terrible transaction.

A SLANDEROUS PAMPHLET.

In 1864, a pamphlet was published violently condemning the conduct of Gordon. It was entitled, "The Taipings As They Are, by 'One of Them.'" It was founded chiefly on statements by a missionary named Lobschied, and maintained that the Taipings were really great religious reformers and apostles of civilisation in China.

This precious pamphlet was introduced to the British public by a clergyman, the Rev. Dr. Worthington, who accepted all the statements as absolute truth, and appeared to be animated by a noble ambition to equal or even excel the author in the art of vituperation. In an introductory chapter, Dr. Worthington asserted: "Of the 40,000 prisoners who surrendered at Soochow, 32,000 were butchered before the eyes of Major Gordon, under such circumstances of torture, horror, cruelty, even to unborn babes, as far to exceed the worst ravages of the monster commonly known as Timur the Tartar.

REWARDS REFUSED.

At Peking, Governor Li's defence was readily accepted, but it was thought necessary to compliment Gordon, and thereby conciliate the British authorities, who were persistently pressing the

GENERAL GORDON.

Government at Peking on the subject of the massacre. An Imperial decree was therefore promulgated, in which it was stated that Brigadier-General Gordon had greatly distinguished himself "in command of Li's auxiliary force," and ordaining that a medal of distinction and a donation of a thousand taels (about £250) should be awarded him. He was also to receive a decoration of the first class.

The Governor sent the decorations, the thousand taels, and various gifts to Gordon, together with extra pay for his troops, and additional money for such as had been wounded. Gordon willingly received the money for his men, but rejected the gifts to himself as an insult, after the treatment he had received, and the cool assurance with which Li had taken to himself all the merit of the great achievement. When the messengers arrived carrying the bowls of money, in Chinese fashion, he seized his famous cane, and, we are told, "flogged them from the chamber."

RESUMPTION OF THE COMMAND.

It was not long before Gordon heard enough to convince him that ruthless barbarity was an inevitable feature of Chinese warfare. Two thousand fugitives from Soochow had made their way to Wosieh, where the Taiping leader, Chung-Wang, the Faithful King, was in command. He found such an arrival very inconvenient, and he disposed of the fugitives, his own adherents, by the summary process of beheading them. With such combatants, the war might become a competition in the art of massacre, instead of fair and open fighting. Gordon had already begun to reconsider his position.

To hold back now would be worse than to go on. Without him the contest promised to be protracted and most sanguinary. With him once more at the head of his troops, he felt that a series of successes might be achieved, which would speedily stamp out the rebellion.

He therefore consented to an official reconciliation with Li and General Ching, who had only acted in accordance with recognised rules of Chinese warfare, which made the killing of chiefs, who might fairly be supposed to influence the masses of their fellow men, not only expedient, but absolutely necessary. He visited Li at Soochow, and arranged that the latter should issue a proclamation exonerating him from all participation in the massacre.

SYMPTOMS OF THE END.

With the fall of Soochow, the back of the rebellion was broken. There were other fortified towns, and in attacking some of them there was desperate fighting. One large city, Noshan, was abandoned by the Faithful King, who declined to meet the attack of Gordon's force. At Kingtang, another strong place, Gordon received his only wound in the campaign, being shot in the leg while leading a storming party. He was carried aboard one of the boats, but, though unable to stand, directed operations.

One by one the strongholds fell; and Nanking, where the pretender had established his court, and which had been closely invested by a Chinese force, so that supplies failed, capitulated. General Ching, who, whatever his failings might have been, was a brave soldier, was killed in storming a town named Kashing-fu, on the Imperial Canal. He possessed considerable military knowledge. He must be judged by a Chinese, not by a British, standard. In military operations, as carried on by his countrymen, humanity has no place. Kill your enemy and he will not fight again, is one maxim; and do the best you can for yourself, is another in general acceptance. The great Taiping rebellion was subdued. The Heavenly King had been urged to escape. His dream of empire had been rudely shattered; but, animated either by fanaticism, which had affected his brain, or by native resolution, he resolved to hold out to the last. When the chiefs of his followers wished him to escape, and escape would not have been difficult, he maintained the assumption of Divine power in which the most enthusiastic of the Taipings had now ceased to believe. He had a commission direct from God and from his elder brother Jesus; he was the sole lord of ten thousand nations. When, at length, he knew the end was come, this strange being, who "had been guilty of cruelties greater than are accredited to any other human being—flaying alive and pounding to death being his ordinary modes of punishment"—this reformer of the national religion, according to the authors of the famous pamphlet and its preface, ended his life in a manner worthy of his antecedents. First he hanged all his wives, and they were many, and then he committed suicide. His greatest leader, the renowned Chung Wang, the Faithful King, was among the prisoners taken, and was without delay beheaded, with some other leading men. Fewer atrocities were perpetrated on the garrison and inhabitants of Nanking than had taken place after the capture of any important position; and this improvement was attributed to the influence Gordon exercised over the mandarins.

Prince Kung, the Chinese minister, sent an official despatch to Sir Frederick Bruce, acknowledging in the highest terms of eulogy, the services of Gordon, and requesting that Her Britannic Majesty's Government would be pleased to recognise them. In forwarding this despatch to Earl Russell, then at the head of the Foreign Office, Sir Frederick wrote: "Independently of the skill and courage he has shown, his disinterestedness has elevated our national character in the eyes of the Chinese."

He had conferred on him the rank of Titu, the highest in the Chinese army, the Order of the Star, the Peacock's Feather, and the Yellow Jacket, which constituted him one of the highest mandarins forming the body-guard of the empire.

Before leaving Shanghai, the merchants presented him with an engrossed and illuminated address.

A QUIET AND USEFUL LIFE AT HOME.

On his return to this country at the end of 1864, he might easily have been the "lion of the season," but he declined the position. Never, probably, had a man who had really achieved distinction, so great an aversion to publicity; and nothing annoyed him more than any endeavour to give prominence to his personal achievements.

Soon after his return he was appointed Commanding Royal Engineer at Gravesend for the protection of the Thames. One of his first occupations was to forward the various rewards and medals bestowed on those of his old comrades in China who had distinguished themselves.

While residing at Gravesend, Gordon employed the time he could spare from his military duties in works of kindness and active benevolence, visiting the sick, aiding the distressed, and teaching in the ragged school. A sincere member of the Church of England, and regular attendant at the parish church, he exhibited a spirit of practical Christianity not invariably associated with active profession. He visited the sick, relieved the poor, visited and consoled the dying. He especially interested himself in rescuing boys from lives of idleness and degradation, clothing, lodging, and boarding some till he could procure employment for them. For many he obtained berths on board ship. He remained six years at Gravesend.

NEW WORK.

In 1871, when the European Commission of the Danube was appointed, official opinion pointed to General Gordon as the best qualified person to act as British Commissioner, which he did till 1873.

A GREAT POSITION.

During his Commissionership, Nubar Pasha asked Gordon whether he knew of any officer of the engineers who would be willing to fill an official vacancy. He would not at once give an answer; but in July, 1873, he informed Nubar, by letter, that he himself would accept the post, if, on the Khedive's own application to the English Government for his services, permission were granted. A favourable answer being received, he returned to England, and at the close of the year started for Cairo. His new position was that of Governor of the Soudan.

His diary when in that office is a record of continuous effort, and almost as continuous disappointment; of mutinous conduct of the small force at his disposal; of the insincerity of the Egyptian authorities at Cairo.

After three years of travelling, negotiations, and fighting, Gordon returned to England; but the Khedive pressed him to undertake another mission to the Soudan, and he again went to Cairo.

The second expedition was even more arduous than the first; and in July, 1879, Gordon left the Soudan after the Khedive Ismail had been deposed in favour of his son, Tewfik.

UNSUITABLE APPOINTMENTS.

Soon after his return to England he accepted the position of private secretary to Lord Ripon, but resigned on reaching Bombay. Afterwards an invitation from his old associate, Li-Hung-Chang, induced him to revisit China.

Early in 1882 he took command of troops in Cape Colony, but soon relinquished that position.

After quitting the Cape Colony, he made a brief visit to London, and then started for Jerusalem, where he occupied himself in making surveys of the walls of the city, the Holy Sepulchre, and other buildings; and, in addition, greatly interested himself in the proposition to connect the River Jordan by canal with the Red Sea. Coming back to this country, he again entered into negotiations with the King of the Belgians relative to the Congo, but these were broken off by a summons to London, where he was induced to undertake the enterprise which proved to be his last. In twenty-four hours he was on his way to Egypt, accompanied by Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart, and they made their way alone from Cairo to the Soudan.

ARRIVAL AT KHARTOUM.

It was in February, 1884, that General Gordon arrived at Khartoum. His progress southwards from Cairo had been a continuous triumph. At Berber he was welcomed by the Soudani population with every manifestation of enthusiasm and delight. The welcome which he received at Khartoum was as enthusiastic as that which had been accorded to him at Berber. But the Soudanise could not understand why the great Pasha should assume the title and dignities of Governor-General of the Soudan if his object was to evacuate the country.

ACTIVE OPERATIONS.

In less than a month after Gordon's arrival at Khartoum, the Mahdi and his Emirs, or lieutenants, succeeded in spreading the insurrection throughout most of the Nile districts between Khartoum and Berber. Before the end of March the city was invested. Two Egyptian officers—Hassan Pacha and Syad Pacha—to whom he entrusted the conduct of the expedition, proved traitorous. They met with their reward—death by the Governor-General's orders. The tide of insurrection then closed round Khartoum. By the beginning of May the Arabs, crossing the Blue Nile, had established themselves at Buri, a distance of about a mile from the eastern corner of the entrenchments. But at this spot the besiegers suffered terribly from the mines which General Gordon had laid down. On May 7, nine mines were exploded during an attack, and nearly one hundred and twenty of the Mahdi's troops blown to pieces in consequence.

GENERAL GORDON.

On the 25th of June General Gordon and his gallant companions and their garrison, still faithful, had their first news of the fall of Berber, but he and his companions prosecuted the defence with greater vigour than ever. On the 29th of July Gordon drove the rebels out of Buri, killed numbers of them, captured quantities of rifles and ammunition, and cleared them out of thirteen zeribas, or stockades, which they had constructed on the river banks. At the end of July General Gordon had lost seven hundred men.

MURDER OF COLONEL STEWART AND MR. POWER.

On September 17 General Gordon had already sent Colonel Stewart, Mr. Power, and the French Consul, with regular troops and Bashi-Bazouks, to retake Berber. They left Khartoum on the 10th of September, and succeeded in bombarding Berber. Mr. Power and Mr. Herbin then resolved to make their way down the river in a small steamer, which struck on a rock near Wady Gama, and the whole party were treacherously murdered by a local sheikh, in whose declarations of friendship they had confided.

GORDON'S ACTIVITY.

Colonel Stewart's expedition proved that General Gordon could not then be in very desperate straits. Again, towards the middle of October, Gordon's steamers were more than a hundred miles north of Khartoum, bombarding Shendi and Metemneh. Early in November the welcome news was received from Gordon that his supplies of provisions were plentiful, and that he believed he could maintain his ground until the arrival of Lord Wolseley's expedition.

ADVANCING AID.

Lord Wolseley arrived at Cairo on September 10, and immediately advanced his expedition up the Nile. On December 16 he reached Korti, and arranged to push on by land in the direction of Metemneh. Having succeeded in securing a strong position at Gakdnl Wells, a force of about fifteen hundred was led forward by Sir Herbert Stewart, who encountered the enemy in great force on January 17 at Abu Klea Wells, and a desperate battle immediately ensued. It was on this occasion that the much-lamented Colonel Burnaby was killed by the thrust of a javelin through the jugular vein. Many other distinguished officers also fell; but the ultimate result was in our favour.

SIR HERBERT STEWART WOUNDED, AND CORRESPONDENTS KILLED.

On January 19 there was another desperate battle at Gubat, about five miles from Metemneh, and the same distance from the Nile. General Stewart himself being severely wounded in the thigh. Altogether twelve were killed and forty wounded. Mr. Cameron, the correspondent of the Standard, and Mr. St. Ledger Herbert, representing the Morning Post, were amongst the former.

FALL OF KHARTOUM.

There arrived at Gubat, on the 22nd, no less than five steamers sent by General Gordon from Khartoum, having on board 500 soldiers and five guns. They brought a letter from Gordon, dated December 29, saying that all was then safe at Khartoum. Sir Charles Wilson was deputed to return with the steamers to Khartoum, where a triumphant meeting with Gordon was confidently anticipated. Sir Charles Wilson lost one of his steamers on the way up. The enemy was very strongly posted at Halfiyeh. At Omdurman, there was further opposition; and it was then clear what had happened—Khartoum had fallen.

THE HERO'S DEATH.

Immediately after the fall of Khartoum there was a general massacre, from which only a few natives escaped. They described General Gordon as having been killed in coming out of his house to rally his faithful troops, who were taken by surprise. Thus the great hero, who more than any one of whom history bears record, deserved the title of the Christian Warrior, perished in the town which he went to relieve, and with the people whom he was sent to rescue. He came of a family of soldiers, and he met the fate which every soldier must think of as possibly his own.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS,

"What rendered this Gustavus
Resistless and unconquered upon earth?
This, that he was the monarch in his army!
A monarch, one who is indeed a monarch,
Was never yet subdued but by his equal."

A DOLEFUL PERIOD.

THROUGHOUT the whole range of modern history there is no tract so utterly dreary.

so marked by calamity, desolation, and wrong, as the period known as that of the Great Thirty Years' War in Germany. That fearful struggle meant simply the ruin of the German Empire; and a century and a half was inadequate to heal the wounds inflicted between the years 1618, when the war broke out, and 1648, when the utter exhaustion of all parties brought about the Peace of Westphalia. The features of the contest were horrible; and all the armies appear to have become alike demoralised, and hardened into ferocious cruelty by the length of the struggle. Nine hundred thousand men perishing within two years in Saxony alone; all the torments that the rapacity and lawlessness of a brutal soldiery could inflict, practised year after year upon the wretched inhabitants of towns and villages; fanaticism and bigotry in their worst forms, using oppression as their weapon, and hounding on the superstitious and the ignorant to tear each other; whole districts once covered with thriving towns and hamlets silent and abandoned to solitude and desolation, plague and famine following in the track of warfare to complete its work,—such are the features of the heaviest calamity that ever befell the great German nation, spreading sorrow and devastation throughout the length and breadth of the land, from the shores of the Baltic to the Lower Danube, and from the borders of France to the confines of Poland. No part of the vast empire was spared; for the current of war swept over all, though some districts suffered more than others, Saxony and Bohemia being the chief victims.

THE CHRISTIAN SOLDIER.

Amid all this desolation and havoc and wrong, there stands forth, in bright contrast to the selfish, sordid, and blood-thirsty crew around him, one gracious, heroic figure. It is Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, "The Lion of the North, and the Bulwark of the Protestant Faith," the one great leader among the many whose names are rendered famous during the struggle, who stood forth for a good cause, and fought like a Christian soldier. He alone seems to have entered upon the strife from higher motives,—to secure to his Protestant brethren in Germany the blessings of religious toleration and freedom of worship; he alone preserved his fame unspotted amid all the intrigues of ambition and statecraft by which the main question of the struggle was at length obscured and superseded; and to him posterity has with one voice accorded the honours of a Christian hero, even his enemies being unable to withhold from so much greatness and virtue their tribute of posthumous praise. In various points a close analogy may be drawn between the part played by Gustavus Adolphus in the Thirty Years' War, and that of John Hampden in the great struggle that was being waged in England for religious and political freedom. To both men were common the lofty enthusiasm that led them to face dangers and to conquer difficulties, forbidding them to look back when once they had put their hands to the plough. Both were distinguished by great personal valour, and a regardlessness of danger that brought fatal consequences; both were men of strong religious convictions that took the puritan form; and in both cases their career was violently cut short at the time when their services were most needed.

THE ANCESTORS OF GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS; THE HOUSE OF VASA.

Gustavus Adolphus, the great King of Sweden, belonged to an illustrious house. It is seldom indeed in history that distinguished men follow one another in three generations. Yet this was the case here. Gustavus Vasa, the grandfather of Gustavus Adolphus, laid the foundation of the greatness of Sweden; his father, Charles IX., carried forward the work on its founder's plan; and Gustavus Adolphus himself gave an extension to the work, of which his predecessors had never dreamed, and which rendered it of paramount importance in the history of Europe. The first three Vasas all played an important part in history.

The way in which the family attained the royal power was this:—In Sweden during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the government was an elective monarchy, the nobles frequently quarrelling for the possession of the throne. The power of the feudal nobility and clergy increased in every generation, and even bishops and archbishops kept soldiers, and sent forth men to fight for them. In time, the barons acquired the power of petty kings in their separate districts, and grievously oppressed their peasants with taxes and feudal labour. The power of the Church was still greater; and at one time a third of the Swedish soil was held by ecclesiastics. Continual feuds with Denmark and Norway increased the confusion of affairs; until at length, in the year 1397, an attempt was made to put an end to the misrule by the Treaty of Kalmar.

By this treaty it was settled that the three countries, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, should be under one single government; the succession to the throne to be vested in the reigning house of Denmark; but each of the three countries to remain in possession of its own laws and privileges. The arrangement did not produce the desired effect, and, indeed, brought little advantage except to the clergy, whose already overgrown power it greatly increased. The royal title was little more than a shadow in Sweden, the power being in the hands of the governor or imperial deputy, who held his dignity for life. Three men out of the Sture family distinguished themselves in this office,—Sten Sture, Svante Sture, and Sten Sture the younger.

CHRISTIAN II. AND GUSTAVUS VASA; SWEDEN A SEPARATE MONARCHY.

A very different king from the powerless potentates elevated by the union of Calmar came to the throne in 1513, in the person of Christian II. Astute and cunning as the French Louis XI., and, like that monarch, utterly ruthless in his cruelty, he determined to secure unlimited sway, and boldly took up the fight against the aristocracy, the great commercial predominance of the Hansa, and the clergy. In Sweden his task was rendered easy for him by the feud between the families of Sture and Trolle, who had contended for the chief office of the State. Gustavus Trolle, though he failed to win the governorship, succeeded in securing the archbishopric of Upsala, the second office in the kingdom. He became the deadliest enemy of the Stures, and gave all the assistance in his power to Christian, in his scheme of absolute rule. It was partly through Trolle's assistance that Christian was enabled to strike terror in Sweden by the atrocious massacre of Stockholm in the year 1520, when ninety-four of the most influential members of the upper classes were put to death within three days. In Denmark and Norway similar measures were taken to destroy the power of the aristocracy, and weaken the commercial interest.

But the event was contrary to the tyrant's wishes and expectations. He had raised up every interest against him,—the aristocracy, the peasants, and the merchants. In Judland the nobility rose in revolt and drove him away. In Sweden the blood-stained edifice of his power fell still earlier. Gustavus Vasa, a relative of the Sture family, had been treacherously conveyed to Denmark as a hostage, in defiance of plighted word to the contrary, by Christian II., who instinctively discerned an enemy in the energetic and intelligent young noble. Gustavus Vasa contrived to escape to Sweden, on board a merchant ship, and presently roused the brave and faithful Dalecarlian peasants of the North to revolt. Victorious against the troops of the Archbishop of Upsala, he was presently proclaimed governor of the kingdom and leader of the army, at the Diet of Wadstena. In 1523, the decree of another Diet raised him to the dignity of King of Sweden, and he made a triumphal entry into the capital. The next year a peace between Denmark and Sweden was brought about; and in 1541, the Diet of Westeras declared the crown of Sweden to be hereditary in the Vasa family. The name Vasa, it may be observed, had a warlike origin. The word designates the fascines, or faggots, which are thrown into the ditches across which a storming party has to advance to the attack of a town. The family with the warlike name, and a policy no less warlike, established their rule in Sweden under great and manifold difficulties and dangers. Gustavus, while he bequeathed the crown to his eldest son, Eric XIV., unfortunately weakened the royal power by giving the principalities of Finland, East Gothland, and Sudermanland, to his other sons, John, Magnus, and Charles. Eric, a wild and passionate king, increased the territory of the country, but at last went mad, after having, in his frenzied jealousy, put to death various members of the royal family, and menaced the highest nobles with a similar fate. Deposed by his brothers, he was cast into prison, where poison, administered in consequence of a decree of the Council, put an end to his miserable life. His next brother, John, succeeded him,—a weak-minded and vacillating prince, who at one time, persuaded by his queen, a princess of Polish birth, abjured the Protestant faith; and though he afterwards adopted it again, never regained the confidence of his subjects that he had forfeited by this ill-advised step. His son and successor, Sigismund, was a Catholic and King of Poland. To prevent danger to the Protestant faith in Sweden from this circumstance, it was decreed at the Council of Upsala, that the Evangelical Lutheran religion should be the only one acknowledged and tolerated in Sweden; and as Sigismund had returned to Poland, his uncle, Charles of Sudermanland, the son of Gustavus Vasa, was chosen as governor of the kingdom. Sigismund was highly indignant at this arrangement, which he tried to upset by force of arms, but was unsuccessful; and after he had refused a demand made by the Diet at Stangebro, under Charles's influence, that he should renounce the Roman faith and either come to Sweden to rule his hereditary dominions in person, or send his son within five months, that the heir might be instructed in the national religion, the crown was given to Charles IX, the son of Gustavus Vasa, and the defender of the Protestant faith.

Hence arose a long war between Sweden and Poland, which at length, in the time of Gustavus Adolphus, was concluded in favour of Sweden.

BIRTH AND CHILDHOOD OF GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS; HIS EARLY PROMISE.

It was on the 9th of December, 1594, that Charles's son, Gustavus Adolphus, the first child by his second marriage, was born in the old palace at Stockholm. There is a tradition, about as credible as such things generally are, that ten years before his birth the celebrated astronomer and astrologer, Tycho Brahe, read in the heavens that a newly-discovered bright star in the constellation Cassiopeia portended the birth of a prince in the north, who should achieve great deeds, and save the Protestant Church. Though Charles had long acted as an uncontrolled governor of Sweden, it was not until 1601 that, at the reiterated prayers of the Estates, he formally accepted the crown as the chosen King and hereditary ruler of the Swedes, Goths, and Wends. At the same time the little Gustavus Adolphus was formally acknowledged as Crown Prince. An astute and sagacious prince, Charles saw on the political horizon the first indications of the great storm that was to break over Europe in the next generation; and accordingly in his will he recommended Gustavus Adolphus to cultivate the friendship of the Protestant princes of Germany which he himself had carefully fostered. His prophetic eye seems also to have seen the future glory round the head of his illustrious son. It is told how, when those around him sought to stimulate him to great and far-reaching undertakings, he would lay his hand on the head of the royal child with a quiet smile, and the hopeful words, "Ille faciet,"—"He will do it."

From his earliest childhood, the boy showed indications of an acute power of observation and of a frank, fearless spirit, the strong combative, energetic Vasa type that burst forth in madness in the case of King Eric, but which, kept in bounds by the solid self-control of a strong character, could hardly fail to achieve great things. At five years of age, being taken to see some ships of war, he expressed his preference for one vessel, The Black Knight, because it had most guns. When told by his attendants, who wished to dissuade him from entering a wood into which he was running, that there were snakes there, "Then give me a stick," said he, "and I can kill them."

EDUCATION OF THE PRINCE.

His father, the good King Charles, very judiciously put the boy under the care of a tutor, who had studied men as well as books, and whose academical learning had been supplemented by nine years of travel. The eager and acquisitive mind of the boy enabled him to profit to the fullest extent by the instruction he received. In his twelfth year he could speak Latin, at that time the diplomatic language of many courts, German, Dutch, French, and Italian; and he had, moreover, some knowledge of the Polish and Muscovite tongues. Like most lads of a military tendency, the old Roman writers interested him greatly; the deeds he found chronicled excited his emulation. History attracted him far more than poetry. He afterwards learnt the practical part of the art of war from General James de la Gardie, the most celebrated Swedish leader of the time. It is pleasant to record that the young student manifested the utmost attachment and gratitude to his zealous and efficient tutor, whom he afterwards raised to the rank of an Imperial Counsellor, and employed in the most important business. His father, King Charles, very judiciously insisted on the boy's presence at Councils of State, and took measures to impress him at an early age with the responsibilities that thickened round "the head that wears a crown." The military ardour of the youth induced him to petition his father, when he had hardly completed his fifteenth year, to let him take part in a campaign against Russia; but Charles judiciously restrained the boy's impatience; though a Danish war in the next year gave the Prince the opportunity he sought, of proving to the world that, striping as was, he possessed a military genius from which the greatest things might be expected in the future. By a masterly stratagem, which reminds us of some of the exploits of Mordant, Earl of Peterborough, in Spain, he took the town of Christianopol with five hundred cavalry, whom he disguised in Danish uniforms, then mastering the garrison by a coup-de-main; on which occasion he narrowly escaped death or capture, his horse having become entangled with the rider in a half-frozen marsh.

ACCESSION TO THE THRONE; DIFFICULTIES OF THE YOUNG KING'S POSITION.

He returned from this first brilliant campaign to find his father dying. The Swedish general, James de la Gardie, had been gaining great victories for his master in Russia; and of these victories, and of the further fact that his youngest son had been chosen Czar by a faction in Russia, Charles received intelligence as he lay on his death-bed at Nyköping. "I leave my worldly affairs to better hands," said the dying King with a smile, pointing to his young heir.

He was, however, unwilling that the whole burden of government should rest on those young shoulders. By the Treaty of Nyköping, which fixed the conditions of succession, it had been decided that the majority of Gustavus Adolphus should be fixed for his twenty-fourth year; and Charles, by his will, declared that the Dowager-Queen, with the Prince John and six councillors, should carry on the regency until this majority was attained. But the young King had already inspired confidence among all classes; and at a meeting of the Estates of Nyköping, on the 11th December, 1611, it was determined to place the whole authority in the boy-king's hands. Among the six councillors who, with the Queen-Mother and the King's uncle John, composed the regency, the most astute was Axel Oxenstierna. Through him the Queen announced to the Estates that she was not inclined to carry on the government any longer; whereupon, by a resolution of the assembly, Gustavus Adolphus, who had just entered upon his eighteenth year, was declared of full age, and was invested with the complete authority of a King of Sweden; his uncle, Duke John, cordially coinciding in the step.

But the path of the young King was beset with difficulties. The Swedish nobility formed a powerful class, jealous of the King's authority and tenacious of their own privileges. Gustavus was compelled to make many important concessions to them, and also to give an increased authority to the Estates of the realm in the government, and enlarged authority to the Church. A great deal of tact was necessary to tread at once warily and firmly in the difficult path that lay before the young ruler; and it is greatly to his credit that the extensive privileges he was compelled to grant to the nobility never, during his life-time, became a source of oppression to the classes below them, so well did he understand how to balance the rights of the various ranks with one another.

THE INHERITANCE OF THREE WARS.

The country he was called upon to govern was exceedingly poor, with the roughest of climates, and a very unproductive soil. "Diese Gothen, diese Hungerleider"—"These Goths, these hungry wretches," said the scornful Wallenstein, speaking of the inhabitants of Scandinavia. Indeed, at Gustavus's accession, the farthest towns in Sweden could only with the utmost difficulty raise a few dollars monthly for the maintenance of an army and fleet; and shortly before his father's death, the Prince had been obliged to give to an army contractor a written acknowledgment for a debt of eighteen dollars, not having that sum in ready money. And yet he had with his kingdom inherited no less than three great wars—with Denmark, Russia, and Poland. The first of these wars had been kindled by national jealousies which had long subsisted between Sweden and Denmark, and was the more burdensome from being waged on the soil of Sweden; it was, however, a contest that might easily be terminated by concessions. The second war, that with Russia, had been kindled in the first instance by the ambition and desire for conquest of the Swedish rulers themselves, and could be ended without great difficulty, so long as the honour of Sweden was sufficiently preserved. But the war with Poland was altogether of another kind. Sigismund, the weak King, whose long rule was a source of calamity to the country, was not the real foe with whom Sweden had to reckon; behind him stood the power, the wealth, the far-reaching influence of the great Austrian House. The Hapsburg rulers put Sigismund forward as the champion of the Roman Catholic faith against the Protestant North, and assisted him with money and men and warlike stores to maintain the struggle. Thus it was that Gustavus Adolphus was forced, by the exigencies of his position, from one war to another; advancing through the Danish, Russian, and Polish contests to that great struggle in Germany with which his name is most intimately associated. Nothing could be more unjust than to class this King among the conquerors in the ordinary sense of the word. Though his tastes and genius were undoubtedly military, he never recklessly plunged his country into danger to gratify his own ambition. For the safety of Sweden, and for the maintenance of the position she had won among the nations of Europe, he was compelled to take up arms; but that his ambition grew with the opportunities as they unfolded themselves before him, and that he conceived the idea of giving to Sweden an importance of which none of his predecessors had dreamed, is certain; he would have been more or less than human had it been otherwise.

One proof of sagacity he gave soon after his accession, in a matter that brought great advantage to Sweden,—an advantage that continued long after his death. It was in the choice he made of the before-mentioned Axel Oxenstierna to the responsible position of Prime Minister. At this time the young statesman was only twenty-eight years old; but the unerring eye of the King had detected in him talents and qualities of a high order.

A BROKEN REED; JAMES I. AND HIS PROMISES; THE DANISH WAR AND THE TREATY.

With respect to the Danish war, that eminently pacific prince, King James I. of England, offered his mediation to bring about an understanding between Denmark and Sweden; for there was nothing in which the Solomon of Whitehall better loved to display his kingcraft than in the adjustment of differences between foreign States; and so much was he given on these occasions to display his knowledge, that Henry IV. of France used jestingly to dub him "his learned brother, le docteur Jacob." But in this, as in other matters, the intention of the King exceeded his ability. Denmark made use of him as a tool, and laughed at him; Gustavus found that he had been leaning on a broken reed; and the fortune of arms had to decide the quarrel. With heroic courage, and yet with a caution and forethought that would have done honour to a veteran, the young King maintained the contest through the most trying vicissitudes. At one time, in the little town of Wihn, he was surprised by a large force of the enemy, and narrowly escaped capture or death, losing a large part of his army at a blow. At another, the Danes overran his provinces with fire and sword, destroying three thousand farmhouses during a single expedition. At length peace was concluded, the great points of difficulty being the restitution of the fortresses of Kalmar and Elfsberg, which the Danes had captured. How little of the spirit of a conqueror there was in Gustavus Adolphus, will be seen from the eminently conciliatory speech in which he explained to the assembled Estates his reasons for concluding the treaty. After explaining the conditions of the peace, he continued: "I am resolved, with God's help, to maintain the position of a good neighbour towards Denmark, and I hope to be able to come to an accommodation with our other enemies also. I have already sounded the King of Poland, partly through ambassadors and partly through letters, written by myself; and from the answers received, whose contents shall be communicated to you, you will see that we are justified in hoping for a good result. But let things go as they may, we will ever put our trust in the Almighty, in whose Hand are war and peace; we will give ourselves up to His guidance, and leave no business undisturbed to conquer for ourselves the greatest human blessing, that of peace, so far as that may be done without injury to the State, and without wounding our honour."

RUSSIAN AFFAIRS; THE FALSE DEMETRIUS; HIS ADVENTUROUS CAREER.

One war was thus concluded; but that with Russia was more formidable, and threatened to be enduring. To explain the manner in which the King of Sweden became involved in war with the Czar, we must divert the reader's attention for a moment to one of the most remarkable episodes in history—the story of the false Demetrius. The circumstances of this strange episode were as follows:—

Vassili Ivanovitch, the first ruler of Moscow who took the title of Czar, died in 1533, and was succeeded by his son Ivan Vassilovitch, who greatly extended his territories, and at his death in 1584 left two sons by different mothers: the elder, Fedor, by Anastasia Romanovna; the younger, Demetrius, by his second marriage with Maria Fedorovna. Fedor, a weak prince, succeeded his father; and as is the custom with feeble minds, fell completely under the influence of a favourite, a young noble named Boris Fedorovitch Godunow; who in time exercised an unlimited influence over him. Fedor was childless; his only legitimate successor, the boy Demetrius, son of Czar Ivan, lived in a kind of exile; and the ambitious Boris Godunow at length aspired to the succession. He sent murderers, who tore young Demetrius from his mother's arms, and slew that unhappy boy; but the assassins fell victims to the fury of the spectators, who had beheld the deed of blood. Godunow intercepted the true accounts of the transaction, and persuaded the Czar that Demetrius had killed himself in a fit of epilepsy; and when shortly afterwards the weak Czar Fedor died, Boris contrived to place the crown on his own head. For four years he had enjoyed the fruits of his successful crime, when suddenly, in the year 1605, a young man appeared, who declared himself to be Demetrius, the son of Ivan. He stated that through a stratagem of his mother, aided by the fidelity of an old servant, another boy resembling him in appearance, had been substituted for him, and had suffered death in his stead. This man was an imposter named Jacob Otrepiev, a son of poor but noble parents at Jarvilaw; a worthless but clever adventurer, whom the accidental mention of a likeness between himself and Prince Demetrius had induced to play this part. Compelled for some time to conceal himself from the pursuit of Boris Godunow, who heard of his pretensions and recognised how dangerous such a claim might become to himself, the false Demetrius managed to enlist various men of rank and influence in his favour, especially the Polish Voivode of Sandomir, Mniezki, whose daughter, Maria Anna, he promised to marry and to seat on the throne of Moscow. At length, assisted by the Jesuits, whom he gained over by promising to introduce the Roman Catholic religion into Russia if they helped him to the throne, he succeeded in enlisting the Polish Government in his cause. The Polish magnates assembled an army of 10,000 men; and at the head of these, and of a swarm of Cossacks, the Pretender invaded Russia. At this juncture the Czar Boris suddenly died. It is supposed he poisoned himself, to anticipate the fall he looked on as inevitable. The false Demetrius was actually accepted as Czar by a large faction in Moscow, and entered the city in triumph. He was cunning enough to send for the mother of the dead boy he personated, and, by loading her with favours and wealth, procured her connivance in the fraud. But now, thinking the game won, he disregarded the dictates of prudence, gave offence by open and premature attempts to introduce the Roman Catholic religion, offended the prejudices of almost every class, and roused against himself powerful enemies. He had fulfilled his promise of marrying the daughter of his powerful patron, the Polish Voivode; and by giving various offices of trust to Polish strangers, had still further incensed the Russians. A boyar named Shuiskoi got up a conspiracy, compelled the Czarina-Dowager to tell the truth concerning the impostor, and attacked him with two thousand followers in his palace at Moscow. The false Demetrius was killed by a pistol-shot, and his corpse was burnt after having been for three days exposed to the insults of the populace.

SWEDEN'S OPPORTUNITY; VICTORIES OF DE LA GARDE AND HORN; MODERATION AND SAGACITY OF THE KING.

And now a time of strife and anarchy began. For a time Shuiskoi maintained his position as Czar; but he was soon deposed and compelled to become a monk. Three impostors, each claiming to be the true Demetrius, appeared in rapid succession; and the Poles supported their pretensions in order to weaken Russia, and tear what provinces they could from the distracted State. In this strife Charles IX., of Sweden had, as might be expected, taken the part of Russia against Poland and Sigmund; and his famous generals, De la Gardie and Ewert Horn, fought bravely under very adverse circumstances, especially gaining a victory over the Polish general Sapieha, at Dmitrov, Feb. 16th, 1610. But the Russians were not to be depended on; and though at length a part of the Muscovite nobility chose Charles Philip, the younger brother of Gustavus Adolphus, as Czar, the astute King declined the dangerous honour on behalf of his relative, in spite of the vehement remonstrances of De la Gardie, who looked only at the splendour of the imperial title, without regarding the extreme uncertainty of its tenure. The Russians now chose Michael Romanoff, a youth of seventeen, a scion of a family related to the last royal House, in 1613; and with him began that despotic rule in Russia which at various times has been the fruitful source of so much disturbance and warfare. Michael himself, a sagacious and moderate prince, laid the foundation of the great power of Russia. At his accession, a part of the country, especially Novgorod, had submitted to De la Gardie; the opposite party flew to arms, and Gustavus was obliged, in 1614, himself to proceed to Esthonia with an army, where he found the Swedish affairs in a bad condition. Gustavus soon won back all that had been lost; his generals, De la Gardie and Horn, seconded him with equal valour and skill; and when at length, at the end of 1617, peace was made with Russia, Sweden had gained not only fame but a large accession of territory. Thus a second great war had been concluded by the sagacity and valour of Gustavus; there was even a negotiation for an alliance between Sweden and Russia against Poland; but it was not successfully carried through.

Meanwhile, in his government at home, the King was giving many tokens of energy and care for his people in every department. It was manifest to all that a real king, a "conyng," or a man of knowledge, was on the throne; and with every year the personal relations between Gustavus and his people became more intimate and affectionate. The burdens which had seemed intolerable under an Eric or a Christian II., were gladly borne now that the people knew for what purpose they were imposed, and how necessary it was that Sweden should be able to oppose a strong front to her enemies. Thus, after the conclusion of the Danish war, one of the first cares of the young King was to prepare new sources of prosperity for the exhausted and impoverished nation, by rendering commerce secure. For this purpose he first put the fortresses on the Danish coast into good defensive condition, and then proceeded to carry out a plan for the rebuilding of Gothenburg, which had been completely destroyed by Christian IV. It was not until the year 1618 that Gothenburg assumed the shape of a city. It was well fortified, is very conveniently situated for commerce, and remains as a monument of the care and sagacity of the great King. The harbour is especially valuable, being sufficiently spacious to receive the largest fleet in safety.

TRAITS OF CHARACTER.

With the same object of increasing and securing the commerce of Sweden, Gustavus Adolphus entered into commercial treaties with the States-General of Holland, and with the Cities of the Hansatic League, especially Lübeck. He summoned many strangers into the country, and thus increased its industrial productive power; showing his enlarged mind in the fact that men of all religions received equal toleration, so long as they could prove that they were leading honest and respectable lives; and to foreign and native merchants alike, important privileges were accorded. Of the King's sense of justice, the historian Archenholz tells the following example:—Gustavus had a law-suit with a nobleman concerning a certain landed estate. The affair was to be decided before a High Court of Appeal, which Gustavus himself had instituted, to shorten the duration and diminish the cost of legal proceedings. The King betook himself to the court in person, to hear the decision of the judges. These would have risen respectfully when their young monarch entered; but Gustavus prevented them. "You must remember," he said, "that you constitute the highest tribunal in the land, and on this occasion you are to forget who I am: your consciences alone are to speak in the sentence you are about to give." The judges pronounced in favour of the nobleman. The King made no comment upon the verdict, but only asked to look at the documents; and, acknowledging the justice of the decision, praised their integrity, declaring that he would have given them no thanks had they decided otherwise. This contrasts very favourably with the conduct of Frederick the Great on a similar occasion, who ordered the judges to reverse an adverse decision in favour of a protégé of his own, and on their refusal treated them with great contumely and injustice, proceeding even to personal violence.

GUSTAVUS'S MARRIAGE; EBBA BRAHE AND MARIA ELEONORA.

In another event that intimately concerned his own happiness, the King manifested in a striking manner his sense of the duty he owed to his country, even where this duty interfered most with his personal inclinations. At the court of his mother, the Dowager-Queen, he saw a high-born maiden, Ebba Brahe, whose loveliness and good sense at once won his heart. At the castle of Rosenberg, near Stuttgart, a portrait of Ebba is still to be seen, that proves her to have been very beautiful. It was the great wish of the royal lover to raise the maiden of his choice to the dignity of a queen, and to share the throne of Sweden with her; and as Ebba Brahe was related to the royal family, there seemed, in the first instance, no great discrepancy in the match. But the Dowager-Queen Christina impressed upon her son that in a matter of matrimonial alliance a King cannot choose like a private man, according to his inclination. Like Polonius, she was of opinion that "He may not, as unvalued persons do, carve for himself; for on his choice depends the sanctity and health of the whole State; and, therefore, must his choice be circumscribed unto the voice and yielding of that body whereof he is the head." The King reluctantly confessed that a King's marriage was in the nature of a political alliance; and gave up his suit to the fair Ebba. She was destined, however, to become the wife of a hero; for she gave her hand to that Count de la Gardie, who had covered himself with glory in the Russian war. It was not until after the marriage of Ebba that Gustavus himself gave his hand to the beautiful Maria Eleonora, a princess of the House of Brandenburg, with which ruling house an alliance of great importance to the welfare of Sweden was thus cemented. One child only, a daughter, was born of this marriage to the royal pair, the Princess Christina, sole heiress and successor to her heroic father; but who proved herself unworthy of the lofty inheritance that descended to her; and after a long life full of eccentricities and whimsicalities, died at last at Rome, having in a fit of temper abdicated the throne her father had rendered illustrious, and abjured the Protestant faith he died to defend.

SIGISMUND OF POLAND; END OF THE WAR.

The war with Poland was long and bitter, and led eventually to that greater contest with which the life of the hero-king closed. King Sigismund, after the death of Charles IX., renewed his claims to the Swedish throne on several occasions; and thus, after various temporary cessations of hostilities, with a view of securing peace, an object Gustavus never lost sight of, the war was definitely renewed in 1621, with great advantage to Gustavus, who made important conquests in Lithuania, Liffland, Polish Prussia, and Kurland. In 1627 the Austrian House sent 10,000 men, under Arnim, to reinforce the Poles ; and thus for a time the victorious progress of the King of Sweden was stayed. The Swedish King was naturally indignant at the interference of the Emperor in a private quarrel between Sweden and Poland, and at the same time he fully recognised the danger that the increasing power of Austria brought to every Protestant State of Europe, and to the Protestant Faith itself ; and he was not the man to shrink from a contest even with the House of Hapsburg, where the interest and honour of his country summoned him to the field. France also, under the guidance of the astute Richelieu, was anxious to check this growing Power ; for Austria and France had been rivals since the days of Maximilian and Louis XI. Consequently the best offices of the French monarchy were put in motion to effect a compromise between Poland and Sweden ; and on 20th of September, 1629, a cessation of hostilities for six years was agreed on, which left the King of Sweden in possession of Polish Prussia, and gave him liberty to turn his arms against the Emperor.

We now come to the most important period of the career of Gustavus ; the time when he was to exhibit on a larger stage, and in the eyes of expectant Europe, those qualities as a statesman and warrior of which his countrymen had already received such satisfactory proof. For the Swedish King now becomes one of the chief actors in the bloodstained drama of the Thirty Years' War.

FERDINAND II. OF GERMANY : THE EDICT OF RESTITUTION : GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS AND THE THIRTY YEARS' WAR.

In the year 1629, the Emperor Ferdinand II. seemed everywhere triumphant. Christian IV., the King of Denmark, who had long maintained the contest against him with vigour and ability, had been obliged to acquiesce in a peace by which he bound himself to interfere no further in the affairs of Germany. Mansfeld, the great partisan leader, was dead, and so was Christian of Brunswick, the chivalrous defender of the Queen of Bohemia, who had been accustomed to go forth against the enemy with Elizabeth's glove as a favour in his belt. Though Wallenstein had been repulsed before Stralsund with the loss of 13,000 men, the general march of that bold adventurer's career in the Emperor's service had been one of success,—a success the more welcome to Ferdinand inasmuch as Wallenstein's army cost him nothing ; for the army maintained itself by the plunder of the peasants and citizens ; and thus the princes of the Empire paid the cost of the war that aggrandized the Emperor. But now Ferdinand repeated the mistake his bigoted and narrow-minded superstition had several times caused him to commit. At various periods he could have put an end to the war, but had rekindled the dying embers by persecution ; and now, when conciliation would have been his best policy, he issued the Edict of Restitution, a measure of such spoliation, and involving such utter ruin to the Protestants, that it was easy to see Ferdinand would not be satisfied with anything short of the utter ruin and extirpation of Lutheranism in Germany. It was the misfortune of Ferdinand that he could never take an enlarged and generous view of his exalted position, which placed him above the warring factions as the controller and moderator of a mighty nation. He was always taking part with one faction against the other ; and seeing the triumphant position of the Roman Catholic side, he for the third time threw away, for the pleasure of gratified revenge, the chance of an enduring and honourable peace.

At the very time when the utter injustice and harshness of the Edict of Restitution had aroused all Ferdinand's Protestant subjects into indignation shortly to break out into renewed rebellion, a heavy blow was dealt to his power from the partisans of his own faith. The utter lawlessness of Wallenstein's troops had aroused the anger of the Catholic princes of the Empire. To these plundering hordes it was a matter of indifference whether they were encamped on the soil of an ally or of an enemy : they ate up the fatness of the land like locusts, leaving a desert behind them where they had passed. At a Diet held at Ratisbon, accordingly, the princes, with Maximilian of Bavaria at their head, clamoured for the dismissal of Wallenstein and the disbanding of his rapacious hosts. Richelieu also, the great Cardinal who now with wonderful astuteness stood at the helm of the French State, and whose great object was to lessen the power of the House of Austria, sent a very clever agent to the Diet, in the person of a certain Father Joseph, a Capuchin monk of very persuasive manners and great energy. This wily agent soon established a remarkable influence over Ferdinand ; whose respect for the Church, indeed, was such, that it was popularly said of him, that if he met an angel and an ecclesiastic in the way, the clerico would receive as first salutation, and the angel the second. Father Joseph persuaded him that the dismissal of Wallenstein would conciliate the princes, and really advance the position of the Emperor; while the true object was to deprive Ferdinand of the assistance of the one man who could render him truly formidable. The clamour of the princes, who accused the Emperor's great general of, like Cæsar, "supporting robbers," and allowing his predatory hordes to devastate their lands, would hardly have succeeded in procuring Wallenstein's dismissal, but for the co-operation of Father Joseph. Wallenstein was dismissed, and retired, with outward composure, but with rage in his heart, to Prague, to await the course of events. Afterwards Ferdinand saw the trick which had been practised upon him, when it became evident that Richelieu, after depriving him of Wallenstein and Wallenstein's army, was about to enter into an alliance with Sweden, to enable Gustavus Adolphus to come forward as the champion of the Protestants in Germany; who for their part were roused once more to resistance by the Edict of Restitution. "A shabby Capuchin has outwitted me," said Ferdinand, bitterly, and prepared best he might for the renewed struggle.

It must not be assumed that the wish to give aid to his Protestant brethren in Germany was Gustavus's only motive for the great undertaking, although undoubtedly it was the chief. In the long war with Poland, he had seen the bitter and hostile feeling with which Austria persistently acted against him: in the negotiations for peace with the King Christian of Denmark, the Emperor had treated Sweden with studied contumely; and Gustavus might with truth have said concerning Ferdinand, "He hath rejoiced at my losses, mocked at my gains, cooled my friends, heated mine enemies." To these cogent reasons must be added another, but lightly hinted at by Schiller and other historians, who, in trying to represent Gustavus as an immaculate hero, free from human weaknesses, passions, and desires, have done their hero little service. Like all men of military energy, Gustavus was hopeful and ambitious; and should he succeed in achieving a brilliant triumph for the Protestant arms, it was not impossible that the highest prize in Europe, the Imperial Crown of Germany, might one day be his. And the chances of success were far greater than would at first sight appear. The Emperor, weakened by the loss of the Wallenstein troops, had further reduced his means by sending forces to Italy and the Netherlands; Spain, herself in a critical position, could offer him no help; England and France were both on the side of Gustavus, and promised to second him in the most effectual manner.

PREPARATIONS FOR INVADING GERMANY.

The greatest hope of success lay, however, in the qualities of the Swedish King himself, who was undoubtedly one of the greatest soldiers of his century. His troops were well-disciplined, his order-of-battle original and judicious; the soldiers believed in him, as Cromwell's Ironsides believed in their leader; and, as Wellington said of his Peninsular troops, were ready "to go anywhere and do anything." No man knew better than the Swedish King how to husband his means, and to achieve great results with small means. A Spartan simplicity was observed throughout his camp; not even in the King's tent were silver and gold to be seen; but there was iron in plenty. Especially he held fast to the proposition that a man could be a soldier without ceasing practically to be a Christian; and his frank, hearty piety presented a great contrast to the grovelling superstition of the Emperor Ferdinand. The Swede was taught to exemplify his religion in humane treatment of every foe, and in consideration for every unarmed peasant and citizen. Plundering, even in the enemy's country, was strictly forbidden; whatever the Swede took, he paid for; and small bodies of Gustavus's followers could consequently move with perfect safety through districts in the Imperial States to which they came as enemies; while Wallenstein's men, though nominally in the Emperor's service, could not move except in large numbers, small parties being continually cut off and massacred by the enraged peasantry.

On the 20th of May, 1630, all preparations having been made, the King appeared before the Parliamentary assembly of the Estates at Stockholm, to bid them a solemn farewell. Every precaution had been taken for the safety of the kingdom during his absence; and here again the subordination of his own feelings and inclinations to duty manifestly appeared. Though he loved his wife the Queen tenderly, he shut her out from all political power during his absence, and from the regency in case of his non-return; for he knew that she would be unequal to rule in those troublous times. He took his little daughter Christina, then four years old, in his arms, and held her up before the assembly as his heiress, and their future queen. The words he used on this occasion have been preserved, and are worthy of the occasion and of the great man who uttered them.

"Not lightly or inconsiderately," he said, "do I involve myself and you in this new and perilous war. God Almighty be my witness that I do not fight for pleasure. The Emperor has insulted me most cruelly in the persons of my ambassadors; he has supported my enemies; he persecutes my friends and brethren, treads my religion in the dust, and stretches out his hand to seize my crown. Urgently do the oppressed Estates of Germany implore our help; and if it please God, we will afford it them. I know the dangers to which my life will be exposed. I have never avoided them, and I can hardly expect to escape from them altogether. Until now, indeed, the Almighty has wonderfully protected me; but I shall die at last, defending my country. I commend you to the protection of heaven. Be just, be conscientious, let your lives be blameless; so shall we meet again in eternity. To you my Councillors of State, I address myself first. May God enlighten you and fill you with wisdom, that you may always advise my kingdom for the best. Continue to show yourselves worthy successors of those heroic Goths whose valour laid old Rome in the dust. You, servants of the Church, I exhort to peace and unanimity; be in yourselves patterns of the virtues you preach, and never misuse your power over the hearts of my people. For you, Deputies of the citizen and the peasant class, I invoke the blessing of heaven upon you, a joyful harvest to reward your industry; may plenty fill your barns, and abundance of all the good things of life be yours! For you all, absent and present, I address sincere prayers to heaven. Most affectionately do I bid you all farewell; I bid you farewell perhaps for ever!"

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS AND TILLY.

The fleet that was to convey the King and his army across the Baltic was delayed by contrary winds, and it was not until the 24th of June that Gustavus landed on the island of Rügen, on the coast of Pomerania. He knelt down on the shore on disembarking, and, in the face of his followers, offered up a thankful prayer for the preservation of the army and fleet. In his march the strictest discipline was observed: and Gustavus was soon able, in view of the devastation caused by the Imperial armies, and the self-restraint practised by his own, to ask more than one of the princes of Germany whether they would rather have him or the Emperor for their friend. Thus Bogislav of Pomerania, a somewhat weak potentate, with the weight of years upon him, considered it advisable to open Stettin and other important places to the Swedish King, and risk the vengeance of the Emperor. Thus Gustavus obtained a firm footing in Germany,

In Vienna, where the power of the Swedish King was measured only by the number of men he could bring into the field, the importance of the northern invasion was entirely underrated. Wallenstein, not without secret reasons of his own, perhaps, had declared that he could beat these intruders out of the empire with rods; the courtiers and favourites around Ferdinand's throne saw nothing formidable in the advent of a few thousand men under an enthusiastic King, whom they contemptuously dubbed the "Snow King," declaring that he "would melt away if he marched southward." But the swift advance of Gustavus through Pomerania, and the successive triumphs gained by him, quickly began to undeceive men with regard to him; and the most formidable general Germany could afford, John Zerklaes, Count Tilly, a veteran nearly seventy years of age, who, after gaining various laurels as the chief general of the Catholic League in the Thirty Years' War, was now invested with the chief command over the Emperor's troops also. Tilly was far too sagacious a leader to undervalue his antagonist, or to fail to recognise the great qualities of Gustavus Adolphus as a leader. "The King of Sweden," he declared at the Diet of Ratibon, "is an enemy of equal courage and astuteness, inured to war, and in the very bloom of his manhood. His arrangements are excellent, and his means not small; the Estates of his kingdom have been very complacent towards him. His army, made up of Swedes, Germans, Livonians, Finlanders, Scots, and Englishmen, has been moulded into a single nation by blind obedience. This is a player whose antagonist may be said to have won much, if he has lost nothing." Tilly himself was one of those exceptional men whom times of strife and war bring to the front. A fanatic in religion, his great aim was to combat Protestantism, as the followers of the Crescent combated the Cross, without pity and without remorse. His ambition was entirely military. He did not, like Wallenstein, aspire to becoming a prince or ruler in Germany; it was his great object to leave behind him the name of a man over whom his enemies had never triumphed; and until now he had succeeded in maintaining his invincibility.

THE TRAGEDY OF MAGDEBURG.

The first place against which he was now called upon to exercise his military skill was the rich city of Magdeburg, a place as much valued by the Protestants of Germany, as was Rochell

by the Huguenots of France. Magdeburg had received as governor, or administrator, within its walls Christian William of Brandenburg, whose election to this office had been formally cancelled by the Emperor, who, reckoning on the help of the King of Sweden, somewhat prematurely began hostilities against the Imperialists; and thus it came about that Magdeburg was besieged by Tilly and by another able and skillful general of the Emperor, Count Pappenheim. The siege of Magdeburg is memorable even in those days when war was carried on without the amenities which at a later period softened its rigour, by the terrible and almost unprecedented horrors with which it closed. The citizens, always hoping that the Swedish King would arrive to raise the siege, carried on the defence for a length of time that exasperated the besiegers almost to frenzy. The military garrison being found insufficient to defend the large extent of the fortifications, the private citizens were forced to take part in the defence; and soon quarrels and recriminations arose, the poorer citizens declaring that they had to endure the burden and heat of the day, while the richer burghers shirked their portion of the duty. Still the position of the citizens appeared so strong, and the chances of assault so doubtful, that Tilly was half inclined to abandon the siege, but was deterred from this course by the impetuosity of Pappenheim, who counselled an assault at daybreak, when the guards who had watched through the night would be exhausted, and no effectual resistance would be encountered. His advice was taken, though reluctantly, and on the 10th of May, 1630, the city was stormed. The scene of carnage that ensued was appalling. The soldiers ranged through the town, massacring the inhabitants without distinction of sex or age. The Croats, half-savage soldiers who had taken little part in the assault, distinguished themselves even among that ruthless crew by the slaughter of infants, whom they transfixed on pikes, and tossed into the flames that already began to rise at all points of the doomed town. The Pappenheim dragoons, brave soldiers, but cruel and hard-hearted as the rest, shot or struck down all they encountered. Presently dense volumes of smoke, from various houses that had been fired by the plunderers, or through accident, began to roll along the streets, and the plundering troops were obliged to retreat before the advancing flames. Nearly the whole town was destroyed, with the exception of the cathedral and a few fishermen's huts on the bank of the Elbe. The great majority of the inhabitants perished in the burning city. The number of dead was estimated at 30,000. A day or two afterwards, when the fire had burned itself out, Tilly made his entry on horseback over the fragments of the ruined town. Stories have been circulated to the effect that he had connived at the scenes of horror enacted at Magdeburg; but in truth the destruction of the place was a heavy blow to him, for in the hands of the Imperialists it would have been most valuable. But not even the authority of Gustavus Adolphus himself would have sufficed to restrain the fury of the soldiers in the first hours of frenzied triumph; and the scenes in a city taken by storm have a melancholy resemblance in all climes and all ages: witness the horrors at Badajoz and elsewhere in the Peninsular War. In the old cathedral about 800 people had taken refuge, and there they had remained, with barricaded doors, in fear and trembling, and without food, for nearly three days. Tilly took them under his protection, and caused bread to be distributed among them. Above 6,000 corpses that encumbered the streets were thrown into the Elbe. Nearly every prominent person among the defenders had perished.

THE GREAT VICTORY OF BREITENFELD.

The fall of Magdeburg excited feelings of horror and consternation among the Protestants; while among the more fanatical portion of the Romanist party, whose watchword at the storming had been "Jesu Maria!" it was looked upon as a direct judgment of heaven upon heresy. One important effect the sad news certainly had, in raising up the undecided Protestant princes to vigorous action; for if their opponents did these things in the green tree, what would they do in 'the dry?' Gustavus Adolphus, who had been hampered at every step by the vacillation of Saxony and Brandenburg, and who was even obliged to set himself right in the eyes of the Protestant world by publishing a manifesto setting forth the reason why he had not marched more quickly to the assistance of Magdeburg, now had his hands strengthened by a definite treaty with Saxony, while the Elector of Brandenburg at last gave him every facility for marching through his territories. The Queen of Sweden, Maria Elconora, had also landed in the interim in Pomerania, with a reinforcement of 8,000 Swedes; and a force of 6,000 English and Scots, under the Marquis of Hamilton, had likewise arrived. The Swedish King was thus enabled to commence active operations against Tilly, whose army was rapidly diminishing by desertion.

Even among the more humanely disposed of the Imperialists, the massacre of Magdeburg had excited horror and disgust; and from that time the good fortune of Tilly deserted him.

He hastened to Leipsic, which, after a short resistance, surrendered to him, though the Commandant, Hans von der Pforta, had caused the Halle suburb to be burnt down, with the intention of defending the city. But he soon saw the impossibility of defending the town in the face of such an army as that of the Imperial general, and capitulated. Tilly took up his quarters in the only house left standing in the devastated suburb. It happened to belong to the sexton of the cemetery, and is still shown as a historical relic of those days. For the first time in his long career the yet unconquered veteran was a prey to doubt, uncertainty, and apprehensions. The officers of Tilly's staff observed him change colour as he stepped into the chief room of the "Totengrüberrathchen," or house of the gravedigger, where the emblems of mortality, skulls, cross-bones, and the like, that adorned the walls, seemed to inspire him with a superstitious foreboding of ill. "The spirit of Magdeburg seemed to hover over him," says Schiller.

Nor was Gustavus Adolphus free from such apprehensions as might well affect the bravest leader about to put his fortune to the touch, and win or lose it all. Upon the issue of the battle he was about to risk depended the future position of the Swedes in Germany, and, indeed, of Sweden itself, among the Powers of Europe. A defeat at this crisis would have been ruinous.

Such were the circumstances under which the celebrated Battle of Breitenfeld, near Leipsic, was fought, on the 7th of September, 1631. The combined Swedish and Saxon army, under Gustavus and Bernhard of Weimar, and that of the Emperor and the League, under Tilly and his general Pappenheim, were about equal in strength, each numbering about 35,000 m.n. The order-of-battle on both sides was excellent, as might have been expected of two such masters as Tilly and Gustavus in the art of war; but the plan of the Imperialist leader to act on the defensive was frustrated by the impetuosity of Pappenheim, who, by a premature attack, forced him to descend from the strong entrenched position he occupied to the support of the cavalry. "This man will rob me of my fame, and ruin the Emperor's cause," angrily exclaimed the old Marshal. Gustavus, on his part, turned the advantage thus gained to the very best account, and himself gave the issue to the day like Cromwell at Marston Moor. The defeat of the Im-perialists was complete and crushing. In the evening hardly more than 600 men of Tilly's army remained together, and he himself, wounded and baffled, was in full retreat towards Halle; whence, as his scattered forces came in, he retreated still further to defend Lower Saxony, and, if necessary, Bavaria itself against the advancing foe. In one day his fortune and his reputation for invincibility had been shattered; and he moreover received strict orders from the startled governments at Vienna and Munich to act only on the defensive, and to risk no further battle against the King of Sweden.

SECOND DEFEAT OF TILLY; HIS DEATH.

The fame of Gustavus now filled the whole continent of Europe; and many who had hesitated in the struggle between inclination and interest, wavered no longer, but openly took part with the champion who had defeated the Emperor's ablest general. From this time the career of the Swedish King becomes more decided, and his triumphs follow one another with astonishing rapidity. He seemed to have gained confidence in himself by the issue of the great struggle of Breitenfeld; and this confidence diffused itself throughout his whole army. Tilly made one more desperate stand on the banks of the Lech, to prevent the advancing conqueror from penetrating into Bavaria. His position on the bank of the river was considered almost impregnable; but he was outgeneralled by Gustavus, who inflicted a serious defeat upon him. Here Tilly's career ended. At the combat on the banks of the Lech his leg was shattered by a cannon ball; and he received other injuries from which he died a few days later. He was one of the strangest apparitions of that strange time, a man who seems to have been governed by two dominant ideas—hatred of the Protestants, and desire for military glory. In person he was the very reverse of Gustavus: for Tilly was short of stature, with a face to which the wrinkled forehead, the sinister expression of the eye, the long hooked nose and fleshless cheeks gave the appearance of a bird of prey. He was regarded with superstitious dread by his soldiers, much of his influence with whom depended upon the idea of his invincibility. His death was a heavy blow to the cause of the Emperor: for now there was neither army nor general in the field fitted to oppose Gustavus Adolphus, who pressed forward unopposed into the heart of Bavaria, took Nürnberg, and entered Munich itself: everywhere scrupulously maintaining the courtesies of war, and treating the conquered territory rather with the graciousness of a merciful ruler than the harshness of an enemy. There is little doubt that the King at this time meditated a new Empire of Germany—an Empire in which Protestantism was to be the form of religion by law established, though other forms were to receive toleration, and of which he was to be the head.

RECALL OF WALLENSTEIN ; HIS EXCEPTIONAL POWERS ; HIS AMBITION AND POLICY.

The Emperor Ferdinand was now in the greatest perplexity and danger. Deposition and ruin stared him in the face. He had always depended, in a large degree, for the safety of his throne upon Maximilian of Bavaria, Tilly, and the army of the League ; and all these had now failed him. If Gustavus chose to press forward to Vienna itself, and to dictate terms of peace to the Emperor in the imperial palace, there seemed little to prevent him. One man only remained who could be trusted to confront the storm ; and to him Ferdinand applied urgently, though with a heart foreboding evil things, in his distress. This last refuge in trouble was Wallenstein, who, indeed, had looked forward to the time when his services would be indispensable to the Emperor, and in his ostentatious retirement had always kept himself in readiness for the emergency. To him came two imperial envoys, the Councillors Questenberg and Werdenberg, with offers of reinstatement in the Imperial service ; requesting Wallenstein to forget the past and to accept the command of the Emperor's forces at this dangerous crisis, which he alone had the skill to direct in Ferdinand's favour.

Wallenstein perceived his advantage, and used it unmercifully. At first he entirely declined the offer of employment, alleging the manner in which he had been sacrificed to his enemies, and dismissed at their desire. "He preferred," he said, "freedom and independence on his own territories, to a service where jealousy and ingratitude was the reward of success." The envoys knew exactly how much all this was worth, and saw that it was Wallenstein's intention to put the highest possible value on the services he affected to withhold. Their importunity increased in proportion to his reluctance ; and at length he undertook the command of the Imperial forces under such conditions as a subject has very rarely been able to dictate to his sovereign. He was to be "Generalissimus," and all the Emperor's troops, in every part of the empire, were to be considered as under his control and command. He was to have complete power to carry on the war according to his own plan ; to make accommodations or terms with the enemy ; to choose his own method and plan of attack, etc. ; and not even the Emperor himself was to have the right of interfering with him in any way. The right of filling the vacant colonelcies to the regiments was also given to him ; and thus he entered upon the campaign with the power of an independent monarch, rather than as a subject in the service of a Prince. But every other consideration had to give way before the pressing necessity of arresting the victorious march of Gustavus Adolphus. "Means must be devised to check this imperious Visigoth in the career of his victories," was the urgent cry of many a Cabinet.

WALLENSTEIN AND GUSTAVUS AT NÜRNBERG.

From the moment when the authority was thus placed in the hands of Wallenstein, causes of jealousy and mistrust began to arise. It was difficult, almost impossible, to fathom or even to guess the designs of that secretive and ambitious man. That he was fully determined to avail himself of his privilege of free action to the very utmost, was soon made manifest. He disregarded the injunctions of the Emperor to march to the assistance of Maximilian of Bavaria, against whom he had a grudge connected with his former dismissal. He remained inactive when his army had already attained large proportions, and he was expected to undertake something decisive. It even appeared that he was not unwilling to avoid an action, although in numbers his army far exceeded that of the enemy. "There have been battles enough," he said ; "it is time to try another method." The King of Sweden held Nürnberg with his army. Wallenstein moved his forces with great deliberation to that city, and established himself in an entrenched camp of extraordinary strength, in such a position as to cut the enemy off from receiving supplies. The climate,—to which they were unaccustomed,—the incessant labours and toils of a harassing siege, and a feeling of discouragement at their isolation, began to cause a great mortality in the Swedish camp ; and Gustavus Adolphus, apprehensive of the effect of Wallenstein's Fabian tactics, tried to provoke his opponent to a general engagement, frequently offering him battle, which Wallenstein as pertinaciously refused. At length Gustavus Adolphus made a desperate attack on Wallenstein's entrenched camp. He was beaten back in spite of the brilliant valour of his troops ; for the position of Wallenstein was, in truth, almost impregnable. The fight was the hottest that great war had as yet witnessed. Both Wallenstein and the Duke Bernhard of Weimar had their horses shot under them; and the King of Sweden had his boot-sole torn away by a ball. Charge after charge was made upon the entrenched camp, and beaten back. When night fell, the Swedish King had lost 2,000 men, and had not won a single handbreadth of position. Ordinary prudence forbade him to renew the attack on the following day; especially as a heavy rain, that fell during the night, had rendered the rising ground of the entrenched camp more slippery and difficult than ever. But still the two armies stood watching one another, each hoping the other would be compelled by want and famine to quit the ground. The trouble the heroic King felt most deeply was the relaxation of discipline, and the cruelty and license brought about by want and the exasperation of a long resistance. It is an almost invariable rule that the best troops degenerate in discipline during a long war; and the general rule of plundering and ravaging the surrounding districts, carried to its utmost extent by Wallenstein's troops, now spread to the army of his magnanimous opponent; being first practised by their Saxon allies; while the way the German officers winked at, or even openly countenanced, these proceedings, awakened the greatest indignation in the honest-minded King. "It is you yourselves, ye Germans," he exclaimed, "who rob your own fatherland, and rage against your comrades in the faith. God be my witness, I detest you—I abhor you; and my heart is bitter within me when I look at you. You transgress my orders; you are the reason that the world detests me, and that I am pursued by the tears of undeserved poverty, and that I am compelled to hear men say openly. 'The King our friend, does us more harm than our angriest foes. For your sakes I have denuded my crown of its treasures, and spent more than forty tons of gold; and from your German Empire I have not received wherewithal to clothe myself at need. I gave you everything that God had imparted to me; and everything He may vouchsafe to give me in the future I would willingly have shared with you. Your bad discipline convinces me that your intentions are evil, however great occasion I may have to praise your valour.'" In such outspoken fashion did the King rebuke the degeneracy of his allies; but the influence of one man was no longer sufficient to restrain the growing spirit of robbery and spoliation.

GUSTAVUS IN SAXONY.

At length, when the whole district round about Nürnberg for many miles had been entirely laid waste, many villages burnt, and the whole country utterly drained of supplies, and when the losses of the Swedes and their allies through sword and pestilence had reached the fearful total of 2,000 men, Gustavus's iron pertinacity finally gave way, and he broke up his camp, and quitted Nürnberg, passing once more in full battle array before the entrenched camp of his opponent, to invite him again to a battle, which was again declined. Wallenstein himself, after allowing his troops a few days' rest, set fire to his own camp, and marched with his army towards Forchheim, triumphant in the success of his policy, by which he had undoubtedly inflicted a great blow upon Gustavus, and on the Protestant cause in Germany. Wallenstein's next operations were against the Saxons; and his intention was ostensibly to dissolve the alliance subsisting between Saxons and Swedes. Gustavus, whose affairs took a turn for the better as the year proceeded, and who had received strong reinforcements from Sweden, generously gave ear to a strong appeal made to him by his somewhat unsteady ally the Elector of Saxony; and, to the neglect of his own plans, hastened to the assistance of Saxony. He marched through Thuringia, and joined Duke Bernhard of Weimar at Arnstadt, where he found himself at the head of 20,000 well-disciplined troops. At Erfurt he took leave of his Queen, Maria Eleonora, who was destined never to see him again alive. On the 1st of November, 1632, he was at Naumburg. Wallenstein had hastened towards Naumburg to meet him; for already a rumour was current in Germany, consequent upon the tactics he had followed before Nürnberg, that he feared to try conclusions with the Northern hero; and the continuance of this belief would have been fatal to his influence with his troops. The season was, however, far advanced. It seemed unlikely that the King of Sweden would quit his strong position to attack his opponents under unfavourable circumstances, and Wallenstein accordingly, looking upon operations as finished for the year, allowed his troops to prepare their winter quarters, taking care, however, to keep them together, so that they should be immediately available if required.

Count Pappenheim was sent away, with the greater part of his troops, to march towards the Rhine, where the important city of Cologne was menaced by Dutch troops. But no sooner did Gustavus Adolphus hear of the departure of Pappenheim, than he determined to attack the enemy, now diminished to half their number, with his whole force, and, accordingly, advanced at once to Weissenfels. Greatly astonished at this rapid movement, Wallenstein was yet equal to the occasion. Couriers were despatched in hot haste to recall Pappenheim; and meanwhile Wallenstein took up a position between the Flossgraben, a canal uniting the rivers Elster and Saale, and the town of Lützen. He had, moreover, strengthened his position, as far as the short time allowed. Till far into the night the men of his army were hard at work deepening the ditches that defended the camp, erecting batteries and strengthening doubtful points. To conceal the weakness in numbers, the grooms and baggage-boys were ordered to mount on horseback and figure as cavalry, until the arrival of Pappenheim with his troops.

BATTLE OF LÜTZEN; DEATH OF GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS; CONCLUSION.

The King of Sweden, for his part, arriving on the plain in the evening of the 5th of November, 1632, drew up his army in battle array, ready to engage the enemy on the morrow. He had the same order he had observed at the Battle of Breitenfeld, mingling cavalry among his infantry, and dividing his forces into such bodies as could be most easily moved and manoeuvred in the face of the enemy. It was understood that the next day would decide whether the Swedish King or the Emperor's renowned General was to be considered the first general of the great Thirty Years' War. The Battle of Lützen, fought on the 6th November, 1632, the great central point of the long contest, has about it some of the elements of romance.

The King on that day was unable, through a recent wound, to wear armour. He is said to have had a presentiment of the fatal destiny that awaited him, and not to have shown the cheerful alacrity usual with him on a day of battle. Nevertheless he addressed a few words of hearty exhortation to his army, and with the words, "Jesu, Jesu, Jesu, let us fight to-day for the honour of my holy Name!" gave the signal to advance. The watchwords were, as at Breitenfeld, "God with us!" for the Lutherans; and "Jesus, Maria," for the Catholics. The first attack was by a charge of Swedish cavalry against the enemy, supported by the infantry, marching against the ditches. It resulted in the triumph of the Swedes and the discomfiture of their opponents; two out of five battalions had already been overcome, when the Duke of Friedland succeeded, by his personal exertions, in restoring order, and arresting the steps of those who had already turned to fly. So complete was the rallying, that the advantages gained by the Swedes were lost, and a thousand men had perished without altering the position of the two sides. The King, on the report of some confusion on his left wing, hastened, at the head of the Stenbock regiment, to restore order. He was shortsighted; and a fog that hung over the plain prevented him from seeing how near his fiery horse was carrying him to the extremity of the enemy's wing. His horse was wounded by a pistol-shot in the neck, and presently a bullet struck the King in the left arm, shattering the bone. "It is nothing—follow me!" cried the heroic King; but almost fainting with agony, he begged the Duke of Lauenburg, who rode beside him, to lead him quietly out of the throng, so that the sight of his condition might not discourage his men. But at this moment he received a second shot, through the back, and sank slowly from his horse. "I have enough, brother," he murmured to the Duke; "seek thou to save thy life." All his companions fled, and he was left alone, with the exception of a paid honour, a lad of eighteen years, named Leubelling. This Leubelling, who died of his wounds a few days after, at Naumburg, deposed before his death before several witnesses that when the King sank from his horse, he offered him his own, towards which Gustavus stretched out his hands. But he was not able to lift the King on the horse; and a troop of Imperial Cuirassiers riding up presently afterwards, one of them, though Gustavus said who he was, shot him through the head. An attempt was afterwards made to ascribe his death to treachery, and Francis Albert, a son of the Duke of Lauenburg, a man of doubtful character, who was close to the King at the time of his death, was suspected of having shot him dead at the instigation of an enemy; but there is no foundation for the report; and the circumstances under which the King met his death are self-explanatory enough. His followers fought desperately to avenge him, and had defeated their foes, when the arrival of Pappenheim with reinforcements brought on a second battle, which raged till darkness put an end to it. The Swedes claimed the victory; for Wallenstein retreated in the night, leaving them possession of the field. The King had not died in vain. By his assistance the Protestant cause was able to maintain itself to the end of the struggle; but for him the Reformation would have been crushed out of Germany as it had been out of Bohemia.

SIMON DE MONTFORT.

"On our historical, as on our political hemisphere, a new dawn is arising; and among the darkened memories which the coming day shall gild with genial and grateful beams few shall shine more fairly than that of De Montfort." Westminster Review.

INJUSTICE OF HISTORY.

IT has been only in comparatively recent days, and as the result of modern investigation, and a more liberal understanding of the significance of events, that the greatness and influence of Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, have been recognized. Unquestionably the representative and leader of the great baronial party which completed, in the reign of Henry the Third, the work begun in the time of the weak and dissolute John, and almost as unquestionably (although some inquirers have some doubt of his claims in this respect) the originator of our great system of Parliamentary representation, by which the "Commons" have so great an influence in legislation, it has been the fate of De Montfort to be lightly esteemed, or even denounced as a traitor and a selfish conspirator, by historians of high repute.

Later critics, however, have done him justice, and he now stands revealed in the historic page as a far-sighted statesman, a bold and accomplished military leader, whose great ability gave him a predominant influence over the warlike and impetuous barons, who were impatient of the weakness of the king, and of his subordination to a crowd of rapacious foreigners, upon whom were bestowed, irrespective of personal merit or fitness, offices of emolument in the court, in the church, and in the judicature. He is revealed, too, not only as the leader of the barons in the great struggle, but as the champion of the oppressed people, and the vindicator of their claims to political consideration. How can we be otherwise than interested in the career of a man who made so great a mark upon his age?

About the middle of the twelfth century, a French noble, Simon the Bald, Count de Montfort, descendant of a French king, married Amicie de Beaumont (known as Blanchemains "white hands"), the daughter and co-heiress of Robert Fitzpamel, Earl of Leicester, and his wife Petronilla, the lady who bequeathed to the church at Leicester a rope made of her own hair to suspend the lamp in the choir. This Petronilla was descended from William Fitz-Osborne, Lord of Breteuil, in Normandy, Earl of Hereford, a friend of the Conqueror, and was also the heiress of Hugh de Grantmenell, Baron of Hinckley, and Hereditary Grand Steward of England. The Earl of Leicester outlived his son-in-law, and, on his death, Simon, the second of the five sons of Simon the Bald, succeeded to the title and hereditary honours.

This second Simon de Montfort, father of the more illustrious bearer of the name, was a man of note in his day, and we must give a brief space to his history, which materially influenced the early fortunes of his son. Two years after he became Earl of Leicester, he appears to have engaged in some act of rebellion—probably one of those active protests against encroachments by King John on what were believed to be baronial rights, so frequent in those unsettled times—and was banished from the kingdom, his title and estates being declared forfeited. He had many adherents, and, indeed, so powerful was his influence, that King John believed in the authenticity of a rumour that some of the foremost barons were engaged in a conspiracy, the object of which was to dethrone him and place the crown on the head of Simon.

Driven from his own country, this warlike and energetic baron, conspicuous for his stature and strength, a born leader of armies, and a devout son of the Church,—knowing neither doubt nor scruple when the Pope required his services, soon found congenial employment abroad. Count Montalembert, the modern Roman Catholic historian, refers with admiration to Simon's "inviolable purity of morals, and inflexible devotion to ecclesiastical authority." The stern, pitiless, able warrior was a fit instrument to be employed in the terrible work of extirpation against the heretic Albigenses, on which Pope Innocent III. was then entering.

The conquered territories of Count Raymond of Toulouse and his allies were given by the Pope to the great leader; but Simon did not live to possess them in peace, for he was killed by a stone at the siege of Toulouse in 1218. His wife survived him three years; and his eldest son, Almeric, who became Constable of France in succession to his grandfather, De Montmorency, having been unsuccessful in maintaining his inheritance against the successors of Raymond, ceded his claim to Louis VIII. of France.

The redoubtable Count de Montfort and his Countess, Alice, were the parents of four sons and two daughters. The eldest son, Almeric, mentioned above, took part in the Crusades, and married Beatrice, the daughter of Count de Vienne; and their son, John, renounced all English claims. The second son, Guy, was also a Crusader, and was killed at Castelnaudery four years after his marriage with Petronilla Countess of Bigorre, who survived him thirty-five years, and consoled herself for his loss by marrying four other husbands, all of whom she outlived. Robert, a third son, died unmarried; and the fourth son was the most famous of the race, the Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, whose career we are relating.

THE EARLDOM OF LEICESTER.

A year before the death of King John, the forfeited English estates of the elder Simon had been granted to his nephew, Ranulph, Earl of Chester, a youth, Peter de Roches, Bishop of Winchester, holding the lands in trust. It is probable that the new King, Henry III., or at least his advisers, were not unwilling that the gift should be set aside, and that, certain conditions being complied with, the dignities and estates might revert to the De Montfort family. Almeric de Montfort, the eldest of the brothers, had frequently since his father's death urged his claims, and when, in 1232, the Earl of Chester died, he sent his brother Simon (the intervening brothers being dead), to England, with a petition to King Henry. Thinking it possible that his own offer to do homage might be disallowed, as he had recently succeeded to the high office of Constable of France, he professed that he would be satisfied if Simon, who held no lands under the French King, were permitted to do homage.

To this arrangement King Henry acceded; and Almeric having made a solemn renunciation of his claims in favour of his brother (with the reversion only in case of failure of heirs male), Simon was admitted to the hereditary possessions and honours in the presence of the King at Shrewsbury, in May, 1232.

DE MONTFORT AT COURT.

At the age of about thirty-two (there is some discrepancy as to the date of his birth, but there seems to be good authority for fixing it in the year 1200), the young Frenchman appeared at the English Court as Earl of Leicester. He inherited the noble physical frame and mental qualities of his father, and the more versatile mind and quick talents of his mother, the daughter of the Montmorencies. The Chronicle of Lanercost describes him as tall and handsome; and other authorities mention him as "a gentleman of choice blood, education, and features." In his youth he had experience of the hardships of war, and had probably taken part in campaigns by the side of his renowned father. In France he had associated not only with princes and courtiers, but with learned men, and there is reason to believe that he was, in respect of intellectual culture, far in advance of the majority of the English barons. During a long period he kept up a literary correspondence with Adam de Marisco, one of the most distinguished scholars of the thirteenth century. He was ambitious of a distinguished alliance, and had sought marriage with widowed ladies of princely blood; but the French King, not pleased perhaps by the withdrawal of so gallant a gentleman from his own Court, interfered to prohibit the alliances. The lady first sought was Matilda, Countess of Boulogne; the second, Joan, Countess of Flanders, and widow of a Portuguese prince. In the latter case, indeed, a form of marriage appears to have been gone through; but when, several years afterwards, the lady married Prince Thomas of Savoy, she took a solemn oath that her marriage with Simon de Montfort was not valid.

MARRIAGE OF HENRY III.

Four years after his accession to the title, the Earl of Leicester, in the performance of the duties of his inherited office of High Steward, attended to hold the basin of water at the feast which followed the coronation of the young Queen Eleanor, whom King Henry III. espoused in January, 1236. The King had expressed himself strongly averse to matrimony, although, for reasons of state, his council were continually urging him to contract it. When almost a child, he had been betrothed to Joanna, afterwards Queen of Castile; and that promise having been annulled by the Pope's dispensation, five unsuccessful treaties for his marriage with other princesses were proposed. At length, at the age of twenty-nine, he yielded to remonstrances, and offered his hand to Eleanor, one of the four beautiful daughters of Raymond, Count of Provence, all of whom became queens. Some of the manuscript poems of this accomplished lady are still preserved at Turin; and it is said that specimens of her poetic talent having reached the English Court, led to her marriage with the King of England.

CONDITION OF ENGLAND.

As this royal marriage greatly affected the social and political condition of England, and was indeed one of the causes which led indirectly to the outbreak of the civil wars of which De Montfort was the great central figure, it may be advisable to sketch briefly the condition of England in the twenty years which had elapsed between the accession of the boy king and his marriage.

When John, King of England, died miserably in the abbey at Newark, on the 19th of October, 1216, his eldest son, Prince Henry, was only just ten years old. The barons, who shortly before had invited the assistance of the King of France in their opposition to the misgovernment of John, began to weary of the alliance they had courted. Determined to dethrone the weak and vicious King, they had permitted, even invited, the Dauphin Louis, who led the French army, to assume the title of King of England, and he was even crowned in London before the death of John. Very soon, however, the barons discovered that they were drifting towards a greater danger than that from which they had wished to escape.

After the death of John, the barons were divided into three parties. Some were ready to acknowledge the French Dauphin as King of England; others were for uniting England with France. The leading motive of these two parties was to present a firm front against the pretensions of Rome, the Pope, before the King's death, having pronounced Magna Charta to be void, and claimed that John had annexed the kingdom to the Roman see. The third, more strictly the national party, supported the claims of young Prince Henry to the throne; and events contributed to make their influence paramount.

The French soldiers, we read in contemporary records, began to conduct themselves as if they were in a conquered country. "The greater the resistance," says the historian Thierry, "made by the English to their arbitrary exactions, the more did these foreign invaders show themselves cruel and grasping; and the accusation which had been so fatal to King John was renewed against the Dauphin Louis. It was said that he had favoured a project, in concert with his father, for exterminating or banishing all the rich men of England, and for putting Frenchmen in their places."

The Normans who had come over with the Conqueror a hundred and fifty years before had felt no scruples about seizing the estates of the English nobles and assuming their titles, and their descendants readily enough acquiesced in this doctrine of the right of the strong hand; but even those who had been the first to invite French aid seriously objected to the followers of Louis imitating the example. They united to defend their order as they had united to wring the Great Charter from John; and now, as then, found it was their interest to take sides with the townsmen and common people. They had welcomed the French Dauphin as the saviour of the kingdom; in the revulsion of feeling they echoed the words which Shakespeare has put into the mouth of Faulconbridge:—

"Shall a boardless boy,
A cockered silken wanton, brave our fields,
And flesh his spirit in a warlike soil;
Mocking the air with colours idly spread,
And find no check?"

For the first time a national spirit of independence united the hitherto antagonistic Norman and English races—the subduers and the subdued; and that spirit, destined before many years were past to give a definite shape to the British constitution, is best expressed by again quoting the words of the gallant Bastard:—

"This England never did, nor ever shall,
Lie at the proud foot of a conqueror,
But when it first did help to wound itself.
Come the three corners of the world in arms,
And we shall shock them;—nought shall make us rue,
If England to itself do ext but true."

That spirit served the arms of the stout knights and men-at-arms who fought under De Montfort

(foreign by birth, but English by adoption) in the great war of the barons against foreign influences; that spirit animated alike the Englishmen who sailed forth to meet the great Armada, and their descendants who conquered in the great sea-fight of Trafalgar.

"Wherefore," says the historian already quoted, "being excited for the general welfare to take up arms, all parties united in favour of Prince Henry, the son of King John." Open war broke out between the now united barons and the French prince. After several contests, Louis was defeated at Lincoln. His father, Philip Augustus, King of France, despatched reinforcements, under the leadership of a desperado known as "Eustace the Monk," but perhaps more accurately described as "a well-known freebooter of the Channel." To intercept this force, embarked in eighty large ships, an English fleet of forty vessels, many of them of small size, was fitted out, and sailed from Dover under the command of Hubert de Burgh (an able and patriotic Englishman, whom Shakespeare, less just than usual, has painted in odious colours in King John). The fleets met, and the English displayed that prowess on the sea which is their national characteristic, although it must be admitted that, in one respect at least, their mode of fighting was rather peculiar. "From the decks of the English vessels bowmen poured their arrows into the crowded transports; others hurled quicklime into their enemies' faces, while the more active vessels crashed with their armed prows into the sides of the French ships." Eustace the Monk, accustomed to fierce fighting as no doubt he was, was disastrously beaten by the brave sailors of the Cinque Ports, and his large fleet was utterly destroyed.

This defeat sealed the fate of the foreign interlopers. Louis accepted terms of capitulation, by which the lives of his followers were granted on condition of their immediately quitting England.

THE YOUNG KING'S COUNSELLORS.

At that time the leading spirit among the English nobles was William Marischall, Earl of Pembroke, a man of great sagacity, patriotism, influence, and wealth. By his marriage with the heiress of Richard, Earl of Pembroke, better known as Strongbow, the conqueror of Ireland, he had succeeded to the title and immense estates in that country. He was appointed Regent during the minority of Henry, and for three years governed the country with great wisdom and ability, maintaining the principles of the Great Charter. After his death, in 1219, Peter de Roches, Bishop of Winchester, a native of Poitou, who had been an active soldier in his youth, and who in his advanced years, long after he had been elevated to the episcopacy, was (according to Matthew Paris) selected by the Pope to command his troops—became Regent. The young King was the weak instrument of his power, and was encouraged to distrust his nobles, and dismiss a large number from the offices and dignities they enjoyed, their places being filled by foreigners.

For a time Hubert de Burgh exercised a wholesome check on the Bishop of Winchester. His great services and high character made him popular, and the King (who was declared of age when sixteen years old) in his feeble fashion honoured and trusted him. He had married Margaret, sister of Alexander II. of Scotland, was created Earl of Kent, and in 1228 appointed Justiciary of England for life. This was the highest office the King could bestow, and the duties were discharged with ability and success, but with severity. Bishop Des Roches, though no longer Regent, was his bitter opponent, and a more formidable enemy was found in Richard, Earl of Cornwall, the King's brother. The result was that, within four years of his appointment to the great office of Justiciary, the King, fickle and easily influenced, deprived him of his honours and estates, and sent him to prison.

The Bishop was again (1232) placed at the head of affairs, and again foreigners swarmed into the kingdom, and again the provisions of the Great Charter were systematically violated, and the national liberties subjected to encroachment. When a demand was made of him that he should observe the Charter of John, he arrogantly replied, "I am no Englishman that I should know these charters and these laws." One of the Bishop's foreign favourites, Stephen de Segrave, who had been a priest, but—holy orders were but light bonds in those days—had been afterwards knighted, and had received the grant of large estates, succeeded De Burgh as Justiciary; and then, says an old chronicler, "Judgment was entrusted to the unjust, the laws to outlaws, peace to the turbulent, and justice to wrong-doers."

Within a year after the restoration to almost absolute power of the Bishop of Winchester, his conduct had become so intolerable that a combination of clergy and laity, headed by Edmund of Abingdon, Archbishop of Canterbury, compelled the King to dismiss him, and the Archbishop was placed at the head of affairs.

POPULAR DISCONTENT.

Such was the condition of England when Simon de Montfort succeeded to the title of Earl of Leicester, and appeared as High Steward at the English Court. The barons were angry at the preference shown to foreigners; the common folk bore sullenly the extortions and tyrannies of the privileged classes. The Church, to which they had been taught to look as to some extent the champion of their liberties against kingly or baronial oppression, was crowded with aliens, whose chief care was to obtain as much wealth as possible from their benefices, a desire increased by the Papal exactions, which exceeded all former demands. Pope Gregory IX. demanded a tithe of all the moveables of the priesthood under threats of excommunication; and the demands were increased as the Papal treasury became more and more in need of money. Presentations to English benefices were openly sold in Italy, and the purchasers were "quartered on the best livings in the Church."

A year before the King's marriage, the long pent-up discontent assumed the form of active resistance. Armed men scattered letters over the kingdom, purporting to come from "the whole body of those who prefer to die rather than be ruined by the Romans." The tithes gathered for the Pope were seized and given to the poor, and the collectors were beaten and their letters of authority trodden under foot. It has been thought that Hubert de Burgh, the Justiciary, secretly encouraged these popular demonstrations, and certainly the sheriffs and other peace officers did not interfere. Probably this suspicion added the Church to his other enemies, and hastened his downfall.

Mr. Green, in his "History of the English People," says, "The old reverence for the Papacy was falling away before the universal resentment at its political ambition, its lavish use of interdict and excommunication for purely secular ends, its degradation of the most sacred sentences into means of financial extortion." With characteristic artfulness, it employed an agency to divert the popular indignation from itself to the secular Government. Begging friars, of the Franciscan and Dominican orders, shrewd, eloquent, and possessing the art of speaking to the comprehension of the people, rambled through England; and, says Mr. Green, "the rudest countryman learned the tale of a king's oppression, or a patriot's hopes, as he listened to the rambling, passionate, humorous discourse of the begging friar."

Popular ballads, too, stirred the national blood—ballads rude in construction, but vigorous and stirring, not appealing to literary taste, for nothing of the sort existed among the half-starved peasants and obtuse swineherds who listed to the wandering minstrel's jingle, but exciting the feelings by telling the stories of gay foresters who defied the laws imposed by oppression, and claimed the broad lands of England for Englishmen. Robin Hood and his merry men may or may not have been the fictitious creation of ballad-mongers, but they represented a type very dear to the bulk of the nation at that epoch, when the poor were cruelly oppressed by the half-breeds, with Norman tongue and Norman manners, when the Church was extortionate and corrupt, when the barons, at enmity among themselves, were ready to league together against the supreme tyranny and insincerity of the Crown.

OFFICES AND GIFTS FOR ALIENS.

The marriage of the King with Eleanor of Provence was the signal for a new influx of foreigners, a new bestowal of gifts, a new contempt for native worthiness and great services. The uncle of the young Queen, Count William of Champagne, accompanied her to England, and the weak King yielded to the influence of his brilliant bride and the arts of her astute relative. The Count was one of those curious products of those troubled times, a soldier-churchman; the Pope having given him the rich bishopric of Valence to secure his military talents in the war against the Emperor. King Henry would have made him Bishop of Winchester, the see being vacant by the disgrace of Des Roches; but the hand of the murderer intervened, the Count being poisoned at Viterbo in 1239. Matthew Paris, the chronicler, tells us that the King's grief at the loss was so great that he tore his clothes and cast them into the fire, and remained for some time in seclusion, the groans heard from the chamber where he shut himself in being the only evidence that he was alive.

Another uncle of the Queen, Peter of Savoy, who arrived in England two years afterwards, received a grant of the extensive domain of Richmond, in Yorkshire, and the castles of Pevensey and Hastings, and was raised to the chief place at the council-board. He was, in addition, appointed guardian of the young Earl de Warenne and Surrey, by which he became virtual master of Lewes Castle, and possessed of great influence in Sussex. His memory is to this day perpetuated in London by the Savoy Chapel in the Strand, which was originally an adjunct of the splendid palace where he resided when in London. He was knighted with great pomp in Westminster Abbey, and a few years after his arrival performed a rather remarkable exploit, visiting France, and returning with a party of young ladies of noble birth, several of them related to the Queen, who were speedily married to wealthy young nobles, who had been by royal authority made wards of Peter and his friends.

A brother of Peter, Boniface, a handsome, dissolute, ignorant young man, was actually appointed by the King Archbishop of Canterbury, to the disgust of the clergy of the cathedral, several of whom quitted their stalls, and became Carthusian monks. He was enthroned with great pomp, and began with much alacrity to fill his private coffers from the revenues of the see. His numerous retainers followed his example, pillaged the markets, and robbed right and left. The Archbishop was as brutal as he was ignorant. Once he visited in great state the convent of St. Bartholomew, the prior of which respectfully but firmly declined to recognise his authority. The Archbishop, being quite incapable of arguing the matter as a scholar or divine, was quite capable of adopting another method of asserting his position. He knocked the aged prior down in the choir of the church, used a considerable amount of very uncanonical language, and shouted, "This is the way to treat English traitors." While so engaged, his canonical robes were disarranged, showing the armour which the truculent prelate wore beneath. His attendants followed their leader, and unmercifully beat the canons and priests, who, bleeding from their wounds, made their way to the palace, and asked an audience of the King, who refused to see them. The citizens were roused, and pursued the Archbishop to his palace at Lambeth, in which he took refuge until he could escape across the sea, where he found congenial employment in political intrigue and military expeditions.

Still another of the Queen's uncles! Her mother's brother, Thomas, Count of Maurienne, visited her, and was received with such magnificence that the popular ridicule was excited. He bore it with equanimity, being consoled by receiving handsome grants from the English exchequer. He would have been permitted to take a toll on every sack of wool exported, but Simon Norman, Keeper of the King's Seal, positively refused to affix it to the official document, and was, of course, immediately disgraced and turned out of office.

Peter de Aigue Blanche, a Savoyard, who had been chaplain and steward to Count William of Champagne, and who had advised that all Church preferments should be given to foreigners, was himself made Bishop of Hereford. He afterwards became notorious, when at Rome he devised a notable expedient for raising money for payment of the King's debt to the Pope. He drew bills of exchange (a recent mercantile invention) on the English clergy, and the Papal legate in this country was directed to make them affix their signatures. Many yielded to intimidation, but Fulk de Bassett, Bishop of London, a very able and popular prelate, described in a contemporary chronicle as "the anchor of the whole kingdom, and the shield of its safety," sturdily refused, and when threatened with the loss of his mitre, replied significantly, "Then I will put on my helmet."

Queen Eleanor's relations and their friends, however, were not permitted to have all the good things to themselves. The King's mother, Isabella of Angoulême, who, after John's death, had married her first love, Hugh le Brun, Count de Marche, a troubadour poet, had Poitevin connexions to provide for. Several ladies were married to English nobles by direct command or influence of the King. When the Queen-Dowager died, her five sons and three daughters arrived in England, and were soon enriched by the gifts of their half-brother the King. The youngest son, Aymer, was made Bishop of Winchester, having been previously rejected by the Chapter of Durham. His brother, William de Valence, married the granddaughter of the great Earl of Pembroke, and so became possessed of the title and estates, and was very solemnly knighted in Westminster Abbey by the King, who appeared on the occasion miserably clad and wan with fasting, as marks of humility.

Nearly all offices about the Court, from the highest to the lowest, from that of the treasurer and privy councillor to that of cook and scullion in the kitchen, were held by foreigners, who quarrelled among themselves and plundered all they could. Mr. Green says, "The whole machinery of administration passed into the hands of men who were ignorant and contemptuous of the principles of English government or English law. Their rule was a mere anarchy; the very retainers of the royal household turned robbers, and pillaged foreign merchants in the precincts of the Court, and corruption invaded the judiciary."

In one sense England benefited by this influx of foreigners and the establishment of foreign relations. Commerce with other nations was certainly increased, and literature and art were greatly advantaged. Mr. Sharon Turner says, "Internal trade multiplied as foreign commerce enlarged. The increase of luxury diminished the fierce warlike spirit of the great; and the courtly splendour, and even effeminacy, introduced a love of peace, habits of courtesy, and a polish of manner, highly auxiliary to human happiness. The clergy were roused by the Papal avarice to a salutary resistance which preserved the liberties of the English Church."

But these advantages were not realized quickly. There was beneath the surface a fierce discontent—silent it might be, but still active and biding its time. Wealth accumulated in the towns, but the poor beyond the walls had little benefit, and the merchants themselves were exposed to unjust exactions both from Church and State. What would be thought now, if a market were established for the benefit of Westminster Abbey, and it were ordered by royal authority that while the market lasted the shops in London should be closed, so that all the custom should go to the market? Yet that was attempted by Henry III.

NEGLECT OF THE GREAT CHARTER.

In the regency of Pembroke the Great Charter was confirmed; but after his death it was, in defiance of repeated promises, openly ignored. The King was always ready to promise when he needed money; the Pope was always ready, for a consideration, to absolve him for breaking the promise. Once Henry most solemnly swore in Westminster Hall, before the barons and prelates, to adhere to the Charter. The original Magna Charta was produced, and the King and nobles set their seals to it, and then the presiding prelate pronounced the curse which "excommunicated, anathematized, and cut off from the threshold of Holy Church all who should, by any art or device, in any manner, secretly or openly, violate, diminish, or change, by word or writing, by deed or advice, either the liberties of the Church, or the liberties and free customs contained in the Great Charter, or the Charter of Forests." Twice afterwards the Charter was solemnly reaffirmed, and as often disregarded. Neither solemn oaths nor the ominous mutterings of discontent, the echoes of which could scarcely fail to reach Westminster, could make Henry faithful to his conscience or superior to the base influences which surrounded him. The provisions of the Charter were as little regarded as if the stout barons had never clustered round the false John at Runnymede; no man's life or property was safe, and no man's political rights were respected, unless he was wealthy enough and strong enough to hold his own.

MARRIAGE OF DE MONTFORT.

We have dwelt at some length on the political and social aspects of the time, because otherwise it would be difficult to describe the work which Simon de Montfort was called on to perform, and the opponents with whom he had to contend. The history of his period frames the portrait of the man.

Wealthy, noble, among the first in all manly qualities, equalled by few about the Court in intellectual culture, endowed with a handsome person and graceful manners, the Earl of Leicester might, no doubt, have offered himself as a lover, not likely to be rejected, to almost any of the young beauties who surrounded Queen Eleanor. We have already mentioned his previous matrimonial ambition; and he now proffered love to a very distinguished lady indeed—no other than the King's sister, Eleanor, the widow of William Earl of Pembroke, son of the great Regent, himself a warrior of renown, who lies buried in the old Temple Church of London. Of that union there were no children, and after her husband's early death, Eleanor took a vow of perpetual widowhood, in the presence of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Chichester. For six years she kept the vow she made; but then the handsome, winning De Montfort crossed her path, and she forgot the past. He wooed and won her; and truer or more loving husband and wife have seldom been. The King sanctioned the union in a half-hearted manner, afterwards hinting that he did so to avoid scandal, although the hint conveyed an imputation on the honour of his own sister. The ceremony was privately performed by the King's chaplain in the little chapel of St. Stephen, attached to the royal palace at Westminster; and it is remarkable that for centuries afterwards the chapel where he stood as bridegroom was the meeting-place of the great Parliament of the Commons which he established.

The announcement of the marriage produced a great outcry. The churchmen denounced it as sacrilegious, the Princess having broken the vow so solemnly made. The barons declared that they should have been consulted as to the propriety of De Montfort, a foreigner by birth, becoming so nearly allied to the crown; and the bride's brother, Prince Richard, was especially angry, not only sharing the offended dignity of the barons, but foreseeing the probable accession of De Montfort to supreme power by right of his wife. As yet the marriage of the King had been un-fruitful; Richard himself had but one son, so that only two persons stood between Henry and his sister as possible wearers of the crown.

Apprehending that efforts might be made to annul the marriage, De Montfort secretly visited Rome, leaving his wife in security at Kenilworth. He took with him letters from the King to the Pope and Cardinals; secured besides the interest of the Emperor, at that time on friendly terms with the Papacy; and distributed large sums of money so adroitly that he obtained a favourable letter from the Pope to his legate in England. He returned in all haste, hurried to Kenilworth, and arrived there just in time to welcome the birth of a son.

QUARREL WITH THE KING.

Shortly afterwards, the birth of the King's son, Edward, disappointed any hopes Simon might have entertained as to the royal succession. He was one of the sponsors of the young prince; and in August he and the Countess attended at Westminster Abbey on the occasion of the churching of the Queen. But by that time a change had come over the spirit of the weak and vacillating King. When Simon and his wife presented themselves, the King reproached them with having contracted a sacrilegious marriage, his consent to which had been obtained by deception, and he prohibited them from entering the abbey. An exciting scene ensued. De Montfort—unwilling, probably, to exhibit his resentment in the sacred building, and against his sovereign, for whose weakness he probably entertained a contemptuous pity, and whom he knew to be a mere instrument of stronger minds—withdraw, leading his Countess, whose emotion found vent in tears. That evening the pair went down the Thames in a small boat, and embarked for the Continent. The career of Simon de Montfort as a mere courtier was ended, and thenceforth there was greater work to be done.

DE MONTFORT A CRUSADER.

The sixth Crusade, led by Thibaut, Count of Champagne, had just been entered on, and Simon de Montfort, a gallant knight, prepared himself for the expedition. Insulted in England, then practically ruled by greedy and insolent aliens, who feared his abilities and influence, and exulted over his disgrace, he resolved to share the fortunes of the Crusaders, in whose ranks his brother Almeric was enrolled. He shared the prejudices and the superstitions of the me; and probably thinking that he really had committed a sin by contracting his marriage, he ought to condone for it, not by a divorce—he loved his wife too well for that—but by sharing in the renewed effort to rescue Jerusalem from the Saracens, who had regained possession of the sacred city. A year after he left England he returned, for the purpose of raising money from his estates. The King was now in another mood, and honourably welcomed him.

Provided with funds necessary to maintain his dignity as a wealthy English baron, he made his journey to Palestine, and there greatly distinguished himself, especially in a fierce fight near Damascus (or, as some say, Jaffa), where his elder brother, Almeric, and other nobles were taken prisoners. Indeed, so high was the estimation in which he was held by the leaders of the Crusaders, that they sent a petition to the Emperor Frederick II., asking for the appointment of Simon de Montfort as Governor of Jerusalem.

In the following year he returned to Europe, accompanied by Almeric, who died on the journey at Otranto, in Italy. The King, who now bitterly regretted the conduct which had driven him from his Court so able a man, eagerly welcomed him. In France, where the English were engaged in war, De Montfort maintained his military reputation; and when he returned he obtained a grant of the lucrative wardship of the young Gilbert de Unfrville, which the King's brother had especially coveted; and he was appointed one of the twelve commissioners to whom the King entrusted the difficult task of remedying the sad condition of the royal finances.

BECOMES A POPULAR LEADER.

Although now fully restored to royal favour, he maintained his position as a leading champion of the people of his adopted country. In 1246, the barons and leading churchmen addressed a remarkable remonstrance to the Pope, who was making increasing demands. Matthew Paris, the chronicler, says that the money taken by the foreign clergy from the English Church was three times as much as the income of the King. Second among the signatures to this document was that of Simon de Montfort, and he may therefore be considered as fully concurring in the significant hint that "it would become their duty to raise a bulwark in defence of the house of the Lord and the liberty of the realm."

The determination to reform abuses, shared by Montfort, De Clare, and other barons, was made known to the King with stern earnestness in 1248. The prodigality of the Court, the influence of aliens, the unjust exactions on merchandize, and other grievances, were represented; and the King was startled into a fit of economy, and made desperate efforts to obtain money to discharge his obligations. He alternately threatened and cajoled the clergy, quarrelled with his half-brother, Bishop Aymer, for not assisting him to wring money from the bishops, and at one time was so pressed that he ordered John Mansel (one of his favourites, whom he had enriched by the gift of about six hundred benefices, and whose ostentation made him hateful to the common people) to pawn the image of the Virgin Mary to obtain money to pay the wages of those employed in the royal chapel. He invited himself as guest to the great abbeyes, "requiring rich complimentary presents in requital for such honour," reduced his household expenses to the lowest possible limit, and sold his silver plate and jewels.

De Montfort was preparing to return to Palestine, accompanied by his Countess; but, on the strong urging of the King, consented to forego his resolution and proceed to Gascony, where Gaston, Count de Bearn, and others were in rebellion. The rising was soon suppressed, and Gaston sent prisoner to England, where he was so successful in gaining the favour of the King that he was restored to his estates, a grace which he very soon afterwards repaid by instigating another rebellion.

In the following year De Montfort arranged a treaty of peace with Theobald, King of Navarre, but his foreign engagements did not divert his attention from home matters; and there is a record of his successful defence of the chartered liberties of London against threatened encroachments. When the outbreaks in Gascony were renewed, he raised funds by cutting down the timber on his estates, to assist in fitting out an effective expedition. His military achievements in this war were worthy of his reputation. He attacked and captured castles (among them those of Egremont and Chatillon) which had been considered impregnable; and the Gascons, unable to cope with him in the field, resorted to intrigue and falsehood, which they well knew were potent weapons in the English Court. The Archbishop of Bordeaux and others appeared before Henry, and made grave accusations against De Montfort, who, when informed of the proceeding, returned in haste to meet his calumniators face to face. Mr. Blaauw has so well related what followed, in "The Barons' War," that we quote his description:—

"A most extraordinary scene ensued, which the King's previous loss of character could alone have made possible within the precincts of a court. De Montfort appeared in the Council to silence his enemies by the refutation of their charges, and then appealed to the King's personal knowledge of their falsehood and of his own faithful services, reminding him with what promises of support he had encouraged him to undertake the command in Gascony for six years. 'Let your words be made good, my Lord King,' he exclaimed; 'keep your covenant with me, and replace those expenses which I have borne for you, to the notorious beggary of my own earldom.' On the King replying that 'he did not hold himself bound to fulfil promises made to a false traitor,' the affronted Earl lost all command of his impetuous temper, and in direct terms openly gave the lie to the King, intimating too that the shelter of his royalty alone protected him from feeling the consequences of such a charge. 'Who can believe you to be a Christian, or that you ever go to confession? Of what use, indeed, would such a mere form be without repentance and atonement?' The King, though goaded by these insults, did not dare to order his arrest, but gave vent in his reply to his long-harboured hate,—'Never has my repentance of anything been certainly more sincere than of having ever suffered you to enter England, and to enjoy those estates and honours which now so puff you up.'"

By the interposition of Prince Richard, the King's brother, and others, something like a reconciliation was effected; and Henry, anxious to be released from the presence of the high-spirited and outspoken Earl, desired him to go back to Gascony, "as he was so fond of war." "I will cheerfully go," replied De Montfort; "nor will I return till I have made your enemies your footstool, however ungrateful you may be."

THE REVOLT IN GASCONY.

Accompanied by his eldest son, Henry, he again started for Gascony, leaving his other children in the care of the good Bishop Grosseteste, of Lincoln, for their education. During his absence the rebels had greatly increased in strength, and nothing but the able leadership and personal intrepidity of De Montfort saved the English from defeat. Once he was unhorsed, and only by great exertions fought his way out of the crowd of assailants. His enemies at home were untiring in activity. The Queen persuaded her husband to deprive him of his command, and to put the young Prince Edward in his place; and the Archbishop of Bordeaux and others performed homage to the Prince as Seneschal of Gascony.

Justly incensed at this treacherous conduct, De Montfort at once quitted Gascony, and repaired to Paris, where—so high did he stand in the estimation of the highest persons in Europe—he was invited by the Queen-mother to act as regent of the kingdom during the absence of King Louis in Palestine. With some reluctance, perhaps, but with characteristic firmness, he refused the brilliant offer, and returned to England, resolved to devote his talents and energies to its welfare.

Encouraged by his absence, the Gascon rebellion strengthened, and the province would most probably have been lost, had not De Montfort, sinking all personal motives in his desire to advance the national interests, generously offered his services, which the perplexed monarch was only too glad to accept; and, to complete the reconciliation, agreed to pay the Earl for the unexpired term of his command in Gascony (three and a half years) which had been originally granted for six years. To raise the money, he borrowed from a London merchant, several barons pledging themselves to see it repaid.

The King, however, found money to make a visit to Paris, with every possible display of magnificent state; and the sumptuousness of the banquets he gave excited wonder even in that noble city. Matthew Paris describes the royal donations and convivialities as "exceeding those of Arthur or Charlemagne." The Pope, Innocent IV., on hearing of the richness of embroidery and the ornaments on ecclesiastical dresses, exclaimed in astonishment, "Truly England is our garden of delight! It is an unexhausted well; and where so much abounds, much may be acquired!" This inevitably suggests the remark of General Blücher, when riding through the city of London, after the battle of Waterloo, "What a city for to plunder!"

When the King returned, he was in greater want of money than ever. The Welsh had invaded the western counties, and the royal coffers were emptied. The Council was summoned, and fresh exactions were proposed. De Montfort and De Clare, Earl of Gloucester and Hertford, who almost rivalled him in energy and popularity, resisted the plan suggested, and a violent scene ensued, William de Valence having grossly insulted De Montfort, who, but for the interference of the King, would have resented the affront in a very summary manner. This spark kindled a great fire. De Montfort, and the barons who adhered to him, demanded that some securities should be given for the better government of the kingdom, which was almost in a state of insurrection, the people being driven to desperation by their abject poverty; and Henry, easily alarmed, solemnly vowed, at the tomb of Edward the Confessor, in Westminster Abbey, that he would amend the general grievances.

THE STATUTES OF OXFORD.

A great Council was summoned to meet at Westminster in May, 1258, and in the following month at Oxford, where, so vigorous and novel were the conclusions arrived at, that the opponents of reform gave to the meeting the name of "the Mad Parliament." About a hundred barons attended the Council, the sittings of which extended over a month. They brought with them armed retainers, numbering about 60,000 men. The more important of the enactments made—and they were indeed important, for they almost revolutionized the kingdom—provided for the orderly inheritance of property, forbade the disparaging marriages of wards and the wasteful grants to aliens, and required that the officers of state and the fortresses of the kingdom should be put into the hands of Englishmen only. Twenty-four persons, described as "counsellors to aid the King," were appointed to watch over the rigid execution of the laws, twelve being chosen by each party. De Montfort, De Clare, the Earl of Hereford, and Roger Mortimer of the Marches, were among those chosen by the barons; among those selected by the King, his own relations figured.

De Montfort, being himself a foreigner by birth, gave up his own castles of Kenilworth and Odiham (in Hampshire); and having thus set an example, told William de Valence and others, "To a certainty you shall either give up your castles or lose your heads."

All parties bound themselves by solemn oath to observe the Statutes, except the King's half-brother and his brother-in-law, Earl de Warrenne. The King soon obtained from the Pope a bull absolving him from keeping his oath; but those who refused to take it, or attempted to escape, were pursued and taken. The aliens, with a very few exceptions, were required to quit the kingdom, an order which they promptly obeyed, taking with them as much concealed treasure as possible. The castles held by them were entrusted to native hands, and Hugh de Bigot, a man of high reputation, was made Justiciary of England.

London and the other principal towns gave a ready assent to the Statutes of Oxford, which were solemnly proclaimed, together with the Great Charter, in the Latin, French, and English languages, in every county, in October, 1258. For the information especially of the common people, a circular letter, signed by the King, was distributed, and that was the first state document written in the English language.

REMONSTRANCE WITH THE POPE.

The barons at the same time sent messengers to the Pope, with a memorial explaining their conduct, pointing out the disastrous consequences of the introduction of so many Italians into English benefices, and demanding the dismissal of Aymer from the bishopric of Winchester, on the ground that he was "leading the King and Prince Edward to perjury, unmindful of his own salvation, and watching only for the disturbance and waste of the kingdom." The officials of Aymer and the other aliens, it was added, were robbers and oppressors—"neither could inferiors live under them, nor equals deal with them, nor superiors check them." Then followed a significant hint that the community would no longer tolerate their conduct, and "worse would ensue." Two years elapsed before the Papal reply was received, and then it was to the effect that the Pope refused to discuss Church matters with laymen. As to the decay of learning, said Alexander IV., England was distinguished for poetry, and there was no scarcity of learned men; indeed nowhere in the whole world was there such abundance of them.

THE KING'S FEAR OF DE MONTFORT.

The immediate results of the Statutes of Oxford were beneficial. The King trembled in the presence of the national spirit evoked, and especially dreaded the powerful and intelligent man who was then foremost in the kingdom. On one occasion he was forced by a storm to take refuge in De Montfort's house on the banks of the Thames; and abjectly said, "I do indeed dread thunder and lightning much, but, by the head of God, I tremble before you more than for all the thunder in heaven."

The King's brother, Richard, Earl of Cornwall, titular King of the Romans, was a far abler man than himself; and the barons looked forward with some anxiety to his return to England, for it was expected he would be accompanied by an armed force, and endeavour to bring back the exiled aliens. Soldiers were prepared, the castles on the Kentish and Sussex coasts were strongly manned; and the Prince, though at first refusing to pay any attention to the requirement that he should swear to observe the Statutes, at length found it prudent to do so, and land with a very small following; and in the chapter-house of Canterbury solemnly swore to be a faithful and active helper in reforming the Government, on pain of forfeiting all his lands.

The next step taken by De Montfort and his associates was the arrangements of a treaty with France, in which a formal resignation was made of Normandy and other French provinces, over which, in fact, England had for many years past ceased to exercise any real authority, and which only remained to her as a source of expense and an excuse for quarrels. In return, the French King restored some territories long estranged from the English crown. The Countess of Leicester, Simon's wife and the King's sister, in the presence of both kings, at Paris, solemnly resigned her personal claim to any lands in France.

For a time De Montfort was embarrassed by the rivalry, amounting at length to jealous opposition, of De Clare, who alone, of all the barons, could approach him in influence or ability; but public spirit prevailed, and private differences were subordinated to the general good. The King and Queen took up their residence in the Tower of London, and, with characteristic duplicity, while professing publicly perfect accord with the action of the governing nobles, sent privately to Aymer, inviting him to return. The death of the Bishop, however, deranged their plans. In 1261, came the bull of absolution, by which the King was released from his oath to accept the Statutes, except, however, so far as the breaking of the oath might affect the interests of "prelates, churches, and spiritual persons." The Queen, prelates, and some of the nobles were also released from the observance of their oaths.

THE KING DEFILES THE BARONS.

When the Pope's bull was publicly read at St. Paul's Cross, De Montfort was abroad. The King, taking courage perhaps from that circumstance, issued a proclamation accusing the barons of not having kept the conditions agreed upon as to his own treatment. The Queen had greatly exerted herself to gain over some of the barons, and the castles of Scarborough and Pickering were surrendered to the King, who appointed new governors. The barons proposed a conference, which was held at Kingston, and in July, 1263, it was agreed that the points in dispute should be submitted to the arbitration of the French King, Louis IX. (St. Louis). Fearing an adverse decision, Henry sent his crown jewels to the Queen of France, as a deposit for money; collected troops, and sent orders to the Cinque Ports to seize arms, horses, or ships, should De Montfort attempt to land in force.

Shortly afterwards the King issued a proclamation, wherein he announced that he would no longer consent to the restraints which had been imposed on him, but would depend on his own friends, some of whom he had recalled, and entrusted with the care of castles. He also wrote to the King of France, desiring him to give no credit to the representations of the Earl of Leicester. He then had the audacity to issue a formal pardon to the barons and others who had subscribed to the Oxford Statutes, thus stigmatizing that act as a crime. A new Pope, Urban IV., had been elected; and he was not only induced to renew the absolution granted by his predecessor, but to announce a solemn revocation of the Statutes. Louis endeavoured unsuccessfully to detach De Montfort from his allegiance to his principles; and the King went to Paris, where he remained some time, having been attacked by illness.

De Clare died in July, 1262, and the barons pressed De Montfort to return, and assume the undivided leadership of the party. He accepted the invitation, and it was well he did, for great events were at hand.

HOSTILITIES ON THE WELSH BORDER.

Towards the end of the year hostilities broke out on the Welsh border, Prince Llewellyn, a friend of the baronial party, attacking the land of Roger de Mortimer, who had seceded from the alliance. Prince Edward, afterwards Edward I., the "great Plantagenet," was then twenty-three years of age, and had already given promise of his unlikeness to his father, and of the possession of the great qualities he afterwards displayed. He suppressed the immediate outbreak; but the spirit of resistance spread rapidly through the western counties. The Bishop of Hereford was imprisoned, and his treasures taken; and the army levied by the barons increased so rapidly that the King was alarmed. In June, 1263, he commanded his energetic son to suspend hostilities; and a formal demand being made that he should observe the Oxford Statutes, he sent the Bishops of London, Worcester, Lincoln, and Coventry to attempt to negotiate with De Montfort and his friends. A truce was the result, and Dover Castle was surrendered by the King as a pledge. He wished to revisit France, but the barons insisted on some security for his return, and Henry, always willing to swear to anything, took an oath to come back in two months. He had a short interview with Louis, and soon after his return, made an effort to regain possession of Dover Castle. Foiled in this by the watchfulness and energy of the Constable, Richard de Grey, the King and Prince Edward made a rapid march to London, hoping to capture De Montfort, who was quartered in Southwark.

By the connivance of four citizens, the gates of the city on London Bridge were locked, and the keys thrown into the Thames; and De Montfort might have been cut off from any aid, but the Londoners, hearing of his danger, burst open the gates, and he entered the city in triumph. The King contrived to escape from his perilous position in the Tower, and join the Prince at Windsor, where he was surrounded by a foreign garrison; and he issued a proclamation in which he endeavoured to regain popular favour by declaring that he would observe the Oxford Statutes (the enactment of which he had in a previous proclamation denounced as a traitorous crime), and would not employ aliens. The Queen, while endeavouring to follow him to Windsor, was exposed to outrage and insult from the Londoners, and she returned to the Tower, whence she soon afterwards succeeded in escaping to France.

PROPOSALS FOR ARBITRATION.

The barons had agreed to submit the matters in dispute between them and the King to the arbitration of the King of France, and a great conference was appointed to take place at Amiens. De Montfort set out from Kenilworth to attend it; but was unfortunate enough to have his thigh-bone fractured by an accidental fall of his horse. On the 23rd of January, 1264, King Louis delivered his award, which was to the effect that the Oxford Statutes should be annulled, all castles should be given up to the King, who was to appoint his own ministers and household, aliens were to be recalled from banishment; and the King and barons were both adjured to be friends and "forget the past." The "royal privileges, charters, liberties, statutes, and laudable customs" which existed before the passing of the Oxford Statutes were to be repealed.

In less than a month after the delivery of the award, all was again in confusion. The barons, weakened by the loss of some of their adherents, had no faith in the King; and De Montfort declared, "Though all should leave me, yet with my four sons I will stand true to the just cause which I have sworn to uphold for the honour of the Church and the benefit of the kingdom. In many lands and provinces of divers nations, both Pagan and Christian, have I been, but in none have I found such faithlessness and deception as in England."

OUTBREAK OF THE BARONS' WAR.

Open war could no longer be avoided. The King collected his adherents at Oxford. Negotiations were talked about, but resulted in nothing. De Montfort assembled the barons at Northampton, which town was besieged by Prince Edward. In one of the sallies, young Simon de Montfort was captured. By the treachery of some of the inhabitants, the royal troops entered the town; a large number of prisoners were taken, and a terrible sack and carnage followed.

De Montfort himself was at St. Albans when he heard of the capture of Northampton. His warlike spirit was now thoroughly aroused, and a warlike spirit, in such a nature as his, soon develops into ferocity. The chronicler, Matthew of Westminster, says he raged like a lion deprived of her whelps. He hastened to Kent, and the citizens of London, excited by his presence, and probably encouraged by him, attacked the property of William de Valence and other aliens; and a terrible massacre of Jews (always, and often very innocently, the victims of popular outbreaks) followed. De Montfort besieged Rochester, held by the Earl de Warenne for the King, and the town was exposed to rapine and outrage. The castle could not have held out against the military engines of attack which De Montfort had provided, and which were then novelties in England; but the news of the approach of the royal army and the successes of Prince Edward at Leicester, Nottingham, and other places, induced De Montfort to change his plans, leaving a few soldiers to sustain the blockade. Prince Edward arrived in hot haste, and barbarously ordered the hands and feet of these men to be cut off.

The King hurried to the coast, and endeavoured to secure the assistance of the Cinque Ports, his object being to send a fleet up the Thames, and attack London, which was the stronghold of the popular cause. Failing in this, he collected his forces at Lewes. The citizens of London raised a body of armed men, probably numbering about twenty thousand, and otherwise assisted the great Earl, who, thus aided, marched into Sussex, and pitched his camp near the village of Fletching, then surrounded by a dense forest, about nine miles north of Lewes. The Bishops of London and Winchester were sent to the King with a letter professing loyalty to the King, but opposition to his evil counsellors—"those persons who are not only our enemies, but yours, and those of the whole kingdom." They were admitted into the refectory of the Priory of Cluniac monks, where the King was lodged, offered to make compensation for damages which the barons' troops might have committed, and, on the part of De Montfort, to submit to the decision of select churchmen as to what statutes should be kept in force, and how far their previous oaths should be binding. The fiery princes and royalist nobles rejected this proposition to submit to priests questions which they thought could be much better decided by the sword; and Prince Edward angrily exclaimed, "They shall have no peace whatever, unless they put halters round their necks and surrender themselves for us to hang them up or drag them down, as we please." The King gave a more formal answer, rejecting the propositions, and concluded, "We value not your faith or love, and defy you." Prince Richard added a special defiance of his own.

The scabbard was now fairly thrown away, and De Montfort prepared to accept the decision of the sword. He passed the night of the 13th of May, the day on which the bishops returned, in making arrangements, and in prayer and confession. The Bishop of Worcester gave absolution to the kneeling soldiers, who then affixed white crosses to their dresses, partly to show that they had religious sanction for their opposition to the King, and partly as a means of recognizing each other in the fray.

The King's troops indulged in revelry on the night preceding the battle, in which, for the first time for fifty years, Englishmen were to be opposed to Englishmen, without the assistance of foreign troops on either side. Before sunrise on the morning of the 14th of May, 1264, the army of the barons was in march along the ridge of the Downs, towards the town of Lewes. When within sight of the Priory, Simon and his leaders and soldiers prostrated themselves on the ground, imitating the form of a cross with their outstretched arms, and prayed to the Lord for victory.

THE BATTLE OF LEWES.

Having taken up his position, and arranged his forces, De Montfort had recourse to an artifice to deceive the enemy. It was known to the royalists that he had a short time previously broken his thigh, and the cart or litter which had been constructed for him was brought on to the field, and with its baggage conspicuously placed on a hill. When the battle began, Prince Edward, embittered against the Londoners by the insults they had offered to his mother, attacked them with great vigour, drove them back, and pursued them with great slaughter for four miles. Prince Richard, hoping to secure De Montfort, made a dash at the litter, almost simultaneously with an attack by some of Prince Edward's soldiers returning from the pursuit of the Londoners. In an iron cage beneath the litter were confined the four men who had locked the gates on London Bridge. In the fierce assault they perished. De Montfort, taking advantage of the confusion, directed the full strength of his army against that portion of the royal forces where the King was stationed. Henry at that time exhibited more manhood than at any other period of his life, fighting bravely, and receiving severe wounds. But the onset of the barons was too fierce, and the King was driven back to seek refuge in the Priory. Prince Richard, the King of the Romans, retreated to a windmill, but was forced to surrender, taken prisoner, and loaded with chains. When Prince Edward returned from the pursuit of the Londoners, his wearied soldiers were unable to turn the tide of fortune. He managed to reach the castle, the garrison of which had with great bravery defended themselves against the barons' forces. As night closed in, many of his adherents contrived to escape, among them the two half-brothers of the King.

The town was set on fire, the garrison preferring to perish in the flames rather than yield. In retaliation, the Priory was partially burned. Terrible acts of carnage and rapine were committed, and then De Montfort offered a truce.

The victory was with the barons; and on the following morning commissioners representing each side met, and arranged the terms of a treaty, known in history as the "Mise of Lewes," the chief points of which were a reference to two Frenchmen of high position, associated with one Englishman, and the surrender of Prince Edward and the eldest son of the King of the Romans as hostages for the fulfilment by the King of the conditions which might be imposed on him. Prisoners on both sides were to be released without ransom. The Princes surrendered themselves, Prince Edward being sent to Dover Castle. The King returned to London, virtually a captive, and Simon de Montfort was the most powerful man in England.

THE NEW CONSTITUTION.

On the 23rd of June a great Council was held in London, to which each county sent four knights, and which ratified the barons' proceedings, and made arrangements for carrying on the Government. The Council, or Parliament, named three high commissioners, who were invested with the power of choosing nine councillors, to be entrusted with the administration. If two-thirds of the councillors did not agree on any measure, the high commissioners were to decide. The King might dismiss the counsellors with the consent of the commissioners, and the commissioners also might be dismissed if the barons agreed to do so. Provision was made for the more effectual observance of the Great Charter and the Charter of the Forests. The three commissioners were Simon de Montfort, the Earl of Gloucester, and the Bishop of Chichester; and the arrangement of Church matters was entrusted to three bishops. The care of the counties was entrusted to wardens appointed by the influence of De Montfort, and arrangements were made for the protection of the towns from disorder. The agitations of the time had caused great distress among the poor; the season had been bad, and the withdrawal of so many men from agricultural labour had increased the trouble. A very short time elapsed, too, before De Montfort was called on to make preparation for renewed political troubles. The Queen, a woman of great ability and energy, collected a powerful force in Flanders, and was joined there by some of the English bishops and nobles attached to the royalist cause. De Montfort made a general levy to oppose the threatened invasion, from which no able-bodied men were excused. He encamped a considerable army on Barham Downs, near Canterbury, and collected forces in Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk. But contrary winds prevailed; it was impossible for the Queen's army to cross the sea, and after a long period of inaction, it was dispersed.

The Pope, too, interfered, and sent a legate to England to denounce the barons, and withdraw the clergy from their party. He excommunicated De Montfort and many others, besides adopting the extraordinary course of forbidding the export of wine, wheat, or any other merchandize to England. Four Italian bishops were sent with this bull; but the sailors of the Cinque Ports met the ships in the Channel, boarded them, and, seizing the document, threw it into the sea. The barons bore their excommunication lightly.

Endeavours were made by some of the more adventurous royalists to obtain the release of Prince Edward, and he was therefore removed from Wallingford to the stronger castle of Kenilworth, from which, however, he contrived by a clever stratagem to escape.

THE FIRST BRITISH HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A very remarkable event occurred about this time. A Parliament was ordered to meet in London on the 20th of January, 1265, and for the first time the cities and towns were each required to send "two discreet, loyal, and honest men;" and unquestionably this was the foundation of the House of Commons. To Simon de Montfort is due the origin of the British Parliament which now exists.

"De Montfort," says Sir James Macintosh in his "History of England," "was the instrument of disclosing to the world that great institution of representation which was to introduce into popular governments a regularity and order far more perfect than had heretofore been purchased by submission to absolute power, and to draw forth liberty from confinement in single cities to a fitness for being spread over territories, which experience does not forbid us to hope may be as vast as have ever been grasped by the iron hand of a despotic conqueror."

Success is seldom accompanied by moderation, especially in times when a warlike spirit prevails. De Montfort himself, patriotic as he was, was not so far in advance of the public morals of his time as to be indifferent to personal aggrandizement. He had acquired, as trustee, the control of the vast landed estates of the Prince Richard, King of the Romans; and Parliament sanctioned the transfer to him of large possessions in Cheshire, formerly belonging to the heir to the Crown. It must be stated, however, that he, on his part, surrendered estates in Leicestershire, and that the presence of so powerful a baron and able a soldier was desirable on the Welsh frontier. His sons, taking advantage, perhaps, of their father's invariable indulgence, secured possessions for themselves; and many of the barons and knights made large sums of money from the ransom of prisoners. As might have been expected, jealousies broke out, and the union of the barons was greatly weakened.

De Clare, son of the late rival of De Montfort, presuming on his position, met with a stern rebuke, and even threat, from the great leader; and, smarting from the indignity, opened up a treacherous communication with Roger de Mortimer in Wales. We cannot, within the space at our command, relate the full history of this agitating time. Prince Edward, after his escape, joined De Clare, overran Shropshire, and marched by way of Worcester to Gloucester, which he captured.

BATTLE OF EVESHAM AND DEATH OF DE MONTFORT.

Simon de Montfort was hastening to Kenilworth, where his son was in command, to make preparations for an attack on the Prince at Worcester. Edward, obtaining by means of a spy information of his movements, made a rapid march to Kenilworth, entered the town, and took many prisoners, horses, and rich baggage, the young Simon barely escaping into the castle. His father was in full march to Evesham, where he expected to meet him, and knew nothing of the disaster at Kenilworth. To Evesham Prince Edward hastened, with such celerity and swiftness that De Montfort was not aware of his movements till the morning of the 4th of August, when he found himself unexpectedly face to face with the enemy. The Prince had taken from Kenilworth banners and heraldic bearings, and displayed them conspicuously. De Montfort, deceived by the ruse, thought his son was approaching, according to arrangement, and too late he discovered his error. The fighting was furious. The great Earl had at last met, in the young Prince, a military leader of ability equal to his own. He saw that he was outnumbered and outmanœuvred, and that defeat was inevitable; and gave his friends permission to retreat if they wished to do so. His son Henry urged him to fly, and he himself would bear the brunt of the battle. The Earl made the heroic reply, "Far from me be the thought of such a course! I have grown old in wars, and my life hastens to an end; the blood of my fathers forbids me to fly from battle!" The Welsh auxiliaries deserted him; but he, with a small body of faithful nobles and adherents, fought with marvellous bravery. He charged the royalists with impetuosity, "fighting stoutly like a giant for the liberties of England." When surrounded, his friends fell around him, so eager were they to defend him. He was called upon to surrender, but proudly answered, "Never will I surrender to dogs and perjurers, but to God alone!" His horse was killed, he was sorely wounded, but he fought on, defending himself with his two-handed sword against the attack of twelve knights. The enemy pressed on, and at length a blow dealt from behind struck him down a dead man.

In this great battle of Evesham, fought on the 4th of August, 1265, a hundred and twenty knights and four thousand men of lower degree were slain.

HORRIBLE BARBARITIES.

Henry de Montfort, a young man of a singularly affectionate, virtuous, and heroic character, was taken prisoner and cruelly massacred; and the bodies of many brave knights were horribly mutilated by the victors. The body of the great Simon was "mangled piecemeal; the head and hands were carried on the points of spears and sent as a present to the wife of Roger de Mortimer; and other parts of the body were carried about and exhibited in various towns. A few fragments were collected by the good monks of Evesham, and reverently interred in the abbey. It was believed that miracles were wrought on those who visited the tomb; that the sick were healed, and cripples restored to activity, when they prayed at the spot where the few mortal remains of the great baron lay.

The writer of the "Brute Chronicle" (preserved in the Harleian MSS.) says: "When King Henry had the victory at Evesham, and Simon the Earl was slain, that was great harm to the Commons of England that so good a man was destroyed, for he was dead for the common profit of the same folk, and therefore God had shewed for him many great miracles to diverse folks of their maladies and grievances, whereof they have been healed." Long after his death the great baron was spoken of as "Sir Simon the Righteous."

Five years afterwards his sons Simon and Guy gratified their desire for revenge by murdering their cousin Henry, the son of Prince Richard, as he knelt at the altar at Viterbo, in Italy. The ferocious act is alluded to by Dante.

There was a popular and pretty but wholly unfounded tradition that Henry de Montfort was not really slain at Evesham, but was only left for dead, and that a noble maiden, visiting the field after the battle to give help to the wounded, had him borne away. They married; but, it being necessary to keep Henry's survival secret, he adopted the disguise of a blind beggar at Bethnal Green, near London, and gave his daughter, the "pretty Bessie" of the renowned ballad, a splendid dowry.

WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE.

"There can be no doubt that Mr. Gladstone, by his great eloquence, by his power of developing the most abstruse propositions, and embracing at once in his large capacity the most logical demonstrations, with the most captivating and dazzling rhetoric, has made for himself a fame which in the lapse of centuries will suffer no eclipse."

THE GLADSTONE FAMILY.

THE Liverpool election of 1812 was marked by scenes of excitement and riot, notable even in those days of violent party strife.

George Canning, the most brilliant politician of the time, had been invited to contest the borough, and after a hard-fought struggle,—in the most literal sense of the word, for two men had been killed in the street rows,—was returned at the top of the poll, having for his colleague General Gascoyne, a Tory of the old school. The defeated candidates were Henry Brougham and Mr. Creevy, a Radical of advanced opinions. The successful candidates were chaired through the principal streets of the town, ending the disorderly and rather perilous journey (for the defeated party were irritated, and probably not very choice in the selection of compliments, or even of missiles) in front of a large house in Rodney Street, the residence of Mr. John Gladstone, a leading merchant of the town, and chairman of Canning's committee.

A few minutes after entering the house, the tall handsome figure of Canning appeared at one of the windows, and he proceeded to address the immense crowd which filled the broad street. There was a tumult of applause when he showed himself; and at first his words were scarcely audible, so loud was the cheering which greeted him. The windows of the adjacent houses were, we may be sure, filled with spectators of the scene; and in Mr. Gladstone's residence, thronged with committee men and political friends, the excitement was no doubt considerable. It was a large house, well fitted for the residence of a man of opulence and good social position, whose old branches were growing up around him; and in the nursery, or perhaps by his mother's side as she received her famous guest, was a little boy, three years old, William Ewart, the fourth and youngest son,—who speaking in 1879, in reply to an address by a Liverpool deputation congratulating him on having completed his seventieth year, said, "I remember the first election of Mr. Canning, in Liverpool."

The family were descendants of the Gledstones of Clydesdale, who, says tradition, took the name from the Lowland Scotch words gled, a hawk, and stanc, rock—indicating the character of the wild, barren district in which they dwelt. The name appears in the thirteenth century, and we find at a later date, that one of the family was united by marriage with the famous house of "the bold Buccleuch" in the sixteenth century.

Mr. John Gladstone married in 1792, but his wife died six years afterwards, and the union was childless. In 1806 he contracted a second marriage, with Anne Robertson, daughter of Mr. Andrew Robertson, of Stornaway, Provost of Dingwall. She was a handsome, accomplished woman, possessed of considerable talents and womanly qualities that would, wrote one who knew her well, "grace any home and endear any heart." The genealogy of the lady has been traced back to Joan Beaufort, the granddaughter of John of Gaunt, and by both father's and mother's lines of descent, a daughter of the royal house of England. She married first James the First of Scotland, and, after he was murdered at Perth, Sir James Stewart, the Black Knight of Lorne, a descendant of the Bruces. Collateral branches of the family produced Principal Robertson, the famous historian, and the mother of Lord Brougham.

The blood of the Plantagenets and the Bruces, then, ran in the veins of the admirable lady who became the second wife of John Gladstone, the Liverpool merchant, and the mother of the great statesman, who needs no ancestral honours to make him memorable.

The little boy who listened to the shoutings and turmoil in Rodney Street when George Canning addressed the crowd at that famous election time, was born on the 29th of December, 1809. He had three brothers older than himself; the eldest, Thomas, succeeded to the honour of the baronetcy; the second, a captain in the Royal Navy, died in 1863; the third, who bore the name of his mother's family, Robertson, became the head of the great mercantile house, was at one time Mayor of Liverpool, and died in 1875. The fourth son, destined to be by far the most memorable of the family, received the names of William Ewart, the second name being that of his godfather, a Liverpool merchant and close friend of the Gladstone family.

SCHOOL DAYS.

The four Gladstone boys received their first regular education at a small school near Liverpool, kept by the Rev. W. Jones, who afterwards became the first incumbent of the church built by Mr. John Gladstone. If we are to believe a legend of these schooldays—and we do not perceive the slightest necessity for believing it—little William Ewart incurred the displeasure of his tutor by exhibiting a remarkable dislike of arithmetic, and a lamentable incapacity to understand the elementary rules. It is a favourite theory of some persons that men who have greatly distinguished themselves in later life were uncommonly dull boys, and this may account for the origin of the story.

Whether clever or not in arithmetic—and perhaps he understood the principles of the matter better than his teacher supposed—young Gladstone no doubt made fair progress in Mr. Jones's school. When nearly twelve years old, he was transferred to Eton; and few boys, we may imagine, better fitted for a public school career have entered that famous school. He was exceptionally strong and active, well-grounded in the rudiments of the classics, eagerly desirous of learning, and ambitious to distinguish himself. He took with great avidity to Latin versification, and therefore was in high favour with the tutors. Among his schoolfellows were George Augustus Selwyn, afterwards missionary bishop and Bishop of Lichfield; Francis Hastings Doyle, who came to be Professor of Poetry at Oxford; and Arthur Henry Hallam (son of the historian, and the loved friend of Alfred Tennyson), whose epitaph is the longest and noblest in the English language—the great pathetic poem, “In Memoriam.”

In due time William Gladstone became inspired by the literary traditions of Eton. George Canning had been an Eton boy, and contributed to a school magazine; so had John Hookham Frere and Winthrop Praed. They and others had written for the Etonian, published at Windsor by Charles Knight; and Gladstone and some of his school friends, fired by a noble ambition, projected The Eton Miscellany, to which he and Selwyn were the most prolific contributors. A poem in heroic couplets celebrating the achievements of Richard Cœur de Lion, essays on Homer and other classic authors, and a paper on a very congenial subject, “Eloquence,” were among the many articles contributed by Gladstone. The last-named is worth notice, because in it the young author sketched the honourable career of a talented and ambitious youth, gifted with the wondrous power of eloquence. “A successful débüt,” he wrote, “an offer from the minister, a Secretaryship of State, and even the Premiership itself, are the objects which form the vista along which a young visionary loves to look.” At the time when these words were written, a young man, beginning to be recognised as a clever contributor to the London press, was engaged in writing a novel, “Vivian Grey,” in which he sketched the career of a youth who, by his own talents, made his way to high political honours. William Gladstone, the Eton boy, and Benjamin Disraeli, the young and almost unknown novelist, each realized his day-dream and became Premier of England. It is not only in France that the bâton of the marshal is in the knapsack of the private soldier.

STUDIES AND HONOUR AT OXFORD.

Gladstone left Eton in 1827 and for about two years studied as a private pupil of Dr.

Turner, afterwards Bishop of Calcutta. Then, at the age of twenty, he entered as a student at Christ Church, Oxford, and very soon attained the reputation of being one of the most hardworking undergraduates. Even in vacation time he read hard, “locked up with his books,” it was said, for several hours every day. He was methodical in his studies, and as methodical in his life. He believed in the alliance of a sound mind with a sound body; and, being naturally hardy and muscular, took pleasure in active exercise, especially pedestrian. The enervating follies in which so many undergraduates are tempted to indulge offered no temptations to the thoughtful young man, deeply imbued with religious principles, and keenly sensitive to the feeling of moral responsibility. When, in 1853, he for the second time offered himself as a candidate for the representation of the University in Parliament, Dr. R. Phillimore, who supported his nomination, said, “he well remembered the time when his right honourable friend, avoiding the vices incident to youth, yet retaining unimpaired all the gentleness, sweetness, and forbearance of his disposition, was the ornament and pride of the undergraduates of that University.”

In the famous University Debating Society, the Union, he soon made his mark. The undergraduates were ardent politicians, and ranged themselves under party banners with great zeal. Gladstone was a Tory and High Churchman; he opposed with all the rhetorical power at his command—and that was considerable—Parliamentary Reform, the removal of Jewish disabilities, and other advanced propositions. In after life he admitted, “I did not learn at Oxford that which I have learned since—namely, to set a due value on the imperishable and inestimable principles of human liberty.”

His unceasing industry and great abilities were rewarded, at the Michaelmas Examination of 1831, by “a double first,” the greatest honour a student can achieve, and very rarely reached. A fellowship of All Souls’ College was held for a short time, and then Mr. Gladstone left the University, and having well earned a holiday, he visited Italy and other parts of the continent.

ENTERS PARLIAMENT.

In June 1832 the Reform Act was passed. A general election followed, and most strenuous exertions were made by the Tory aristocracy and the landed interest to stem “the wave of democracy,” which, to some excited imaginations, appeared to threaten the old social landmarks.

They closed their ranks to defend what they believed to be sacred constitutional principles, and they looked out for recruits of ability. The "double first" of Oxford, who had given promise of the possession of remarkable debating powers, who was known to be enthusiastically attached to the principles of the Tory party, would be regarded by its members as a valuable addition to their strength. The Earl of Lincoln, son of the Duke of Newcastle, had been a student at Oxford with Gladstone, and one of his most intimate friends; and it was perhaps at his suggestion that the Duke invited the talented son of the able and wealthy Liverpool merchant to offer himself as a candidate for Newark, a borough which had been long accustomed to return anybody who was recommended by the Duke of Newcastle to the free and independent electors. The Reform Act had emboldened politicians to speak irreverently of pocket-boroughs, and to question the right even of Dukes of Newcastle to "do as they liked with their own." Even some of the Tories themselves took the opportunity to challenge vested interests in political matters, and when, on the 9th October, 1832, Mr. Gladstone issued his address to the electors of Newark, he had two antagonists on the field, Mr. Handley, a Tory, and Serjeant Wilde. The latter, subsequently, as Lord Truro, was Lord Chancellor in the Russell Administration of 1851-2.

In his address, Mr. Gladstone deprecated an "uninquiring and indiscriminating desire for change;" professed his adherence to the union of Church and State, in accordance with the principle that "the duties of governors are strictly and peculiarly religious, and that legislators, like individuals, are bound to carry throughout their acts the spirit of the high truths they have acknowledged;" and, regarding the administration of Poor Laws, enunciated the generous if not precisely scientifically economical opinion, that "those who are the least able to take care of themselves should be most regarded by others." One of the most prominent of the public questions of the time was that of the Abolition of Slavery, and every candidate was expected to refer to it. Mr. Gladstone, the son of a Liverpool merchant, a large portion of whose wealth was the product of slave labour, was by no means convinced that slavery was not sanctioned by Scripture; and if it were so sanctioned, he needed no other evidence to justify its existence. He knew that on the plantations belonging to his father and other merchants, the negroes were well cared for, and he suspected that very great exaggerations had been indulged in respecting the alleged cruelties to slaves. Immediate emancipation, he thought, might be productive of great evils; but it might be, that in course of time, "an universal and efficient system of Christian instruction might justify abolition of slavery." Nicknames are always plentiful at election times, and Mr. Gladstone's opponents took care that the epithet "slave-driver" should be associated with his name. The Duke's influence, however, was not to be resisted, and Gladstone's name headed the poll, with 832 votes, giving a majority of 99 over Handley, and of 163 over Serjeant Wilde.

He addressed the House for the first time on the 21st February, little more than a fortnight after the opening of the session, when he briefly denied that, at the recent Liverpool election, Lord Sandon or his supporters had exerted any corrupt influence. Unfortunately Liverpool was rather notorious for corrupt practices at both Parliamentary and municipal elections; and Mr. Warburton, member for Bridport, slightly sneered at the young member's defence of his native town—how it could be "possible for any individual to guarantee so much." Later in the session, Mr. Mark Phillips, member for Manchester, moved for a select committee to consider the conduct of the Liverpool freemen. Mr. Gladstone once more defended them. He again spoke in defence of the manager of his father's plantation in Demerara, who had been referred to in the debate following the introduction of the Ministerial Bill for the abolition of slavery, as having produced a great quantity of sugar, "but, unhappily, at the price of a dreadful loss of life amongst the slaves." A second speech on the same subject established his reputation as an effective Parliamentary speaker. In another speech, in the same session, he defended the Irish Church: "If it had abuses, which he did not deny, those abuses were to be ascribed to the ancestors and predecessors of those who now surrounded him."

In the next session, Mr. Gladstone again defended, but not very effectively, the freemen of Liverpool, whom not even his advocacy could whitewash. He supported a Bill for the better observance of the Lord's Day, and made a long and vigorous speech against Mr. Hume's proposition to admit Dissenters into the Universities. He spoke with great earnestness and remarkable rhetorical power, insisting on the religious character of the Universities; and it seems to have been this speech which caused Southey to say, "Young Gladstone is the ablest person Oxford has sent forth since Peel or Canning." This speech greatly advanced his rising reputation, and marked him out for official employment.

OFFICIAL LIFE.

The Melbourne Administration resigned in November 1834. Sir Robert Peel accepted the task of forming a ministry; and Mr. Gladstone was included in the new arrangements, as Under-Secretary for the Colonies. He was re-elected without difficulty for Newark; but his tenure of office was of brief duration. Sir Robert, being beaten on the question of the commutation of tithes in Ireland, resigned, and Lord Melbourne returned to the Treasury. In the course of the remainder of the session, Mr. Gladstone made one notable speech in defence of the House of Peers, against the attack of two such formidable assailants as Daniel O'Connell and Mr. Hume, whom he charged with advancing atrocious and dangerous doctrines. O'Connell was never scrupulously polite, and perhaps flattered himself that he had almost annihilated the young representative of Newark by expressing "much contempt for the honourable member's argument."

In the session of 1836, he defended the West Indian planters, who were charged by Mr. Fowell Buxton with having acted with great severity in carrying out the apprenticeship system. On the contrary, maintained Mr. Gladstone, the planters had treated the negroes with kindness, and the Anti-Slavery Society had published garbled statements. At a later period of the session, he supported Ministers in their method of dealing with the disturbances in Canada.

In 1837, Mr. Spring Rice, Chancellor of the Exchequer, moved a resolution in favour of the abolition of Church rates. This called up Mr. Gladstone, who eloquently opposed the proposition as an attack on the security of religion. He spoke with contempt of the scruples of conscience pleaded by some persons who refused to pay the rates, and he announced a remarkably "hard and fast" doctrine: "When the Legislature made a demand on its subjects for a part of their property, whatever might be the purpose for which it was applied, the Legislature absolved the conscience of its subjects."

Parliament was dissolved, consequent on the death of William the Fourth; and in the general election which followed, Mr. Gladstone was, without his consent being asked, nominated for Manchester, but was in a minority at the polling. When the House met in November, he again took his seat as member for Newark.

The Canadian difficulty had ripened into insurrection; and Mr. Gladstone, stigmatizing the outbreak as the work of political agitators, blamed the Government for want of energy in suppressing it.

THE BOOK ON CHURCH AND STATE.

In the autumn of 1838, Mr. Gladstone published a work which at once claimed a large share of public attention, "The State in its Relation with the Church," dedicated to the University of Oxford, as the "fountain of blessings, spiritual, social, and intellectual." In the book he elaborated and expanded the arguments he had more than once employed in Parliament when speaking on subjects connected with the Church. He maintained that the propagation of religion was a fundamental duty of Government; that, equally with individuals, it was bound to consider religious principles; that it was, in fact, an aggregation of individual men, each of whom should sanctify his acts by offices of religion; and that a statesman should be a worshipping man. The book was the talk of the season, and gave occasion to elaborate reviews in the great organs of literary and political criticism. The Tories hailed the author as a champion of the first rank; all parties acknowledged his ability, and gave him full credit for his sincerity, and an elevated disregard of all arguments of mere expediency. He was desperately in earnest, and that fact was freely acknowledged. The Quarterly was delighted with "the singular vigour, depth of thought and eloquence" he displayed; and in the famous Edinburgh review, by Macaulay, the highest compliments were paid to the great talents and high character of the author, while his arguments were mercilessly dissected; and there was even a little indulgence of that spirit of banter and burlesque, indulgence in which made the brilliant Macaulay so happy, and occasionally the subject of it very unhappy.

A pleasant and characteristic correspondence ensued. Mr. Gladstone wrote to Mr. Macaulay, thanking him for the complimentary terms in which he had spoken of him personally, but intimating that he was not so limited in his political and religious views as the reviewer supposed him to be. Macaulay replied that he had not intended to be severe, certainly not unjust in his criticism, although he added, "I was half afraid, when I read myself over again in print, that the button, as is too common in controversial fencing even between friends, had once or twice come off the foil."

VISIT TO SICILY, AND MARRIAGE.

The autumnal vacation was passed in a continental trip, in the course of which a visit was made to Sicily. On the 30th and 31st October, Etna, then in a state of volcanic disturbance, was ascended. Portions of Mr. Gladstone's diary, describing this ascent, are published in Murray's "Handbook," and may be read with interest. The writer is delighted to find how accurately Virgil describes the scenery and natural phenomena, and quotes from the "Georgics" of the Roman poet passages which show how little the practice of agriculture in the island has varied from that followed by the tillers of the land in Virgil's time. Theremains of the beautiful temples, which are so numerous in Sicily, greatly interested him; and he described them with the enthusiasm of an imagination inspired by classical associations. He says,—and the remark is characteristic of Mr. Gladstone's mind, made morally sensitive as well as strengthened by large scholarship,—“The temples enshrine a most pure and salutary principle of art, that which connects grandeur of effect with simplicity of detail; and, retaining their beauty and their dignity in their decay, they represent the great man when fallen, a type of that almost highest of human qualities,—silent yet not sullen endurance.”

On the 25th July, 1839, Mr. Gladstone married Miss Catherine Glynne, eldest daughter of Sir Stephen Richard Glynne, of Hawarden Castle, Flintshire, whose ancestry can be traced for more than a thousand years to the great chief of the Fourth Tribe of North Wales, Cilmin-Troed-Ddu, of Glyn Llhyon, in Carnarvon. Sir Stephen Glynne, brother of Mrs. Gladstone, died unmarried in 1874, and Mr. Gladstone came in possession of the Hawarden estate for life, with remainder to his eldest son. Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone have had four sons and four daughters. One of the latter died in infancy; the others survive. At the general election of 1880, the eldest son, Mr. William Henry Gladstone, was returned to the House of Commons for East Worcestershire (having previously represented Whitby), and the fourth son, Mr. Herbert John Gladstone, unsuccessfully contested Middlesex, but was returned for Leeds.

DEBATE ON THE CHINESE WAR.

The most notable event of the early part of the session of 1840 was the debate on the war with China, generally described as the “Opium War.” The Emperor of China had prohibited the trade in the intoxicating drug; and the Chinese Commissioner, Lin, an energetic administrator, promptly attempted to seize the stores of it which British merchants at Canton had accumulated in their warehouses; and by surrounding them, virtually made prisoners of the occupants. Captain Elliot, the British naval commander on the station, rescued the merchants and their families, but not without some sharp skirmishes with Chinese junks. The opium was left behind, and destroyed by Lin's soldiers, and the Emperor of China issued an edict interdicting all trade and intercourse with England for ever. At that time Lord Palmerston was our Foreign Secretary, and he was the man of all others little likely to submit to what, rightly or wrongly, might be considered a national insult. He was vigorously attacked in the House of Commons for not having foreseen that the conduct of the English merchants would inevitably lead to a quarrel with the Chinese authority; “and,” said Mr. Gladstone, “be the trade in opium what it may, be it right or be it wrong, we are now called on to give an assent to a war caused by the indolence and apathy of the noble lord.” A resolution proposed by Sir James Graham, blaming the Ministry for the hostilities which had taken place, was defeated by the narrow majority of nine. In the course of the debate, Macaulay indulged in a little of the graceful, if glittering and dramatic, rhetoric which he could, on occasion, employ so effectively. He described the British merchants of Canton looking “with confidence or the victorious flag which was hoisted over them, which reminded them that they belonged to a country unaccustomed to defeat, to submission, or to shame; it reminded them that they belonged to a country which had made the farthest ends of the earth ring with the fame of her exploits in redressing the wrongs of her children.” Mr. Gladstone's sincere nature is averse to accepting picturesque description as a substitute for earnest reasoning; and he replied warmly,—not the less so, perhaps, because it was for the first time he had directly encountered in debate the brilliant Whig orator and essayist,—“Under the auspices of the noble lord, that flag is now hoisted to protect an infamous, contraband traffic: and if it were never to be hoisted except as it is now hoisted on the coast of China, we should recoil from the sight with horror, and should never again feel our hearts thrill, as they now thrill, with emotion, when it floats proudly and magnificently on the breeze.”

It had been asserted, and was believed at the time, that the Chinese had poisoned the wells which supplied the British factories with water. In the course of his speech, Mr. Gladstone used the unfortunate phrase, "Of course they poisoned the wells." This was made use of by speakers at the opposite side; and, notwithstanding his earnest denial, Mr. Gladstone was charged with having approved the action of the Chinese. Lord Palmerston, always adroit, and not always very scrupulous on seizing an advantage, affected to feel "deep regret and sincere pain" that the honourable member had used words justifying so atrocious an act. Of course nobody seriously supposed that Mr. Gladstone meant what was imputed to him; but some debaters appear to think that all is fair in political discussion, as, according to the old proverb, it is in "love and war."

In the course of that and the following session, he voted against a resolution introduced by Mr. Villiers, for a committee of the whole House to consider the Corn Laws, and against the reduction of the duty on foreign sugar, arguing, in the latter case, that the British colonies, where slavery had been abolished, would be unable to compete with foreign growers who employed slave labour. A Bill for admitting Jews to municipal offices was strongly opposed by him, because, he argued, it would "destroy the distinctive Christianity of the constitution."

AGAIN IN OFFICE—PEEL'S SECOND ADMINISTRATION.

The Melbourne Ministry was becoming weaker and weaker. Its majority had dwindled; the Irish party, led by O'Connell, had aided the Opposition to defeat the Irish Registration of Voters Bill; and about a week before the time appointed for the debate, on a motion by Lord John Russell, the ministerial leader of the House of Commons, for a committee of the whole House to consider the Acts of Parliament relating to the trade in corn, Sir Robert Peel brought matters to a crisis by moving a resolution of want of confidence. The debate lasted five nights, the result being that the resolution was carried by a majority of one vote. Lord Melbourne and his colleagues declined to accept that as a defeat necessitating resignation, and appealed to the country. Parliament was prorogued on the 22nd June and when the new Parliament met on the 4th August, there was such a decided majority against ministers, that resignation was inevitable. Sir Robert Peel succeeded to the Premiership, and conferred the offices of Vice-President of the Board of Trade and Master of the Mint on Mr.

Gladstone, who, however, was not included in the Cabinet.

Sir Robert Peel could not avoid the Corn Law question, even if he had been inclined to do so. It was the paramount subject in the minds of politicians, and the public beyond the walls of Parliament were greatly excited. The new Ministry were not prepared for unconditional repeal, but Sir Robert proposed his famous "sliding scale," which varied the duty in accordance with the average price of wheat, the scale decreasing by shillings as the price rose by shillings. The "landed interest," the farmers' friends, as they styled themselves, denounced the measure; the Whigs insisted on a moderate fixed duty, and the Anti-Corn Law party would have nothing short of entire repeal of the duty. Lord John Russell moved an amendment condemnatory of the Ministerial proposals, and was answered by Mr. Gladstone, who loyally supported his chief. A majority of 202 sanctioned the adoption of Sir Robert Peel's plan. At this period, Mr. Gladstone took railway matters in hand, and carried a Bill which gave the Board of Trade greater powers of regulation in the public interest, third-class passengers especially having reason to thank him for reduced fares and greater accommodation.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

Sir Robert Peel was now maturing his great scheme for the revision of the tariff, by removing or lessening the duties on a vast number of articles of daily necessity. The details of the plan he entrusted to Mr. Gladstone, whose remarkable financial ability and acquaintance with commercial matters he had recognized. The Vice-President of the Board of Trade, against great opposition, carried the proposition through the House, fighting a battle over almost every item; the result being that £12,000,000 of indirect taxation was taken off, the deficiency being made up by the imposition of an income-tax of sevenpence in the pound. The preference of direct for indirect taxation was a cardinal principle in the financial policy of Sir Robert Peel, although he hesitated to carry it out to its full extent; and, as yet, his most efficient supporter, Mr. Gladstone, was unwilling to advance beyond a certain point. They conceded the ingeniously contrived sliding scale, but could not see their way to entire free trade in corn.

The people, especially those belonging to the poorer working classes, benefited by the cheapening of many articles of daily use; but trade was dull, employers were discharging hands, and in the manufacturing districts there was great distress. On the middle classes, the new income-tax pressed heavily; and when, in 1843, Lord Howick moved for a committee of the whole House to take into consideration the depressed condition of the manufacturing districts, and urged Sir Robert Peel to advance in the Free Trade course on which he had entered, he was warmly supported by a large section of the public, who were rapidly adopting Free Trade ideas. Lord Howick denounced "the absurd and vicious system of restriction, based on an exploded theory," and the practical fruits of which were "a destitute and suffering people, an empty exchequer, increasing taxation, and a falling revenue."

In opposing Lord Howick's motion, Mr. Gladstone defended the income-tax, which he said had one great and signal merit, that it does reach what no other tax can be guaranteed to reach,—that enormous accumulation of wealth which is constantly mounting up in this country. The Corn Laws, he argued, rested on a peculiar basis; the benefits of the repeal would be "altogether remote and indefinite, while it would be attended with the most important and even serious disasters, not less to the trading than to our agricultural interests, and the general industry of the country."

The Ministers were again successful, after a five nights' debate, by a majority of 115. Mr. Cobden, already recognised as one of the leading spirits of the House, made an effective answer to Mr. Gladstone's speech.

DEBATES ON FREE TRADE.

The Free Trade battle continued to be fought throughout the session; and Mr. Gladstone spoke from a higher official standpoint. The Earl of Ripon, President of the Board of Trade, died, and the Vice-President received the promotion he had so well earned by acceding to the office and becoming a member of the Cabinet. When Mr. Charles Villiers brought forward his annual resolution for the repeal of the Corn Laws, Mr. Gladstone defended Peel's sliding scale, and declared, that if Ministers were to support the proposition, they would be guilty of a great injustice to a large portion of the community, and would declare themselves "unworthy and incompetent to conduct the affairs of a great nation." Mr. Villiers was defeated by a very large majority; and a motion by Lord John Russell, in favour of a moderate fixed duty, was also lost.

Beaten but not discouraged, the Free Traders renewed the assault in the session of 1844, when

Mr. Cobden, the stoutest champion of the cause, moved for a select committee to inquire into the effect of the protective duties on imports on the interests of the tenant farmers and farm labourers of the country. In his speech, Mr. Gladstone referred very slightly to the Anti-Corn Law League, then in full activity. "The most important feature of the meetings," he said, "was probably the parade and ceremonial with which they were attended."

RETIREMENT FROM OFFICE.

The following session (1845) was marked by Mr. Gladstone's retirement from office. Sir Robert Peel contemplated offering State support to the Roman Catholic academics of Ireland, and Mr. Gladstone declined to share the responsibility of the measure. He had, he explained, supported earnestly, in the book he had published, the claim of the State Church to supremacy; and he held a strong conviction, "under ordinary circumstances, and as a general rule, that those who have thus borne the most solemn testimony to a particular view of a great constitutional question, ought not to be parties responsible for proposals which involve a violent departure from them." He had resigned office in order that he might be in a position to form not only an honest but an independent and unsuspected judgment. Many politicians would suppose that he exhibited an undue sensitiveness, especially as he afterwards voted for the Bill introduced by Sir Robert Peel. But he did so as an independent member, and shrank from any suggestion that possession of office had influenced him. His vote gave considerable offence to the Duke of Newcastle, who "managed" the Newark voters.

In the autumn of the year, the outbreak of the potato disease in Ireland, and the consequent famine, painfully solved the Free Trade problem. Sir Robert Peel announced that he could no longer oppose the repeal of the Corn Laws, and was prepared to resign office. Lord John Russell, leader of the Whig Opposition in the House of Commons, was sent for by the Queen, but was unable to form an Administration; and Sir Robert Peel remained in office, supported by all the members of his Cabinet, Lord Stanley, Colonial Secretary, only excepted. The decision of the Premier respecting the Corn Laws had offended the Tory party, and henceforth his followers were known as Peelites, and formed a very influential fourth party in the House. The leader was unquestionably the foremost statesman of the time; and among his friends and supporters were men of distinguished ability.

including Sir James Graham, the Earl of Lincoln, Mr. Cardwell, and Mr. Sidney Herbert. Mr. Gladstone, in eloquence and varied ability the most eminent of the new party, Sir Robert excepted, entered the Cabinet as successor to Lord Stanley at the Colonial Office.

Sir Robert Peel's plan allowed three years to elapse before the abolition of the Corn Laws, but in the meanwhile the duty was greatly reduced. After a debate lasting twelve nights, the proposals were carried by a considerable majority; but Mr. Gladstone, having been compelled by the acceptance of office to seek re-election, was absent from the House. It was hopeless to contest Newark against the new nominee of the Duke of Newcastle; and before he could appeal to another constituency, the Peel Ministry had resigned, in consequence of a defeat on the second reading of the Protection of Life (Ireland) Bill.

REPRESENTS THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.

At the general election of 1847, Mr. Gladstone offered himself as a candidate for the representation of the University of Oxford, which was justly proud of the abilities he had displayed. There was, however, some suspicion that he was not quite so "sound" as he should be in supporting the exclusive right of Churchmen, and the facts that he had given a vote in favour of the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, and supported the grant of public money to Maynooth College, were sufficient to induce some of the constituency to bring forward another candidate, who, however, appeared at the bottom of the poll.

Mr. Gladstone was now in a position which he might well regard with satisfaction and pride,—one of the representatives in Parliament of the great University where he had studied so hard and achieved so grand a success. Very soon, however, he showed that he had no intention to surrender his independence and subordinate his opinions to those of his constituents. He gave a vigorous support to the motion of Lord John Russell, the new Premier, for the abolition of the civil and political disabilities of the Jews. Only six years before he had opposed Mr. Divett's motion to permit Jews to hold municipal office; the first step, he said, to admitting them to Parliament, and so unchristianizing the country. He had made a political advance indeed, and now argued that the performance of an act of political justice "can involve no disparagement to the religion we profess, can never lower Christianity in public estimation, but must, on the contrary, tend to elevate the conception of Christianity in all considerate minds." He knew, he said, that the constituency which had returned him to Parliament was opposed to the Bill; but, he added,—and we can imagine the consternation of some of the old-fashioned Tories of Oxford when they read the words,—a member should follow the conscientious dictates of his own judgment, whether they happened to coincide in that particular case with the judgment of the constituency or not. Most likely Mr. Newdegate was quite correct in saying, in the course of the debate, "Had it been known that the right honourable gentleman entertained such sentiments as he had expressed on the subject of the Jews, when he offered himself as a candidate for the representation of Oxford University, he never would have been returned for that eminent seat of learning."

Another instance of modification of extreme views was afforded by the support he gave, in the session of 1848, to the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, the object of which was the removal of certain disabilities imposed by existing Acts of Parliament. His acceptance of more advanced doctrines of Free Trade did not induce him to consent to a removal of the differential sugar duties, which he maintained were necessary to protect the British planter in the competition with slave labour in foreign countries.

A memorable speech was delivered in the course of the debate on the conduct of Lord Palmerston, the Foreign Secretary, in connection with the "Pacifico affair" of 1850. The Greek Government had been compelled to yield to claims made by a naturalized British subject, known as Don Pacifico. The argument employed by Lord Palmerston was the blockade of the harbour of the Piræus by Admiral Parker's squadron. A direct vote of censure was passed by the House of Lords; and the opinion of the Commons was challenged by Mr. Roebuck, who moved a resolution approving the action of the Foreign Secretary. Mr. Gladstone attacked Lord Palmerston with immense energy, charging him with an "insular temper," a "self-glorifying tendency, and an inevitable passion for quarrelling with other countries." In this, as in so many other speeches, the intense conscientiousness of Mr. Gladstone's nature was apparent. "Is it right?" was the question he constantly asked; not "Is it expedient?" "England," he said, loftily, "will stand shorn of a chief part of her glory and her pride if she shall be found to have separated herself, through the policy she pursues abroad, from the moral supports which the general and fixed convictions of mankind afford; if the day shall come in which she may continue to excite the wonder and the fear of other nations, but in which she shall have no part in their affection and their regard."

Mr. Roebuck's resolution was carried by a good majority. The debate was made additionally remarkable from the fact that in the course of it Sir Robert Peel made his last speech. On the following day he was thrown from his horse, and so injured that he died three days afterwards. In seconding the proposition for the adjournment of the House, Mr. Gladstone made a brief but touching allusion to the high qualities of his late friend and leader.

EXPOSURE OF NEAPOLITAN HORRORS.

In 1851, Mr. Gladstone distinguished himself by unveiling the horrors of the dungeons of Naples, to which the king, Ferdinand II., better known as "Bomba," had consigned many eminent men who, by their political opinions and liberal tendencies, had made themselves objectionable. Carlo Poerio, who had held high office in the Ministry, a scholar and a statesman of great talent and high character, Settembrini, a distinguished advocate, and others, were immured in underground prisons, so filthily that the jailers themselves scarcely dared to enter them, loaded with heavy chains, subjected to physical tortures, and supplied only with loathsome food. They had been convicted on trumped-up charges, supported by perjured witnesses and the production of forged papers. Seventy-six Parliamentary deputies were imprisoned or exiled, and more than twenty thousand persons altogether were punished for their expression of political opinions. Mr. Gladstone was taking his winter holiday in Naples when his attention was directed to this horrible political persecution. He examined the evidence produced, visited the prisons, and conversed with the sufferers; and then wrote, in the form of a "Letter to the Earl of Aberdeen," a detailed account of the trials and the sufferings of the condemned, denouncing with burning indignation the conduct of the Neapolitan authorities. The letter was reprinted in every country of Europe, and produced an immense sensation. Of course there were official contradictions; but Mr. Gladstone replied to them in a second pamphlet, and, with the exception of a few small matters of detail, maintained the truth of his statements. Lord Palmerston, the Foreign Secretary, sent copies of the letter to the British ministers at the various courts of Europe, with instructions to bring it before the notice of the Government to which they were accredited. The King of Naples and his government yielded to the sense of shame what they would not have yielded to feelings of humanity; Poerio and some of the other prisoners were released, and in other cases there was a considerable remission of punishment.

THE ANTI-PAPAL AGITATION.

The ferment in the public mind at the close of the year 1850, caused by the creation of Papal episcopal sees in England, and the appointment by the Pope of Cardinal Wiseman to the Archbishopric of Westminster, was stimulated by the famous "Durham letter" of Lord John Russell, in which the action of the Pope was described as "a laborious endeavour to confine the intellect and enslave the soul." Soon after the opening of Parliament, the Premier introduced the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, the object of which was to prohibit the assumption of ecclesiastical titles in respect of any places within the United Kingdom by persons other than those already legally entitled. On the second night of the debate, on the motion that the Bill be read a second time, Mr. Gladstone spoke against it. He said the English Roman Catholics had long desired to have bishops in this country, and would, as a consequence of their appointment, be less dependent on the cardinals and priests of Rome. He reminded Lord John Russell that he had been foremost in supporting the endowment of Maynooth, and any expression of fear that a Romish priesthood would be dangerous to the British constitution came with a bad grace from him. Mr. Gladstone maintained, with all the eloquence he can so well employ, that the great principles of religious liberty were at stake; that England had gone so far in removing disabilities that it was impossible she could go back,—"she can no more retrace her steps than the river that bathes this great city can flow backwards to its source."

The Bill, however, was carried by an immense majority; the old Conservatives supporting the Ministry, and the Peelites allying themselves with advanced radicals in opposing it. Practically, however, the measure was a dead letter, and twenty years afterwards ceased to encumber the statute book, being repealed in 1871.

The Russell Administration was greatly weakened by the loss of Lord Palmerston, who had acted with far greater independence in approving the conduct of Prince Louis Napoleon, the new President of the French Republic, than was agreeable to the other members of the Cabinet. Lord John Russell insisted on the resignation of his colleague, and Palmerston quitted office; but soon had his revenge by leading the opposition to a Ministerial proposal for reviving the local militia. In the division, the Government was defeated by a majority of 11, and Lord John Russell resigned.

A CONSERVATIVE ADMINISTRATION.

The Earl of Derby (the Lord Stanley of former days) formed an Administration; and, it is generally understood, offered a seat in the Cabinet to Mr. Gladstone, who declined it. As yet the Peelites were not prepared to go so far as the Liberals, though they were too advanced to cast in their lot with the Conservatives; but they gave an independent general support to the new Ministry. A general election was near at hand; and Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli (for the first time Chancellor of the Exchequer and a Cabinet Minister) announced that on the great question of Free Trade they would accept the verdict of the country as expressed at the polling-booths.

The first budget of Mr. Disraeli received the approval of Mr. Gladstone, who, during the Session, supported the Ministry in opposing a motion brought forward by Mr. Horsman, for inquiry into the circumstances connected with the institution of the High Churchman, the Rev. W. Bennett, as vicar of Frome, a matter which at the time greatly agitated the Evangelical party, and was made an occasion for attacking the bishop. A motion by Mr. Spooner for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the system of education at Maynooth, was supported by Mr. Gladstone, who, however, insisted that it should be conducted under the immediate superintendence of Government. If the grant to the college were withdrawn, he said, Parliament must be prepared to enter upon the whole subject of a reconstruction of the ecclesiastical arrangements of Ireland.

Some of the leading Free Traders now devoted their energies to obtaining the abolition of what were described as "taxes on knowledge"—the paper duty, the newspaper stamp, and the duty on advertisements. In this session, Mr. Milner Gibson, endeavouring to anticipate the permanent arrangements of the Government, moved a resolution for the abolition of the paper duty. Mr. Gladstone supported Mr. Disraeli in opposing the motion, not on the ground that he approved of the impost, but because he thought it very imprudent to pledge themselves to the repeal of any particular tax before the condition of the revenue was known.

The dissolution took place in July, and the new Parliament began business on the 11th of November. Mr. Gladstone was stoutly opposed at Oxford, but was returned by a large majority over his opponent, Dr. Marshman. It was evident, as the result of the elections, that any attempt to restore the Protectionist system would be futile; and the Earl of Derby took the earliest opportunity to announce that the Ministers intended to carry out the Free Trade policy frankly and loyally. Mr. Villiers endeavoured to pledge the House to a resolution approving of Free Trade, but couched in such terms as to be offensive to the Ministers; but an amendment by Lord Palmerston, omitting the objectionable phrases, was accepted by Mr. Disraeli on the part of the Government, and carried, Mr. Gladstone supporting it, and taking occasion to make an eloquent eulogium on the statesmanship of the late Sir Robert Peel.

On the 3rd of December, Mr. Disraeli introduced his Budget, in which he estimated a surplus of £700,000, and proposed many rearrangements and reductions, among them the remission of one-half of the malt-tax. But his plan included an extension of the house-tax to houses rated at £10, and that was the most objectionable feature of the Budget, as increasing the burden of taxation on the poorest classes. Another item which caused great dissatisfaction was the proposed extension of the income-tax to Irish fundholders, denounced as a breach of faith with the national creditors. Mr. Gladstone opposed the financial proposition of the Government with great energy. The estimated surplus, he maintained, consisted of the Exchequer Loan Fund, borrowed money; and there was an actual deficiency in the revenue of the year. He analysed the Budget item by item, "tearing it to shreds," said a writer of the time, established his own reputation as a consummate master of finance, and defeated the Government. A division was taken on the resolution to extend the house duty, which was lost by a majority of 19.

CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER—WAR BUDGETS.

The Earl of Derby resigned, and the Earl of Aberdeen undertook to form a Ministry. The new Cabinet was the result of a coalition between the Whigs and Peelites. Lord Palmerston, Lord John Russell, the Duke of Argyll, and Earl Granville were united with the Duke of Newcastle, Sir James Graham, and Mr. Sidney Herbert. Mr. Gladstone had fairly won the position of Chancellor of the Exchequer; and his appointment was generally recognised as one of the strongest guarantees for the stability of the "Coalition Administration."

Acceptance of office necessitated another appeal to the Oxford University constituency; and opposition was again encountered. Mr. Dudley Perceval, son of the Hon. Spencer Perceval (shot by Bellingham in the lobby of the House of Commons), was proposed by Archdeacon Denison; but at the close of the poll, there was a majority of 124 for Gladstone.

Lord Aberdeen's Administration lasted until the spring of 1855, when the majority in favour of Mr. Roebuck's motion for inquiry into the condition of the army before Sebastopol, and the causes which led to it, led to its downfall. Lord Palmerston became Premier, and for a brief period Mr. Gladstone resumed the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, but retired, in company with Sir James Graham and Mr. Sidney Herbert, because Lord Palmerston would not oppose the nomination of the committee of inquiry, which they considered to be unconstitutional.

The history of the war with Russia, and the sufferings and achievements of the British army in the Crimea, need not be related here. The cost of the campaign was immense, and all the ability and firmness of Mr. Gladstone was required in the discharge of his onerous duties as Chancellor of the Exchequer. When he accepted office at the beginning of 1853, no war-cloud darkened the horizon; and he was enabled to form plans for dealing advantageously with the resources of the country. His first step was a rearrangement of the Three per Cent. and other stocks, by which a considerable reduction on the National Debt was effected; and on the 18th April he produced his Budget, speaking for five hours with unflinching energy and a lucid eloquence which retained the attention of his hearers. True to the policy which he had inherited from Sir Robert Peel, he reduced indirect taxation, abolishing the duties on 123 articles of daily consumption, and reducing the duties on 133 more. The soap duty, that tax on cleanliness, was got rid of; life assurance duty reduced to one-fifth; the advertisement duty to one-third; and altogether there were remissions to the extent of nearly five millions and a quarter. To meet this deficiency of revenue, he made incomes of £100 liable to the income-tax, and extended it to Ireland, raised the duty on Scotch and Irish spirits; and made slight additions to the cost of some licenses. The scheme involved a plan for the gradual diminution of the income-tax, and its abolition in 1860. He estimated a surplus for the ensuing year of about £700,000.

In March in the following year, 1854, war with Russia was proclaimed. Mr. Gladstone was in full accord with the other members of the Cabinet as to the necessity of checking the aggression of the great northern Power. Speaking at Manchester in October 1853, on the occasion of inaugurating a statue of Sir Robert Peel, he earnestly advocated the duty of regulating the distribution of power in Europe, and expressed his firm conviction that the conquest of the Ottoman Empire would be so dangerous to the world, that Europe, at whatever cost, should set herself against the possibility of it.

With England's share of the cost, Mr. Gladstone, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, had to deal. His Budget of the 6th March, 1854 (introduced at an unusually early period, on account of the gravity of the circumstances), was a war budget. He estimated that when the balance was struck on the 5th April (the termination of the financial year), a surplus of £2,854,000 would be shown to exist. But the expenditure of the coming year would exceed that of the former year by about £5,000,000, and the revenue would be about three-quarters of a million less; so that altogether he had to provide for a deficiency of £2,840,000. He did not propose just then to add to the existing taxation of the country; but it might be that if the war continued, a continuance of the remissions on some articles would be impossible. He would not have recourse to a loan at present, although he could not give an absolute pledge on the subject; for he maintained the principle that, as far as possible, the expenses of a war should be met by taxation. The income-tax must be increased by one-half, and by that means he should have a moderate surplus. Some alterations in the stamps on bills were included in the Budget.

Events marched with rapidity. Even Gladstone, with all his foresight, could not anticipate the expense which would be incurred by the warlike action of England. A supplementary Budget was necessary, and on the 8th May, two months after he had prepared his plans for the year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was again compelled to appeal to the Committee of Ways and Means for permission to raise nearly £7,000,000 more. The income-tax must be doubled, the duty on Scotch and Irish spirits increased, and the sugar and malt duties augmented. Two-thirds of the additional taxation, he said, would fall on the wealthier classes, and the remaining one-third would, being indirect taxation, affect all classes of the community.

THE CRIMEAN WAR.

Parliament was prorogued on the 12th August, and reassembled in December. Soon afterwards the Aberdeen Administration ceased to exist, and the ministerial changes occurred which we have already noticed. The Conference at Vienna, to consider the terms on which peace might be obtained, had been unfruitful of results; and Lord John Russell, who had represented the British Government, had incurred some odium by professing his willingness to accede to propositions which his ministerial colleagues peremptorily refused to accept. The war party in England, favoured by Lord Palmerston, would listen to nothing less than the crippling of Russia by depriving her of her Black Sea fleet, and imposing restrictions which would make her powerless for future attacks. A more moderate party maintained that the objects of the war had been attained by the security gained for Turkey; and that to prolong the contest merely for the purpose of humiliating Russia, or vindicating our "military honour, would be to commit a political crime." Mr. Gladstone earnestly supported this view.

The new Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir George Cornwall Lewis, introduced his financial statement on the 20th April. He possessed little of the oratorical grace by which his predecessor could make even a Budget speech attractive; and he had to provide for a deficiency of £23,000,000, a task from which even Mr. Gladstone might have recoiled. About two-thirds of the amount he proposed to raise by issuing a three per cent. stock; the remainder must be obtained by taxation. The income-tax was raised to sixteenpence; and sugar, coffee, tea, and Scotch and Irish spirits again suffered. Mr. Gladstone offered no opposition. He objected to loans as a general principle; but taxation had reached its limit, and "you cannot ask from flesh and blood more than they can reasonably bear."

In the course of the session, Mr. Gladstone supported the principle of competitive examination for the Civil Service, and opposed the Marriage Law Amendment Bill, introduced for the purpose of legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister.

Soon after the opening of Parliament in 1853, the Chancellor of the Exchequer asked for more money, and stated that he had arranged for a loan of £5,000,000 in three per cent. Consols. This announcement drew from Mr. Gladstone a strong expression of disapprobation of the practice of Chancellors of the Exchequer negotiating loans before receiving the sanction of Parliament for doing so. On the 19th May, another loan of £5,000,000 was asked for, and, as there was no alternative, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was empowered to raise the money; but Mr. Gladstone urged that the Navy Estimates should have been reduced, the war being ended.

In the Budget statement of 1857, Sir G. C. Lewis stated that he was enabled to announce a very considerable reduction in the estimate for expenditure, and that a surplus of nearly £900,000 would permit him to reduce the income-tax and the tea and sugar duties. Mr. Gladstone urged that the latter duties, the increase of which had been a war tax, should be reduced to what they were before the outbreak of the war.

The Divorce Bill, introduced this year, was vehemently opposed by Mr. Gladstone, on theological, social, and legal grounds. As in the case of marriage with a deceased wife's sister, he had a strong dislike of any tampering with matters which he considered the Church, with the sanction of religion, had established.

Lord Palmerston's Ministry—which had survived the fierce attack made on it in connection with the Chinese war, consequent on the seizure of the lorcha Arrow, and been triumphant in the appeal to the country which unseated so many opponents—came to an end, having experienced a defeat on the Conspiracy and Murder Bill, a measure intended to facilitate the surrender of certain political refugees from France, which Mr. Gladstone stoutly opposed. The Earl of Derby was at the head of the new Ministry, and it is generally supposed offered Mr. Gladstone the position of Colonial Secretary. He declined, however, to take office in a Conservative Cabinet, and Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton was appointed to the Colonial Office.

COMMISSIONER TO THE IONIAN ISLANDS.

The people of the Ionian Isles, placed under the British protectorate in 1815, had long desired an union with the kingdom of Greece, and continual representations had been made on the subject to the British Government. Sir E. B. Lytton suggested, and the Earl of Derby approved the suggestion, that Mr. Gladstone should be asked to visit the islands on a commission of inquiry, ascertain the real state of public feeling on the subject of annexation to Greece, and assist the Home Government in arriving at a just conclusion on the subject. The offer was accepted, and Mr. Gladstone visited the islands, where he was received with great enthusiasm; and his representation of the state of public feeling led to the subsequent cession, with the full consent of the British Government, of the Ionian Islands to the kingdom of Greece. The visit to the classic islands no doubt gave a new impulse to the Homeric studies in which he had always delighted, for a year afterwards appeared the first of a series of works, which we shall notice further on.

AGAIN CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.

In 1857, the Derby Ministry introduced a Reform Bill, and incurred a defeat, which led to an appeal to the country by a general election, the result of which placed the Ministers in a minority. Mr. Gladstone was re-elected for Oxford, but not without encountering considerable opposition. Lord Palmerston was again Premier, and Mr. Gladstone again took office as Chancellor of the Exchequer, retaining that office in the Palmerston and Russell Administration until 1866, when the Ministerial Reform Bill, introduced by him as leader of the House (to which position he had succeeded after the death of Lord Palmerston in 1865), was defeated, and Ministers resigned. They had pledged themselves to carry the measure,—“We have crossed the Rubicon and burned our boats,” said Mr. Gladstone,—and being unable to do so, gave way to the Earl of Derby and the Conservatives, who took office on the 6th July.

There had been a general election in 1865, and Mr. Gladstone had lost his seat for Oxford University. We have recorded previous unsuccessful efforts to unseat him; now his expressed opinions respecting the Irish Church strengthened his opponents, and Mr. Gathorne Hardy (now Lord Cranbrook) was returned by a majority of 103. Mr. Gladstone had also been returned for South Lancashire, so that the rejection by the University did not keep him out of Parliament.

FINANCIAL ACHIEVEMENTS.

The great achievements of Mr. Gladstone during this seven years' tenure of office were in connection with finance. His Budgets were looked forward to as the greatest of parliamentary events. Never have complex calculations been so dextrously and attractively handled; arithmetical results so clearly explained; and the mysteries of the incidence of taxation and its action on the industry of the country so eloquently expounded. Finance was “understood of the people;” and beyond all doubt the people not only understood, but benefited by Mr. Gladstone's political house-keeping.

The Budget of 1859 had to encounter a considerable deficit, and the income-tax was again resorted to. In February of the following year, the commercial treaty with France had been concluded, chiefly by the labour of Mr. Cobden, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was able to propose the abolition of custom duties on upwards of three hundred items. In June he proposed the repeal of the paper duties, and that remission was acceded to by the House of Commons, but rejected by the Upper House. The action of the Lords was denounced by Mr. Gladstone as “the most gigantic and dangerous invasion of the rights of the Commons which has occurred in modern times.” Next year the repeal of the duties was included in the Budget arrangements, and the Lords were constitutionally unable to interfere. No remission could be effected in 1862; but in the following year the income-tax and tea duty were reduced. In 1864, the sugar duty, the fire insurance duty, and the income-tax were again relieved; and in 1865 the successful financier was able to announce a surplus of more than three millions. Twopence more came off the income-tax; and the duty on tea was reduced to sixpence per pound. The last of these seven Gladstonian Budgets was in 1866, which repealed the duties on timber and pepper, equalized the duties on wine, and made various remissions. Then came the defeat of the Russell Administration, and the transfer of Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues to the Opposition benches. While in office he had opposed the abolition of church rates with great energy, defended the Government for the moral support given to the efforts of Garibaldi and King Victor Emmanuel to establish the Kingdom of Italy, and spoke in favour of an extension of the franchise. In 1859, and again in 1862, he was elected Lord Rector of the University of Edinburgh.

Early in the session of 1867, Mr. Disraeli, the Conservative Chancellor of the Exchequer, and leader of the House of Commons, introduced his Reform Bill. A largely-attended meeting of Liberals promised to support Mr. Gladstone in dealing with the Bill in Committee; and so important were the changes he introduced into the Bill, that, when it passed the third reading, it bore little resemblance to the measure introduced by Ministers. The lodger franchise was carried mainly by the exertion of Mr. Gladstone.

THE DISRAELI MINISTRY.

Mr. Disraeli succeeded to the Premiership on the resignation of the Earl of Derby in 1868. The session of that year was memorable by the decided attitude assumed by Mr. Gladstone in reference to the Irish Church. He had at length made up his mind that justice to Ireland required disestablishment, and he moved resolutions on the subject, and afterwards brought in a Bill embodying the principles. Of course he had to endure a considerable amount of vituperation, and some of his opponents did not scruple to charge him with being a Roman Catholic in disguise, conspiring with the Pope to destroy the Protestant Church in Ireland. The Ministry were in minority in the House; and, as a last resource, dissolved Parliament.

Great, and as it proved successful, exertions were made to deprive Mr. Gladstone of his seat for South Lancashire; but, as on a previous occasion, he was nominated for two constituencies, and Greenwich welcomed him as its representative. The Liberal majority was very great; and on the 18th December Mr. Disraeli resigned office, and Mr. Gladstone was commanded to form a Ministry. When a boy at Eton he had regarded the lofty position of Prime Minister of England as attainable by talent well employed; and the boyish ambition was realized at last, after forty years of almost unexampled political industry.

PRIME MINISTER—LEGISLATION FOR IRELAND.

The first measures of importance introduced by the new Premier showed how resolved he was to attempt the solution of the difficulties which had been for so long sources of bitterness between England and Ireland. He had in former years written and spoken with immense energy in favour of the Irish Church Establishment; but now, in mature life, he had come to the conclusion that it could no longer be defended. On the 1st March, 1869, he introduced a Bill to disendow and disestablish the Irish Church. The debates at the various stages were vigorous and prolonged; but at length the Bill passed the Commons by a majority of 114, and was accepted by the Lords. Early in the next session, the Premier brought forward the Irish Land Bill, which provided for the compensation of tenants for improvement, and for disturbance of occupancy, extending to the whole of Ireland the customary tenant right of the whole of Ulster. There was a vigorous opposition, no less than three hundred amendments being brought forward in committee. The Bill, however, became law; and was, at any rate, a very earnest attempt to remedy many serious evils, although it has not realized all the advantages anticipated. The session of 1870 produced also the Elementary Education Bill.

In 1871, the Ministry incurred some unpopularity by assenting to the Black Sea neutrality clauses of the Treaty of Paris, concluded after the fall of Sebastopol. Another ground of complaint was that, certainly in a high-handed manner, Mr. Gladstone effected, by a royal warrant, the abolition of purchase in the army, after the Peers had rejected a Bill for that purpose, introduced by the Secretary of State for War, and carried through the House of Commons. The University Tests Bill—another measure entirely opposed to his previous course of action—was passed; and in the session of 1872, the Bill establishing vote by ballot at Parliamentary elections, which had been rejected by the Peers in the previous session, was passed. With a certain class of politicians, those indomitable patriots who think we ought, right or wrong, to fight out every quarrel, the Ministry lost prestige by consenting to arbitration in the matter of the Alabama claims pressed against us by the United States. More thoughtful and less belligerent persons, however, assented to a course which was dictated by a sense of justice and a desire to avoid conflict.

In 1873, another Irish measure, which the Premier had set his heart upon carrying, the Irish University Bill, described by him as "vital not only to the honour and existence of the Government, but to the welfare and prosperity of Ireland," was rejected on the second reading by three votes, a small majority, but sufficient to induce Mr. Gladstone to offer his resignation. Mr. Disraeli was not prepared to form an Administration, and Ministers retained office. The Budget, introduced by Mr. Lowe, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was satisfactory, showing a surplus of £3,146,000, after payment of £3,200,000 for the Alabama compensation claims. The income-tax and the sugar duties were again reduced, and some minor remissions of taxation were also effected.

Shortly after the close of the Session, Mr. Lowe was transferred to the Home Office, and Mr. Gladstone undertook the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Ministerial majority had dwindled; and on the 24th January, 1874, a letter from the Premier to his Greenwich constituents appeared, announcing that he intended to appeal to the country, and promising that, if the general election gave him a majority sufficient to justify him in retaining office, he would abolish the income-tax. The desired majority was not obtained, and Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues resigned office.

THE SECOND DISRAELI ADMINISTRATION.

The Session of 1874 saw Mr. Disraeli again

Prime Minister, with a large majority, and Mr. Gladstone the leader of a dispirited Opposition. He resigned that position in 1875, in favour of the Marquis of Hartington, son of the Duke of Devonshire, who became the Liberal leader in the House of Commons. Mr. Gladstone took very little part in Parliamentary debates, devoting himself principally to literary pursuits. But in 1876 came a great awakening, and it is scarcely a figure of speech to say that the giant was aroused.

THE BULGARIAN ATROCITIES.

The rising in the Herzegovina and Bosnia, the deposition of the Sultan, and other Eastern complications, were followed by massacres in Bulgaria, perpetrated by Turkish irregular troops. The most terrible narratives reached England. Mr. Gladstone, horrified by the cruelties perpetrated, and the apparent indifference of Mr. Disraeli and his colleagues in office, published a pamphlet, and made many speeches on the subject. In April 1857, he brought forward resolutions in the House of Commons on the subject, but was defeated by a majority of 151. Unavailingly, but with unrelenting energy, he continued his exertions, speaking, writing, advocating the independence of Bulgaria, and the expulsion of the Turks "bag and baggage."

THE MIDLOTHIAN CAMPAIGN.

A general election would, by the lapse of time, take place in 1880, and the Liberal party began to prepare for the contest. Mr. Gladstone was invited to contest Midlothian; and in November 1879, he undertook and achieved a task which would have taxed the energies of a strong young man; but which, in the case of a man just on the completion of his seventieth year, was simply prodigious. Day after day he made elaborate speeches, sometimes speaking twice in one day. At Dalkeith, West Calder, and Edinburgh, and many other places, his hearers were numbered by thousands. At Glasgow, which he visited for the purpose of being inaugurated as Lord Rector of the University, he made a powerful and lengthy political speech, and in the evening of the same day delivered an elaborate address to the students. For about three weeks his activity was incessant; and at no period of his long career did he exhibit greater oratorical power.

A brief period of repose at Hawarden followed, and then came preparation for the memorable general election of 1880. The tide had turned, and to a great extent that result was due to Mr. Gladstone. He was nominated for Midlothian, where he was returned by a good majority, notwithstanding the powerful local influence of the Duke of Buccleuch; and also for Leeds, for which borough his youngest son, Mr. Herbert Gladstone, was afterwards returned. A clear majority of fifty-three appeared for the Liberals over Conservatives and Home Rulers combined when Parliament met, and before that the Earl of Beaconsfield (Mr. Disraeli), accepting the inevitable, resigned office. The Queen sent for Lord Hartington, and afterwards for Earl Granville; but both these statesmen declined office; and on the 28th April, Mr. Gladstone was again sworn in as Prime Minister and Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Since his accession to office, Mr. Gladstone has been engaged in Parliamentary struggles of the most arduous kind. Besides the Irish Coercion and Irish Land Bill, vigorously contested at every stage, the introduction of new rules for the conduct of business in the House, and the Bradlaugh difficulty, have severely taxed his energies.

MR. GLADSTONE AS AN AUTHOR.

We have mentioned his book on the relations of the Church to the State. This was followed in 1840 by "Church Principles considered in their Results." In 1850 appeared "Remarks on the Royal Supremacy, as it is Defined by Reason, History, and the Constitution," a work suggested by the result of the Gorham controversy. He published also various translations from Latin and Greek poets, and soon after his visit to the Ionian Isles, appeared the first of his studies of Homeric literature and Homeric times: "Place of Homer in Classical Education and Historical Inquiry;" "Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age" (1858); "Juventus Mundi; the Gods and Men of the Homeric Age" (1869); "Homeric Synchronism" (1876). His contributions to theological and ecclesiastical literature have been numerous—among them "The Vatican Decrees; their Bearing on Civil Allegiance" (1874); "Rome and the Newest Fashions in Religion" (1875); and a reply to the book "Ecce Homo," which attracted so much notice. Pamphlets and contributions to periodical literature are too numerous to specify; the most important have been collected in a volume. In 1868 appeared "A Chapter of Autobiography," in which he explained and defended his change of opinion respecting some important questions.

BIRTH AND EDUCATION.

THE subject of the following memoir had a good start in life. It was an advantage of which he certainly made the most, and it forms a curious speculation whether had he been obscurely born, Pitt would ever have come to hold a place among the worthies of the world. William Pitt the younger was born at Hayes, in Kent, on the 28th of May, 1759, and was the second son of Lord Chatham and of Lady Hester Grenville, Countess of Temple. His constitution was so weak from infancy that he was never placed at a public school, but pursued his studies as he was able, from time to time, under a private tutor, at his father's residence in the country.

As the boy is the father of the man it is but natural that we should find in the young Pitt some indications of his future greatness. But we must be on our guard against the statements of those who, when they come to write of heroes, feel bound to discover prodigies where common sense sees clearly that none exist. When all allowances are made, however, enough remains to show that Pitt was a youth of very superior parts, and it is equally evident that he was well aware of his abilities. He had at twelve years of age the confidence and self-possession of fifty, united with an engaging manner which appears to have won universal esteem.

He wrote a tragedy. It was a natural proceeding for a fertile and ingenious mind. Hayley, the poet, heard of it, and when he met the youth, then about fourteen years of age, he seems to have formed such a high opinion of his critical sagacity that he meditated consulting him about some of his own literary projects. Of Pitt's tragedy, Lord Macaulay, in his Life of William Pitt, written for the Encyclopædia Britannica, says it was "not worse than the tragedies of Hayley." This piece, Lord Macaulay goes on to tell us, "is still preserved at Chevening, and is in some respects highly curious. There is no love. The whole plot is political; and it is remarkable that the interest such as it is, turns on a contest about a regency. On one side is a faithful servant of the Crown; on the other, an ambitious and unprincipled conspirator. At length the King, who has been missing, reappears, resumes his power, and rewards the faithful defender of his rights. A reader who should judge only by internal evidence, would have no hesitation in pronouncing that the play was written by some Pittite poetaster at the time of the rejoicings for the recovery of George III. in 1789."

But writing tragedies was not the work Pitt came into the world to do, and after the juvenile production of which we have spoken, we hear of no other ventures in that line. Indeed, he proved in after life a very striking contrast to some statesmen of recent times, who have, amidst all the hurry and anxieties of public duties, found time to consecrate to literature and art. Pitt's tastes for aught we know may have pointed very decidedly to books, but all enjoyment to be derived from them was soon put far out of his reach. The student must have, at any rate at intervals, leisure and repose, and these, such was Pitt's devotion to the public interest, he could never command.

After eight years given to his studies at home, half of which time, however, was lost through ill-health, he was sent at the age of fourteen to the University at Cambridge; and so great was his proficiency, notwithstanding all his disadvantages, that, according to his tutor, Dr. Prettyman, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln, in Latin authors he seldom met with difficulty; and it was no uncommon thing for him to read into English six or eight pages of Thucydides, which he had not previously seen, without more than two or three mistakes, sometimes without even one.

His constitution, however, was so frail, that during the first three years of his college life, he was never able to keep the terms with regularity. But though his early life at Cambridge seems to have been "one long disease," his quickness and accuracy of thought made up for every deficiency arising from bodily weakness. His whole soul from boyhood had been absorbed in one idea—that of becoming a distinguished orator; and when he heard at the age of seven that his father had been raised to the peerage, he instantly exclaimed, "Then I must take his place in the House of Commons." To this point all his efforts were now directed, with a zeal and constancy which knew no limits but the weakness of his frame, and which seemed almost to triumph over the infirmities of nature.

AT CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.

Pitt's studies at the University were continued nearly seven years, though with frequent intervals of residence under his father's roof. Three things seem to have occupied his attention for a long time, viz., the classics, the mathematics, and the logic of Aristotle applied to the purposes of debates. His mode of translating the classics to his tutor was a peculiar one. He did not construe an author in the ordinary way; but, after reading a passage of some length in the original, he turned it at once into regular English sentences, aiming to give the ideas with great exactness, and to express himself at the same time with accuracy and ease.

It is only by practices such as these that the student of public speaking can make himself a perfect orator. No doubt there must be natural endowments to begin with, but these must be cultivated very much as Pitt cultivated them, if one would rise to the foremost place as a speaker, and exert the same power over popular audiences as was exerted by the great man whose life we are now considering, and whose example we may in many respects safely follow.

Pitt, till he graduated, had scarcely one acquaintance, attended chapel regularly morning and evening, dined every day in hall, and never went to a single evening party. At seventeen, he was admitted, after the pernicious practice of those times, to the degree of Master of Arts. But he continued during some years to reside at college, and to apply himself vigorously to the studies of the place, while mixing freely in the best academic society.

MENTAL TRAINING.

The severe mental training to which Pitt subjected himself, prepared him to enter with ease and delight into the most abstract questions of moral and political science. "Locke on the Human Understanding" was his favourite author on the science of mind; he soon mastered Smith's "Wealth of Nations," which was first published when he was attending college; he gave great attention to a course of lectures by Dr. Halifax on "Civil Law;" and, in short, whatever subject he took up, he made it his chief endeavour to be deeply grounded in its principles, rather than extensively acquainted with its details. Multum in idem was his motto in pursuing these inquiries, and, indeed, in most of the studies of his life. The same motto gave a direction to his reading in English literature. He read the best historians with great care. Middleton's "Life of Cicero," and the political and historical writings of Bolingbroke, were his favourite models in point of style; he studied Barrow's Sermons by the advice of his father for copiousness of diction, and was intimately acquainted with the Sacred Scriptures, not only as a guide of his faith and practice, but, in the language of Spenser, as the true "well of English undefiled."

To modern literature, Pitt paid comparatively little attention. He knew no living language but French; and that he knew very imperfectly. With a few of the best English writers he was intimate, particularly with Shakespeare and Milton. The debate in Pandemonium was, as it well deserved to be, one of his favourite passages; and his early friends used to talk long after his death of the just emphasis and the melodious cadence with which they had heard him recite the incomparable speech of Belial. "He had indeed," says Macaulay, "been carefully trained from infancy in the art of managing his voice, a voice naturally clear and deep-toned. His father, whose oratory owed no small part of its effect to that art, had been a most skillful and judicious instructor. At a later period, the wits of Brookes's irritated by observing night after night how, powerfully Pitt's sonorous elocution fascinated the rows of country gentleman, reproached him with having been 'taught by his dad on a stool.'"

The stock of learning which Pitt laid in during his college days was certainly very extraordinary. In fact, it was all he ever possessed; for he very early grew too busy to have any spare time for books.

He was distinguished at college alike for the closeness of his application, and for the success of his efforts in attaining those branches of knowledge to which his studies were particularly directed. Although no proofs are recorded of extraordinary brilliancy in his academical career, yet few young men of any rank have passed through the probation of a university with a more respectable character for morals, abilities, industry, and regularity. He was intended by his father for the bar and the senate, and his education was regulated accordingly.

Soon after he quitted the University he went to the Continent, and passed a short time at Rheims. This foreign residence appears to have had a favourable effect on his mind in the way of enlarging his ideas and gaining new images to enrich his already fertile imagination. On his return we find him resuming a practice to which he had given considerable attention previous to his going abroad,—that of attendance on parliamentary debates. This attendance familiarized him with the modes of procedure of the House, and with the style of speaking most likely to secure attention and win conviction.

How far Lord Chatham contributed by direct inspiration to form the mind of his son it is difficult to say. That he inspired him with his own lofty and generous sentiments; that he set integrity, truth, and public spirit before him, as the best means of securing success even in politics; that he warned him against that fashionable dissipation which has proved the ruin of too many of the nobility; that he made him feel intensely the importance of character to an English statesman, is obvious from what remains to us of his correspondence, and from the results that appear in the early life of Pitt. But there is no evidence that he took any active part in his intellectual training.

AT THE BAR.

Pitt lost his father in 1778; and being left in straitened circumstances, applied himself to the law, as affording the most direct means of support. He was called to the bar on the 12th June, 1781. He rode the Western Circuit during that and the next year, having causes occasionally put into his hands, especially one which he argued before Judge Buller, in a manner that awakened the admiration of the bar; and another before Lord Mansfield, on granting the writ of habeas corpus to a man charged with murder, in which he received the warmest applause from that distinguished jurist.

He was a favourite with his brethren of the circuit; one of whom remarks, "Among the lively men of our time of life, Pitt was always the most animated and convivial in the many hours of leisure which occur to young men on circuit. He joined all the little excursions and parties of pleasure that were habitually formed. His name and reputation for high acquirements at the University commanded the attention of his seniors; his wit and good humour endeared him to the younger part of the bar. After he became Minister, he continued to ask his old circuit intimates to dine with him, and his manners remained unchanged."

AS MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT; PITT'S MAIDEN SPEECH.

In January, 1781, he was returned as Member of Parliament for Appleby, a borough belonging to Sir James Lowther. He immediately joined the Opposition, under Burke and Fox, at a time when Lord North, besides the revolt of the American Colonies, was engaged in a war with France, Spain, and Holland.

His maiden speech was delivered on the twenty-sixth of the same month, and being wholly unpremeditated, gave a surprising exhibition of the readiness and fertility of his mind. One of Burke's Bills on Economical Reform was under debate; and when Lord Nugent rose to oppose it, a Mr. Byng, member for Middlesex, asked Pitt to come forward in reply. He partly assented, but afterwards changed his mind, and determined not to speak. Byng, who understood him otherwise, the moment Lord Nugent sat down, called out "Pitt! Pitt!" and the cry at once became general throughout the House. At first he declined; but finding the House was bent on hearing him, he rose with entire self-possession, took up the argument with all the force of a practised debater, and threw over the whole a glow, an eloquence, a richness of thought and fervour of emotion which called forth a round of applause from every quarter of the House. Burke took him by the hand, declaring that he was "not merely a chip of the old block, but the old block itself." Fox carried him to Brookes's when the House adjourned, and had him enrolled among the élite of the Whigs; and the nation felt that the mantle had fallen upon one who was already qualified to go forth in "the spirit and power" of his illustrious predecessor. He spoke but twice that session; and at the close of it, on some one remarking, "Pitt promises to be one of the finest speakers ever heard in Parliament," Fox, who was passing at the moment, turned instantly round, and replied, "He is so already." Thus, at the age of twenty-two, when most men are yet in the rudiments of political science, and just commencing their first essays in oratory, he placed himself at a single bound in the foremost rank of English statesmen and orators, at the proudest era of English eloquence. What is still more wonderful, he became, not by slow degrees, like Fox, but by inspiration, in the language of Lord Brougham, "one of the most accomplished debaters in the British Parliament."

EARLY PARLIAMENTARY CAREER.

At the next session, commencing in November 1781, Pitt entered into debate on the broadest scale, and made the most strenuous exertions to put an end to the American war. The defeat of Cornwallis had rendered the contest absolutely hopeless; and he denounced it as one which "wasted the blood and treasure of the kingdom, without even a rational object." But he avoided the error of Fox; he made no personal attack on the King. With that forecast which marked all his actions in opposing the favourite measures of his sovereign, he did nothing to wound his pride or rouse his resentment. He put the responsibility on his Ministers, and inveighed against them as men "who, by their fatal system, had led the country, step by step, to the most calamitous and disgraceful situation to which a once flourishing and glorious empire could possibly be reduced—a situation which threatened the final dissolution of the state, if not prevented by timely wise and vigorous efforts."

At the end of a few weeks, Lord North was driven from office; and the Rockingham Administration came into power, March 28, 1782, with Fox and Lord Shelburne as principal Secretaries of State. Various stations, and among them one of great emolument, were offered to Pitt; but he declined them all, having resolved, with that lofty feeling which always marked his character, never to take office until he could come in at once as a member of the Cabinet.

A YOUTHFUL CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.

The Rockingham Ministry was terminated by the death of its chief at the end of thirteen weeks. Lord Shelburne succeeded, and with him brought in Pitt as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and leader of the House of Commons. Such an event had never before happened in the history of English politics. The conduct of the entire finances of the Empire had hitherto been reserved for men of tried experience. Godolphin, Oxford, Walpole, Pelham, Grenville, Townsend, and North, had risen by slow degrees to this weighty and responsible office. Pitt alone received it at once, without passing through any subordinate station, at the age of twenty-three; and the country hailed him with joy as worthy to take his father's place in the management of the highest concerns of the Empire.

Lord Shelburne now made peace, on the 30th November, 1782, on terms quite as favourable as could have been expected, after the disgraceful results of Lord North's contest with America and France. But it was already obvious that his Lordship, though head of the Government, was not master of the House of Commons. Fox, who had succeeded when the new Ministry came in, held the balance of power between them and Lord North. Some union of parties was, therefore, indispensable, or the Government could not go on; and Pitt was commissioned to negotiate with Fox for a return to power. Their interview was short. Fox instantly demanded whether, under the proposed arrangement, Lord Shelburne was still to remain Prime Minister. Pitt replied that nothing else had ever been thought of. "I cannot," said Fox, warmly, "ever consent to hold office under his Lordship." "And I certainly have not come here," replied Pitt, "to betray his Lordship." They parted, and never again met under a private roof. From the entire contrariety of their habits and feelings, they could never have acted except as political opponents.

THE COALITION OF FOX AND LORD NORTH.

Fox now united with Lord North, and voted down the Ministry on the 17th of February, 1783. The preliminary treaties of peace had been signed in January; and on this day they were taken into consideration by the House of Commons.

Pitt took part in the debate, but he was in feeble health, and irritability got the better of judgment. He gave a rude piece of advice to Sheridan, which enabled that celebrated orator to deliver himself of one of those neat and pointed replies which may well excite our admiration and envy.

"Let the honourable member," said Pitt, "rest contented with exercising his genius in another sphere, and with winning the applause of other audiences."

This allusion to his theatrical pursuits was too much for Sheridan. He rose, and with the greatest coolness said, "After what I have seen and heard to-night, I really feel strongly tempted to venture on a competition with so great an artist as Ben Jonson, and to bring on the stage a second 'Angry Boy.'"

It is rather a misfortune that a kind biographer has been at the pains to point out that the happy flashes of Sheridan's wit were mostly prepared beforehand. But after all what does it matter? A reply should have the air of being unpremeditated, as this one has, and whether it has been treasured up for a dozen years against a suitable occasion, or has sprung into being just at the moment, is of no consequence at all.

The Opposition on that evening had the best of it. The House divided, and the supporters of the Government were found to be in a considerable minority. Pitt and his friends might well have been discouraged; but opposition seems only to have encouraged them, as is always the case with resolute natures.

Four days after, Lord John Cavendish followed up the blow by moving a resolution involving a severe censure upon the Ministers for the terms on which they had concluded peace. The debate was a long one; and Fox reserved himself for the close of the evening, obviously intending to overwhelm his young antagonist, and put an end to the discussion by the force and severity of his remarks. The moment he sat down, Pitt rose, to the surprise of all, and grappled at once in argument with the "most accomplished debater the world ever saw." This speech contained passages which he never afterwards surpassed in his long and brilliant career of eloquence.

"Lord North, in following Pitt that night, spoke of his eloquence as amazing," and added, "It is no small presumption of my innocence that I could hear his thunder without being dismayed, and even listen to it with a mixture of astonishment and delight." But the Coalition was too strong to be dissolved; the vote of censure was passed by a majority of seventeen, and Lord Shelburne resigned.

The King now sent for Pitt, and urged him to accept the office of Prime Minister; but with that strength of judgment which never deserted him in the most flattering or the most adverse circumstances, he steadfastly rejected the offer, satisfied that it would be impossible to resist the combined forces of Lord North and Fox in the House. To gratify the King, however, while endeavouring to form a Ministry to his mind, Pitt remained in office for six weeks, carrying on the government with a dignity of deportment, and an ease and dexterity in the despatch of business, which excited the admiration of all, and produced the frequent remark, "There is no need of a Ministry whilst Mr. Pitt is here."

In the meantime, the King, though urged by repeated addresses from the House, continued to shrink from the Coalition; and it is now known that he seriously meditated a retirement to Hanover, as the only means of relief from the painful situation in which he found himself. It was Thurlow who deterred him from so hazardous a step. "Your Majesty may go to your Electoral dominions," said the Chancellor, bluntly; "nothing is easier; but you may not find it so easy to return when you grow tired of staying there. James II. did the same; Your Majesty must not follow his example." He therefore advised the King to submit with patience, assuring him that the Coalition could not remain long in power without committing some error which would lay them open to successful attack. The King saw the wisdom of his advice. He permitted the Coalition Ministry to be formed, 2nd of April, 1783, but with an express reservation that he was to be understood as in no way concerned in their measures.

A VISIT TO THE CONTINENT.

Pitt now paid a visit to the Continent, accompanied by William Wilberforce, "the nightingale of the House of Commons," and for ever famous for his efforts in putting down the slave trade. The two visited Paris, where Pitt was received with the greatest enthusiasm. He was invited everywhere, asked his opinion about everything and everybody, and suffered all other inconveniences of popularity. Certainly it is not always well to be conspicuous, and one can fancy that many a great statesman, surrounded by influence and defended by applause, would gladly echo the wish of Oliver Cromwell to be a little shepherd boy sitting under a hedge.

He was also tempted by a matrimonial project. Wilberforce says, it was hinted to him, through the intervention of Horace Walpole, that he would be an acceptable suitor for the daughter of the celebrated Necker, afterwards Madame de Staël. Necker is said to have offered to endow her with a fortune of £14,000 a year. But he declined the proposal, and remained unmarried to the end of life. With all the diversity of his powers, there are two characters which Pitt would have been quite unable to sustain; to play the part of the lover or the husband would have been equally beyond his reach.

PITT AS PRIME MINISTER.

The measure foretold by Thurlow came earlier than was expected. During the first week of the next session, on the 18th of November, 1783, Fox brought forward his East India Bill. In opposing this scheme, Pitt spoke the sentiments of most men in the kingdom. The firmest Whigs, like Lord Camden, and the most strenuous enemies of oppression, like Wilberforce, united with the supporters of the Crown and the entire moneyed interest of the country, denouncing it in the strongest terms. The measure, however, was carried through all its stages in the House of Commons by large majorities; and only encountered a formidable resistance when it reached the Lords, where all the personal influence of the King was exerted to procure its defeat. This object being attained, the King followed up his advantage by dismissing Fox and Lord North when they would not resign, and by appointing Pitt Prime Minister, with the offices of First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer. This was in the middle of December 1783.

Pitt now came in as Prime Minister at the age of twenty-four, under circumstances wholly without precedent in the history of British politics. Against him was arrayed an overwhelming majority in the House, led on by the most eloquent men of the time, inflamed by a sense of injury and disappointed ambition. So hopeless did his prospect appear, that a motion for a new writ to fill his place for the borough of Appleby was received with a general shout of laughter.

A TRYING SITUATION.

In the contest which followed, and which turned the eyes of the whole Empire on the House of Commons, for nearly three months the young Minister's situation was not only trying beyond measure, in a political point of view, but, as Wrexall observes, "appeared at times to be not wholly exempt from personal danger." For he might be said, without exaggeration, to hold suspended over his head the severest marks of the displeasure of the offended House. His removal from the King's presence and councils as an enemy of his country—his impeachment or his commitment to the Tower—any or all of these propositions might have been carried in moments of effervescence, when the passions of a popular assembly, inflamed by such a conductor as Fox, seemed to be ripe for any acts of violence.

Under these circumstances, Pitt displayed a presence of mind, a skill and boldness in repelling attack, and a dexterity in turning the weapons of his adversaries against themselves, which we cannot even now contemplate as remote spectators of the scene without wonder and admiration. Fox's first step was to demand, rather than request, of the King that Parliament should not be dissolved, intimating in his speech on the subject, that it would not be safe to adopt such a measure, "merely to suit the convenience of an ambitious young man." Pitt, who had wisely determined to fight the battle for a new parliament in and through the present House, replied by a friend—for he had not yet been re-elected as a member—that he had no designs of the sort; and that if any idea of proroguing or dissolving Parliament should be entertained anywhere, Mr. Pitt would instantly resign." To make himself still more sure, Fox next moved a resolution, declaring "the payment of any public money for services, voted in the present session, after Parliament should be prorogued or dissolved—if such event should take place before an Act should be passed appropriating the supplies for such services, to be a high crime and misdemeanour." To this Pitt made no objections, and the motion was carried by general consent.

These things combined brought Pitt apparently to the feet of Fox. The majority were not to be broken down by a new election; and if they stopped the supplies, he had no longer the resource of proroguing Parliament, and using the money on hand as absolutely necessary for continuing the Government; he must resign, or bring the country at once into a state of anarchy. So certain did Fox consider the result, that he said on the floor of the House, "To talk of the permanence of such an Administration would be only laughing at and insulting them;" and at the close of the same speech he spoke of "the youth of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the weakness incident to his early period of life, as the only possible excuse for his temerity."

The Mutiny Bill had been already delayed by Fox for a month; and the same decisive step was soon after taken with the supplies. Pitt was then distinctly warned of the inevitable consequences of his persisting in a refusal to resign; while he was insulted for many weeks by one resolution after another, passed by large majorities, reflecting in the severest terms on the means by which he had gained power, and declaring that his Ministry did not possess the confidence of the House or the country.

nation the charge of having come into office by indirect or unworthy means. "I declare," said he, "that I came up no backstairs. When my Sovereign was pleased to send for me, in order to know whether I would accept of employment, I was compelled to go to the royal closet; but I know of no secret influence! My own integrity forms my protection against such a concealed agent; and whenever I discover it, the House may rest assured I will not remain one hour in the Cabinet! I will neither have the meanness to act upon advice given by others, nor the hypocrisy to pretend, when the measures of an Administration in which I occupy a place are censured, that they were not of my advising. If any former Ministers are hurt by these charges, to them be the sting! Little did I conceive that I should ever be accused within these walls as the abettor or the tool of secret influence! The nature and the singularity of the imputation only render it the more contemptible. This is the sole reply that I shall ever deign to make. The probity and rectitude of my private as well as of my public principles, will ever constitute my sources of action. I never will be responsible for measures not my own, nor condescend to become the instrument of any secret advisers whatever. With respect to the questions put to me on the subject of a dissolution of Parliament, it does not become me to comment on the expressions composing the gracious answer of the Sovereign, delivered by him from the Throne. Neither will I compromise the royal prerogative, nor bargain it away in the House of Commons!"

The King, whose residence was then at Windsor, waited with deep emotion for a daily account of the conflict going on in the House; and such was his anxiety during part of the time, that hourly expresses were sent him, with a report of the debates. It was indeed more his battle than that of the Ministry. His correspondence shows that he was resolved to stake everything on the firmness of Pitt. His honour as a sovereign forbade his receiving back Lord North and Fox, after the means they were using to force themselves into power; and if Pitt sank in the conflict, it was the King's determination to sink with him. After a night of the greatest disaster, when the Ministry had been five times beaten,—twice on questions directly involving their continuance in office,—His Majesty wrote to Pitt in the following terms:—

"As to myself, I am perfectly composed, as I have the self-satisfaction of feeling that I have done my duty. Though I think Mr. Pitt's day will be fully taken up in considering with the other Ministers what measures are best to be adopted in the present crisis, yet, that no delay may arise from my absence, I shall dine in town, and consequently be ready to see him in the evening, if he should think that would be of utility. At all events, I am ready to take any step that may be proposed to oppose this faction, and to struggle to the last period of my life. But I can never submit to throw myself into its power. If they at the end succeed, my line is a clear one, and to which I have fortitude enough to submit."

These words, pointing directly to a withdrawal from England, with the case of James II. in full view, if not to consequences even more fatal, must have wrought powerfully on Pitt. It was not merely his love of office or scorn of being beaten that nerved him with such energy for the conflict; it was sympathy and respect for his sovereign. And the hopes of averting those terrible civil commotions which seemed inevitable with Fox at the head of the Commons, drove the King, supported by the nobility, into the desperate measure contemplated.

A SCENE IN THE HOUSE.

As the contest went on, Pitt having been beaten on an East India Bill which he introduced, Fox moved the same night for leave to bring in another of his own, which he declared to be the same as his former one in all its essential principles. He then turned to Pitt, and demanded to know whether the King would dissolve Parliament to prevent the passing of such a Bill. All eyes were turned to the Treasury Bench; and a scene ensued of the most exciting nature. "Mr. Pitt," says the Parliamentary History, "sat still; the members on all sides calling upon him in vain to rise. Sir Grey Cooper then broke out into some very severe remarks, and closed with saying, that if the gentleman persisted in his silence, the House ought to come to a resolution on the subject. On Mr. Pitt's sitting still, the cry was very loud of "Move, move!" calling on Sir Grey to bring forward a resolution. Fox then made some very cutting observations on the sulky silence of the gentleman, "his treating the House with so little decency," etc., when "the House still called most vehemently on Mr. Pitt to rise." General Conway now came out with great warmth, and attacked the character and motives of Ministers in the bitterest terms, declaring that "the present Ministry, originating in darkness and secrecy, maintained themselves by artifice. All their conduct was dark and intricate; they existed by corruption, and they were now about to dissolve Parliament, after sending their agents about the country to bribe men."

Pitt now rose, not to answer the questions put to him, but with a call to order. As Conway was advanced in years, Pitt treated him with respect, but demanded that he should "specify the instances of corruption" charged, and told him that "what he could not prove he ought never to assert." "No man," said he in his loftiest tones, "shall draw me aside from the purpose which, on mature deliberation, I have formed. Individual members have no right to call upon me for replies to questions involving in them great public considerations. Nor is it incumbent on me to answer interrogatories put in the harsh language which has been used." Turning again to Conway, whose age ought to have taught him more moderation, he reproved his intemperance of language in a way which called forth a burst of applause from the House, by quoting the noble reply of Scipio to Fabius: "Youth as I am, I will conquer the aged, if in nothing else, at least in modesty and command over my tongue."

THE TABLES TURNED.

Some of Fox's friends now became anxious for a compromise. Among them was a Mr. Powys, who had been so scandalized by the Coalition and the East India Bill, that he joined Pitt in opposing them, but went back to Fox the moment he was dismissed and Pitt was put in his place. He now urged a coalition between them as the only possible means of giving harmony to the country. He proposed to remove the difficulty as to Lord North, whom Fox could not desert, by raising him to the Upper House.

A large number of country gentlemen had now become so anxious for a coalition,—which Fox himself proposed,—that a meeting, attended by nearly seventy members of the House, was held at St. Alban's Tavern, under the auspices of Powys and Mr. Grosvenor of Chester. On applying to the Duke of Portland as head of the Opposition, they received for answer, that the only obstacle in the way was Mr. Pitt's being in office. He was required to resign as preliminary to negotiations. The King, though with great reluctance, consented to receive some of the Opposition "as a respectable part of a Ministry on a broad basis, but insisted on their giving up the idea of having the administration in their own hands." In accordance with these views, Pitt refused to resign.

It was not without reason that Fox had been desirous of a compromise; the whole country had begun to move for Pitt and the King. Addresses in favour of the Ministry now poured in from every part of the kingdom. London led the way, and sent a deputation to Pitt's residence in Berkeley Square, preceded by the City Marshal and Sheriffs, to present him with the freedom of the city in a gold box of one hundred guineas in value, as a mark of gratitude for and approbation of his zeal and assiduity in supporting the legal prerogatives of the Crown, and the constitutional rights of the people.

Fox's majority now began to diminish, until, on the 27th of February, it was reduced to seven. On the 8th of March he made his last great effort in a "Representation to the King," drawn up in powerful language, containing reasons for the removal of the Ministers. So great was the anxiety to be present at this debate, that the gallery was filled to overflowing more than six hours before the House assembled. The debate was opened by Fox's moving that this Representation be entered on the records of the House; it continued till midnight; and when the vote was taken, he had only one as a majority. Tremendous cheers now broke forth from the Treasury Benches: the Coalition was defeated; the Mutiny Bill was passed. Parliament was soon after dissolved; and the nation was called upon to decide at the hustings between Fox and Pitt.

The people ratified at the polls what they had declared in their addresses to the King and the Ministry. Never was there so complete a revolution in any House of Commons. More than a hundred and sixty of Fox's friends lost their seats.

A LONG LEASE OF POWER.

From this period for seventeen years, and, after a short interval, during three years more, Pitt swayed the destinies of England, under circumstances for the most part more perilous and appalling than have fallen to the lot of any British statesman in modern times. As to his leading measures, men differ now almost as much as during the heat of the contest, in the judgment they pronounce between him and his great opponent. But there is more candour in estimating the motives and intentions of both. Very few at the present day would call in question the honour, the integrity, or the sincere patriotism of William Pitt. All, too, have come to feel, that in deciding on the conduct of public men during the French Revolution, the question is not so much, "Who was in the right?" as "Who was least in the wrong?" At a period of great excitement, it is undeniably difficult even for the greatest minds to maintain their equilibrium.

PROJECTED PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

The first measure of Pitt was a Bill for the better government of India. Early in 1785 he brought forward a plan of reform in Parliament. On this subject he had, from early life, entered with great warmth into the feelings of his father, and had twice before, in 1782 and 1783, moved similar resolutions, supported by able speeches, though without success. He now took it up as Minister. His plan was to disfranchise thirty-six decayed boroughs,—making due compensation to their owners,—and transfer the representation, consisting of nearly a hundred members, to the counties and unrepresented towns. He also proposed to extend the right of voting in populous places to the inhabitants in general. Fox strenuously resisted the proposed compensation; and the friends of reform being thus divided, Pitt was beaten by a majority of 248 to 174.

As he never brought up the subject again, he has been accused by some of insincerity; but we learn his true feelings from a record in the diary of Wilberforce: "At Pitt's all day. It (reform) goes on well; sat up late chatting with Pitt, who has good hopes of the country—noble and patriotic heart! To town (next day)—House—Parliamentary Reform—terribly disappointed and beat." It is not surprising that, after being defeated three times, he should be in no haste to revive the subject again, especially as the King was strongly opposed to the measure; nor does it show any want of sincerity in his early efforts, that he afterwards changed his views as to the expediency of agitating the question. Even Lord Brougham, with all his disposition to censure Pitt, says, "The alarms raised by the French Revolution, and its cognate excitement among ourselves, justified a reconsideration of the opinions originally entertained on our parliamentary system, and might induce an honest alteration of them."

A SCHEME FOR PAYING OFF THE NATIONAL DEBT; OTHER MEASURES.

In 1786, Pitt brought forward his celebrated plan for paying the National Debt of £239,000,000, by means of a Sinking Fund. The suggestion came from a Dr. Price, who offered three schemes to the Ministry; and it has been often said that Pitt "chose the worst." True it is, that on the other two the debt would have been paid sooner, but they were more complicated, and required an annual outlay to begin with, which Pitt clearly saw the country could never endure. He therefore chose the plan which, though less expeditious, was the only one he deemed practicable. It was founded on the fact that he had a surplus revenue of £900,000 a year. To this £100,000 might be added from taxes without burdening the country; and "this sum of £1,000,000 a year, improved at compound interest by being regularly invested in public stocks, would, in twenty-eight years, amount to four millions a year, at the supposed interest of five per cent., a sum which would pay off one hundred millions of three per cents."

The scheme was professedly founded on the continuance of peace. While this remained, the surplus could be relied on without adding any new debt; and as the nations of the continent seemed tired of war after the exhausting conflict from which they had just escaped, Pitt not unnaturally hoped that England might enjoy so long a season of repose as to place her Sinking Fund on high and safe ground before the occurrence of another war.

Unfortunately, within seven years there commenced the most terrible conflict in which this country ever engaged. The surplus failed; and though the form of a Sinking Fund was kept up, it became from this time a mere bubble, paying a debt with one hand, while borrowing with the other. This was not the Sinking Fund devised by Pitt and Dr. Price. If the peace of Europe had been as lasting then as since the fall of Napoleon, and the original plan had been carried out faithfully, the fund would probably have by this time extinguished a great part, if not the whole, of the debt.

Pitt's Commercial Treaty with France in 1787 was the first step on the part of England towards enlightened principles of national intercourse. His armament against France the same year, in behalf of Holland, was applauded by all; that against Spain in 1790 was ultimately approved by Fox; that against Russia in 1791 was promptly and wisely given up when the voice of the nation declared against it.

We shall pass lightly over the ground taken up by Pitt on the exciting question of the Regency; the measures he then proposed now form an acknowledged part of the constitutional law on the subject.

THE ABOLITION OF THE SLAVE TRADE; A NEW CONSTITUTION FOR CANADA.

Of the immediate abolition of the Slave Trade Pitt was a warm advocate; and in 1792, he made the most eloquent speech on the subject ever delivered in the House of Commons. Lord Brougham speaks of him in the harshest terms for not making this a Ministerial question, and compelling his adherents to unite with him at once in a vote for suppressing the traffic. It may be doubted, however, whether a great moral question ought ever to be carried by mere force. Years of inquiry and argument are often necessary to make the removal, even of enormous abuses, either permanent or useful. The King and his family remained to the last strenuous opponents of the abolition of the Slave Trade. Most of the nobility for a long time had the same feelings; and nearly all the mercantile interest of the kingdom resisted it for many years. Some of the ablest of Pitt's colleagues were vehemently opposed to what they regarded as a rash and impracticable scheme, while they professed a sincere regard for a gradual abolition of the traffic. It certainly does honour to Pitt, that under these circumstances, he never wavered or shrunk back. He gave Wilberforce all the influence of his personal and official character; he spoke and voted for immediate abolition. If he had gone farther, and attempted what Lord Brougham condemns him so bitterly for not doing, he would probably have put an end at once to his Ministry, without the slightest advantage, and perhaps with serious detriment, to the cause he had espoused.

In 1791, it became the duty of Pitt to frame a new Constitution for Canada. He did it upon wise and liberal principles. He for ever took away the question which led to the American war, that of taxing the Colonies for the sake of revenue. The British Parliament now expressly relinquished the right of levying any taxes, except for the regulation of trade (to which, indeed, the Americans were always ready to submit); and in order to guard this point more fully, Pitt provided that the proceeds even of these taxes should go to the Provincial Assemblies, and not to the Government at home. It was much for George III. to make these concessions.

FINANCIAL MEASURES.

The financial measures of Pitt during this period were highly successful. He took the government at the end of Lord North's wars, with an unfunded debt of thirty millions sterling, and a national income wholly unequal to the expense even of a moderate peace establishment. There were large claims to be provided for in favour of the American Loyalists; there was a system of enormous fraud in the collection of the public revenues to be searched out; there were permanent arrangements to be made for commercial intercourse with America and some of the countries of Europe; and the vast concerns of India were to be reduced to order and placed on a new foundation. In carrying out his plans, he had to fight his way at every step against the acutest and most eloquent men in the country; and he did it under the disadvantage of having no common ground of argument on which to meet them, since they were ignorant of the principles of Adam Smith, while the popular maxims and prejudices of the day were all on their side.

Within five years the debt was funded, and reduced five millions, notwithstanding the expense of two armaments, and other outlays to the amount of six millions. An entire and most beneficial change was made in the manner of collecting the customs and auditing the public accounts, requiring more than three thousand distinct resolutions in Parliament to carry the plan into effect. Under this system, the public revenue went on increasing, until, early in 1792, he "felt justified in proposing a repeal of the most burdensome imposts, and an addition of £400,000 to the annual million already appropriated as a Sinking Fund." In respect, then, to the first eight years of Pitt's administration, it was not, perhaps, too much for Gibbon to say, that "in all his researches in ancient and modern history, he had nowhere met with a parallel—with one who at so early a period of life had so important a trust reposed in him, which he had discharged with so much credit to himself, and advantage to the kingdom."

PITT AND THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

We now come to the course adopted by Pitt respecting the Revolution in France, and the war in that country. This, as Lord Brougham remarks, "is the main charge against him." It is obvious that whatever may have been his errors on this subject, he had every possible motive to desire the continuance of peace. On this depended all his plans of finance, and especially the success of his Sinking Fund, to which he looked as the proudest memorial of his greatness as a statesman. That he did ardently desire it no one doubts; and so sanguine were his expectations, that he remarked in the House of Commons, about the middle of 1792, "England had never a fairer prospect of a long continuance of peace. I think we may confidently reckon upon peace for ten years." Burke had previously expressed similar views. England had no longer anything to fear from her hereditary rival. "France," said he, "in a political light, is to be considered expunged out of the system of Europe."

At this moment, July 25th, 1792, Austria and Prussia invaded France, for the avowed purpose of restoring Louis XVI. to all his rights as an absolute monarch. It is unnecessary to say that this step kindled the fire which soon after wrapped the whole of Europe in a blaze. It is now known that this country had no knowledge of or concern in this invasion. On the contrary, Pitt declined all communication with Austria on the subject, and declared to Prussia his unalterable resolution to maintain neutrality, and avoid all interference in the internal concerns of France. It is also known that some months after he endeavoured to put a stop to the contest by "negotiating," in the words of Wilberforce, "with the principal European Powers, for the purpose of obtaining a joint representation to France, assuring her that if she would formally engage to keep within her own limits, and not molest her neighbours, she would be suffered to settle her own internal government and constitution without interference." This negotiation was broken off in the midst by the execution of Louis XVI.; and Pitt thus failed in his efforts to arrest the war on the Continent.

When the French drove out the Austrians and Prussians, they seized in turn on the Austrian Netherlands early in November 1792. Here arose the first point of collision between England and France. The Republican rulers forced the passage of the river Scheldt from the Netherlands down to the sea. This river had been closed, under the provisions of the Treaty of Westphalia, for a century and a half, out of regard to the rights of Holland, through which it flows; and England was bound by treaty to defend these rights. A second point of collision was the French Decree of Fraternity, passed on the 19th of November, 1792, by the National Assembly, declaring that the French "would grant fraternity and assistance to all those people who wish to procure liberty, and charged the executive to send orders to their generals to give assistance to such people as have suffered, or are now suffering, in the cause of liberty."

This was considered as a declaration of war against all the monarchies of Europe, and a direct call on their subjects to rise in rebellion. It was brought home to England by the fact that delegates from Societies in London and elsewhere, consisting of many thousands, were received at the bar of the French National Convention nine days after the publication of this decree, where they declared their intention to "adopt the French form of government, and establish a National Convention in England." The President of the Convention replied in very significant terms: "Royalty in Europe is either destroyed or on the point of perishing; and the Declaration of Rights, placed by the side of thrones, is a devouring fire which will consume them." There is no doubt that the French at this time expected a revolution in England.

These aggressions and insults would have justified our Government in demanding ample reparation. But there was a difficulty with regard to the mode of negotiating. When Louis XVI. was made a prisoner of the Convention by the events of the 10th of August, 1792, his government ceased, and Pitt recalled the English Ambassador from Paris, and suspended the functions of the French Ambassador in London. How then were the two countries to communicate? This soon afterwards became a practical question. England began to arm, which she might reasonably do, under existing circumstances. The French Government instructed their suspended ambassador, M. Chauvelin, who remained in London, to demand whether this armament was directed against France, tendering at the same time an explanation of the Decree of Fraternity, as not aimed at England, and proposing to negotiate in relation to the Scheldt. What was Pitt now to do? No one would expect him instantly to recognise the National Convention as de jure the Government of France.

Fox proposed to treat with them as the Government de facto; but this is a distinction which has sprung up chiefly since the French Revolution; and it is easy to see how strong a repugnance George III., and most of the English, must have felt to any recognition of the new Government, while they held their king a prisoner, and were calling on the subjects of every other monarch in Europe to join with them in rebellion. Pitt took a middle course. He did not refuse to communicate with the French rulers, but he declined to receive the paper of M. Chauvelin as "an official communication." He did, however, reply, "under a form neither regular nor official," telling him, "if France is really desirous of maintaining peace and friendship with England, she must show herself disposed to renounce her views of aggression and aggrandisement, and confine herself within her own territories, without insulting other Governments, without disturbing their tranquillity; without violating their rights."

Within less than a month the King of France was beleaguered. M. Chauvelin, whose functions had been suspended during the imprisonment of Louis, was now dismissed and sent out of the kingdom; and seven days after France declared war against England.

Such is an exact representation of the facts. It is certainly to be regretted that Pitt did not follow the course recommended by Fox, and thus take from France all pretence of putting him in the wrong. But in passing a sentence on his conduct, we are not to be influenced by our knowledge of the result. He acted under the prevailing delusion, that the war, if it ever took place, would neither be severe nor calamitous. "It must certainly be ended," he said to a friend, "in one or two campaigns." He acted as most men act who feel strong in dealing with those whom they consider as weak. He acted also under the belief—which subsequent events proved correct—that the French were insincere in their disavowals, that they only wished to gain time. The French Minister of War is now understood to have said at this juncture, "We have three hundred thousand men in arms, and we must make them march as far as their legs will carry; them, or they will return and cut our throats."

From the moment of their triumph in the Austrian Netherlands, the policy of the French Government was war. On the other hand, George III. and the great body of the people of the country were equally bent on fighting. "If a stop is not put to French principles," said he, "there will not be a king left in Europe in a few years." The only plan then thought of was to shut out these principles by war, and to put down the authors of them as enemies of the human race. "Had Pitt refused to go to war," says one writer, who was by no means unfriendly to his measures, "he would have been driven from power by the united voice of King and people; and his successor, whether Whig or Tory, would have been compelled to pursue the course of policy which was only reluctantly followed by that celebrated statesman. The war, therefore, was not Pitt's war; it was equally the war of the English and the French nations.

THE REIGN OF TERROR.

As to French principles, which were an object of so much terror to the King, they had, no doubt, to some extent gained a foothold among the middle and lower classes. Paine's "Rights of Man," and other publications of a still more radical character, were widely circulated; and it has since been stated on high authority, that "the soldiers were everywhere tampered with." "You have a great estate," said one of these radical reformers to General Lambton; "we shall soon divide it amongst us." "You will presently spend it in liquor," replied the General; "and what will you do then?" "Why, then we will divide it again."

Between 1793 and 1795, very stringent measures were adopted for putting down this spirit. Acts of Parliament were passed, suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, imposing severe restrictions on the holding of political meetings, and giving a wider interpretation to the crime of treason. They were designed as temporary measures, and were limited to three years. Still they brought great reproach on Pitt; though it now appears that they did not originate with him, but with the followers of Burke, who had been recently brought into the Ministry. Lord Campbell, speaking of this period, says: "Now began that system of policy for the repression of French principles which has caused the period in which it prevailed to be designated as 'The Reign of Terror.' I think the system was unwise, and that Lord Loughborough is chiefly answerable for it."

During this period also occurred those State trials, arising out of some wild attempts at Parliamentary Reform, in which Erskine was so much distinguished. Some reproach has fallen upon Pitt for allowing them to go on. It appears, however, from the statement of Lord Campbell, that "Lord Loughborough was the principal adviser of them. He considered himself to the wildest apprehensions of Burke; he feared that any encouragement to Parliamentary reform was tantamount to rebellion; and he believed that general bloodshed would be saved by the sacrifice of a few individuals. . . . When the plan was first proposed of arresting the members of the Corresponding Society, and proceeding capitally against them, it is said that Pitt, who had studied the law, expressed some disapprobation of the notion of 'constructive treason,' but he did not like to rely upon the objection that the Duke of Richmond and himself had supported similar doctrines, and, no doubt, in his heart he believed that, under the pretence of Parliamentary reform, deeper designs were now carried on. The Attorney and Solicitor General, being consulted by the Chancellor, gave an opinion that the imputed conspiracy to change the form of government was a compassing of the King's death within the meaning of the statute of Edward III.; and the King himself, upon this opinion, was eager for the prosecutions. So in an evil hour an order was made that they should be instituted, and warrants were signed for the arrest of the supposed traitors." "Happily, English juries," adds Lord Campbell, "and the returning sober sense of the English people, at last saved public liberty from the great peril to which it was then exposed. . . . To the credit of George III., when the whole subject was understood by him, he rejoiced in the acquittals, and, laying all the blame on the Chancellor, he said, 'You have got us into the wrong box, my Lord, you have got us into the wrong box. Constructive treason won't do, my Lord, constructive treason won't do.'"

NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRANCE; AT WAR SINGLE-HANDED.

Pitt saw within three years from the commencement of the war how idle it was to think of refusing to recognize the French Republic as forming part of the political system of Europe. She had extorted that recognition from all around her at the point of the bayonet, and had nearly doubled her territory and dependencies at the expense of her neighbours.

He therefore brought down a message from the King, acknowledging her government as established under the Directory in October 1795; and in October 1796 sent a plenipotentiary to Paris with proposals of peace. His terms were liberal. He offered to restore the conquests he had made from France, being all her rich colonies in the East and West Indies, receiving nothing in return, and only asking for Austria, as the ally of England, a similar restoration of the territory which had been wrested from her by the French. This the Directory refused; and, after a short negotiation, ordered the English ambassador to quit Paris in twenty-four hours.

The next year, 1797, was one of the darkest seasons this country had known for centuries. In April, Austria was compelled to sue for peace, leaving the English to carry on the contest single-handed; and at the moment when this intelligence arrived, a mutiny had broken out in the fleets, both at the Nore and Spithead, more extensive and threatening than had ever occurred in the English navy; while Ireland was on the brink of rebellion, and actually had duties in France soliciting the aid of her troops. Never were funds so low, even in the worst periods of the American war.

These events were ushered in by the greatest calamity that can befall a commercial people, a drain of specie arising from the operation of the war, which endangered the whole banking system of the country. Whether Pitt was to blame or not for the causes which produced this drain, it is certain that his daring resolution saved the country in this alarming crisis. He issued an order of the Privy Council on the 26th of February, 1797, requiring the Bank of England to suspend specie payments. He might have avoided the personal hazard thus incurred by throwing the responsibility on Parliament, which was then in session. The order, indeed, was generally considered as unconstitutional; but the case would not admit of delay; a single night's debate on such a question might have destroyed all credit throughout the kingdom. Parliament and the country justified the course he took, while the bankers in every part of the empire united to sustain him.

The mutiny was quelled by a judicious union of firmness and concession; Ireland was held down for another year; and Great Britain, instead of being plunged into the gulf of national and individual bankruptcy, as predicted by Fox, was placed on a vantage-ground, which enabled her to sustain the pressure of the war without injury to her financial system. It is not wonderful that the friends of Pitt were loud in their applause of "the pilot that weathered the storm."

About the middle of 1797, Pitt renewed his proposals of peace. He sent Lord Malmesbury to Lisle, offering, as in the former case, to restore all his conquests, and, as Austria was now out of the way demanding nothing in return. There were at this juncture two parties in the Directory, one for peace and the other for war; and the negotiation changed its aspect from time to time during the two months of its continuance, as the one or the other gained the mastery. It is a curious circumstance that a similar division existed in Pitt's own Cabinet; so that among the astonishing disclosures made in Lord Malmesbury's diary, we find that it was necessary for his Lordship to send two sets of despatches every time he communicated with his government, one of a more general nature to be read by Lord Loughborough and his associates, who were bent on defeating the negotiations, and the other for Pitt, Lord Grenville, and Dundas.

The violent part of the Directory at last prevailed. War became the policy of the Government, and Lord Malmesbury was dismissed. The French were to be deluded with new visions of conquest. Bonaparte was sent to subdue Egypt, and thus open a pathway to India; and the whole of Hindostan, with its hundred and fifty millions of inhabitants, was to become a tributary to the Republic. Pitt laid the subject before Parliament in a masterly speech on the 10th of November, 1797. Parliament, without a dissenting voice, approved of his conduct, and united in the emphatic declaration, "We know that great exertions are wanted; we are ready to make them; and are, at all events, determined to stand or fall by the laws, liberties, and religion of our country." The people came forward with that noble spirit and unanimity which has always distinguished this country in times of great peril, and subscribed fifteen hundred thousand pounds, not as a loan, but as a voluntary gift, for carrying on the war.

The Directory lasted little more than four years, and then yielded to the power of Bonaparte, who became First Consul in December 1799. He immediately proposed a peace; and it was now Pitt's turn to reject the offer. Wounded by the insults which he had received in the two preceding negotiations, doubting whether the power of the First Consul would be at all more permanent than that of others who had gone before him, and convinced, at all events, that he could not be sincere in his offer, since the genius and interests of Bonaparte led only to war, Pitt declined to negotiate on the subject.

OUT OF OFFICE AND IN AGAIN.

In 1800, Pitt accomplished his favourite plan of a legislative union of Ireland with Great Britain. But he was unable to effect it without a distinct intimation to the Roman Catholics that they should receive as a reward for their acquiescence the boon of emancipation which they had been so long seeking, will not this without consulting the King, and knowing his scruples on the subject, but still with a firm belief that His Majesty, in attaining so great an object, would yield those scruples to the wishes of the most enlightened men in the kingdom. But the moment he disclosed his plan to his colleagues, Lord Loughborough, says Lord Campbell, "set secretly to work, and composed a most elaborate and artful paper, showing forth the dangers likely to arise from Mr. Pitt's plan, in a manner admirably calculated to make an impression on the royal mind."

The King was thus fortified against the proposal before Pitt had time to present his reasons; and, adopting a course he had taken with the East India Bill of Fox, declared at the levee, with a view to have his words circulated, "that he should consider any person who voted for the measure proposed by his Minister as personally indisposed towards himself."

Pitt justly considered this as a direct exclusion from the public service, and so informed the Cabinet, in February 1801, having held the office of Prime Minister between sixteen and seventeen years. It was supposed at the time that he retired with a view to open a more easy way for negotiating a peace with France. He certainly desired peace, but the circumstances here stated were the true cause of his withdrawing from the Government.

Mr. Addington, who afterwards became Lord Sidmouth, succeeded him; and Pitt gave the new Minister a cordial support. Wilberforce, in his diary, says: "Pitt has really behaved with a magnanimity unparalleled in a politician, and is wishing to form for Addington the best and strongest possible administration." He approved of the peace; and, again, when the rupture took place, he gave the declaration of war on the 18th of May, 1803, his warmest support. His speech on this occasion—which through an accident in the gallery was never reported—is said by Lord Brougham to have "excelled all his other performances in vehement and spirit-stirring declamation; and this may be the more easily believed when we know that Mr. Fox, in his reply, said, 'The orators of antiquity would have admired, probably would have envied, it.'" The last half-hour is described as having been one unbroken torrent of the most majestic declamation.

The Ministry of Addington was fated to have only a short duration. His timidity and inertness wholly unfitted him for pursuing the war; and the country soon became eager for a change of Ministers. Pitt was then again called to the head of affairs on the 12th of May, 1804. He has been reproached by Lord Brougham for accepting office without insisting upon Catholic emancipation; but his former step had thrown the King into a fit of derangement for nearly three weeks; a new agitation of the subject might have produced the same result; and as it was now clear enough emancipation would never be carried during the reign of George III., Pitt surely was not to exclude himself from office on a mere point of etiquette.

DEATH AND FUNERAL.

He now formed his last great coalition against Bonaparte; but the battle of Austerlitz, on the 2nd of December, 1805, was a death-blow to his hopes. Worn out with care and anxiety, his health had been declining for some months.

On the 17th of January, 1806, at a consultation of his physicians, it was agreed that though it was not advisable that he should attend to business for the next two months, yet there was hope he would be able to take his place in the House of Commons in the course of the winter. On the 20th, however, he grew much worse, and it was admitted that his situation was precarious; in other words, those who had encouraged hope in the patient now saw that he was in the most imminent danger, and that probably he had not many hours to live.

The Bishop of Lincoln, who never left him during his illness, informed him that his end was approaching, and requested to administer to him the consolations of religion.

Pitt asked Sir Walter Farquhar, who stood near his bed, "How long do you think I have to live?"

The physician answered that he could not say; at the same time he expressed a faint hope of his recovery.

A half smile on Pitt's face showed that he understood this in its true meaning. In answer to the Bishop's request to pray with him, Pitt replied, "I fear I have, like too many other men, neglected prayer too much to have any ground for hope that it can be efficacious on a death-bed; but," making an effort to rise as he spoke, "I throw myself entirely on the mercy of God."

The Bishop then read the prayers, and Pitt appeared to join in them with a calm and humble piety. He desired that the arrangement of his papers and the settlement of his affairs might be left to his brother and the Bishop of Lincoln. Speaking of his nieces, for whom he had always manifested the sincerest affection, he said, "I could wish a thousand or fifteen hundred a year to be given them, if the public should think my long services deserving of it."

Pitt died about four o'clock in the morning of the 23rd of January, in the forty-seventh year of his age. A public funeral was decreed in his honour by Parliament, and he was buried in the northern transept of Westminster Abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory at the expense of the nation. Of the debts he left behind, and of Lord Macaulay's opinion of them expressed in his well-known Life in the Encyclopædia Britannica, we shall speak in the next paragraph.

A LARGE PRIVATE DEBT.

Pitt left behind him debts to the amount of £40,000; and all parties in the House of Commons readily concurred in voting that sum to satisfy the demands of his creditors. "Some of Pitt's admirers," remarks Lord Macaulay, "seemed to consider the magnitude of his embarrassments as a circumstance highly honourable to him; but men of sense will probably be of a different opinion. It is far better, no doubt, that a great Minister should carry his contempt for money to excess than that he should contaminate his hands with unlawful gain. But it is neither right nor becoming in a man to whom the public has given an income more than sufficient for his comfort and dignity, to bequeath to that public a great debt, the effect of mere negligence and profusion. As First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer, Pitt never had less than £6,000 a year, besides an excellent house. In 1792 he was forced by his royal master's friendly importunity to accept for life the office of Warden of the Cinque Ports, with near £4,000 more. He had neither wife nor child; he had no needy relations; he had no expensive tastes; he had no long election bills. Had he given but a quarter of an hour a week to the regulation of his household, he would have kept his expenditure within bounds. Or if he could not spare even a quarter of an hour a week for that purpose, he had numerous friends, excellent men of business, who would have been proud to act as his stewards. One of these friends, the chief of a great commercial house in the city, made an attempt to put the establishment in Downing Street to rights, but in vain. He found that the waste of the servants' hall was almost fabulous. The quantity of butcher's meat charged in the bill was nine hundred-weight a week. The consumption of poultry, of fish, of tea, was in proportion. The character of Pitt would have stood higher if, with the disinterestedness of Pericles and De Witt, he had united their dignified frugality."

WILBERFORCE ON PITT'S CHARACTER; PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

Wilberforce, who knew him more intimately than any other man, has given this testimony as to Pitt's character:—"Mr. Pitt had his foibles, and, of course, they were not diminished by so long a continuance in office; but for a clear and comprehensive view of the most complicated subject in all its relations; for that fairness of mind which disposes a man to follow out and, when overtaken, to recognise the truth; for magnanimity which made him ready to change his measures when he thought the good of the country required it, though he knew he would be charged with inconsistency on account of the change; for willingness to give a fair hearing to all that could be urged against his own opinions, and to listen to the suggestion of men whose understandings he knew to be inferior to his own; for personal purity, disinterestedness, integrity, and love of country, I have never known his equal. His strictness in regard to truth was astonishing, considering the situation he so long filled."

In person, Pitt was tall and slender; his features were rather harsh, but lighted up with intelligence by the flashes of his eye; his gestures were animated but devoid of grace; his articulation was remarkably full and clear, filling the largest room with the body of sound. His manner of entering the House was strikingly indicative of his absorption in the business before him. "From the instant he passed the doorway," says Wrexall, "he advanced up the floor with a quick and firm step, his head erect and thrown back, looking neither to the right nor to the left, nor favouring with a nod or a glance any of the individuals seated on either side, among whom many who possessed £5,000 a year would have been gratified even by so slight a mark of attention." Those who knew him best as a speaker expatiated with delight on "the perfection of his arrangement, the comprehensiveness of his reasonings, the power of his sarcasm, the magnificence of his declamation, the majestic tone of his voice, the legislative authority of his manner, and his felicitous observance of the temper of his audience."

Canning has given the following sketch of Pitt:—

"The character of this illustrious statesman early passed its ordeal. Scarcely had he attained the age at which reflection commences, when Europe with astonishment beheld him filling the first place in the councils of his country, and managing the vast mass of its concerns with all the vigour and steadiness of the most matured wisdom. Dignity, strength, discretion, were among the masterly qualities of his mind at its first dawn. He had been nurtured as a statesman, and his knowledge was of that kind which always lay ready for practical application. Not dealing in the subtleties of abstract politics, but moving in the slow, steady procession of reason, his conceptions were reflective, and his views correct. Habitually attentive to the concerns of government, he spared no pains to acquaint himself with whatever was connected, however minutely, with its prosperity. He was devoted to the State. Its interests engrossed all his study and engaged all his care. It was the element alone in which he seemed to live and move. He allowed himself but little recreation from his labours. His mind was always on its station, and its activity was unremitted."

BENJAMIN DISRAELI, EARL OF BEACONSFIELD.

"Marvellous indeed has that career been. It is unlike anything in the biography of other English statesmen. . . . What is the secret of success by which a man who at one time had coquetted with O'Connell, at another time had been a sutor to Mr. Joseph Hume, next a panegyrist and then an assailant of Sir Robert Peel, has attained a position in Parliament and the country to which Burke never ventured to aspire and which Canning attained at the cost of health, peace of mind, and life itself?"—Edinburgh Review, April 1868.

THE VENETIAN D'ISRAELIS.

IN 1492 the Jews were expelled from Spain through the influence of the Inquisition, which had been established only fourteen years before, and under the direction of Tomas de Torquemada, the Dominican friar, had perpetrated cruelties enough to make up one of the most terrible chapters of history. More than two hundred thousand Israelites yielded to fear, and professed themselves converted, torture and death being the offered alternative. Many nobly dared to die, and in one year nearly three hundred were burned at the stake in Seville alone. Ferdinand and Isabella would have shown a little mercy, especially as the Jews offered an enormous amount of money for permission to remain unmolested, but the fiendish Torquemada compared them to Judas, and the king and queen quailed with spiritual terror. A royal edict ordered the expulsion within four months of all Jews who refused Christian baptism, and they were ordered to take no gold or silver out of the country. It was the fashion in those days to persecute remorselessly, and make the victims pay heavily for the privilege of being tortured, burned, or exiled. The Jews fled whither they could. Some, with the prudent instinct of their race, took with them as much of their hoarded wealth as they could contrive to conceal from the prying eyes of their persecutors, and when they were dispersed abroad and found refuge in countries where their presence was tolerated, soon became eminent for their mercantile aptitude and industry. Whether there were many Shylocks among the Jewish merchants of Venice we know not; but there were certainly some who in respect of honourable dealing, ability, and enterprise, were entitled to stand side by side with any Antonios the city of the islands could produce. That sometimes the arrogant Venetians might be disposed to "call them dogs and spit upon their Jewish gabardines" is likely enough, for those were intolerant times; but the Jews' calm pride of nationality, and the patience which grows from long experience that "sufferance is the badge of all their tribe," enabled them to bear sneers and even insults, and to find their compensation in material prosperity.

Among these Jewish merchants were the members of a family whose ancestors had been long domiciled in the Spanish peninsula. When they quitted the land of intolerance and persecution, they not only shook off the dust from their feet, but abandoned, and it seems speedily forgot, the Gothic surname which for ages their ancestors had borne. The most famous of their descendants—the author, orator, and statesman, twice Prime Minister of England, whose remarkable career we are about to relate—says of his forefathers who found a new home in Venice, that "grateful to the God of Judah who had sustained them through unheard-of perils, they assumed the name of D'Israeli, a name never borne before or since by any other family, in order that their race might be for ever recognised." For about two centuries, members of the family thus proudly and courageously named flourished as merchants, which, says the modern representative of the family (with one of those odd epigrammatic turns of thought which mark his literary and oratorical style) "was but just, as St. Mark, the patron saint of the Republic, was himself a child of Israel."

THE ENGLISH D'ISRAELIS.

About the middle of the last century, the eyes of foreign Jews were directed towards England as at any rate a land of "promise" for the members of the ancient race. In 1723, the Jews were permitted to acquire land in England, and in 1753 an Act to naturalize them in England was passed, although an outburst of fanaticism in the following year led to its repeal. Henry Pelham, who had led the opposition against Sir Robert Walpole, and succeeded to the high office of Prime Minister in 1743, was known to be favourable to the Jews, who felt thereby encouraged to settle, or establish the younger members of their families, in England. The Venetian D'Israeli had several sons, and in 1748 sent one of them, Benjamin by name, and perhaps in his father's affections, then eighteen years old, to this country, where he established a business as merchant, and quickly made money. He was probably not a very strict Jew, and seems to have rather avoided, at any rate, not cordially to have mixed with, the Jewish families of the stricter sort established here. Indeed he appears to have been more of an Italian than a Jew by nature. His descendant describes him as "a man of ardent character, sanguine, courageous, speculative and fortunate, with a temper which no disappointment could disturb, and a brain, amid reverses, full of resource." When thirty-five years old he married, his choice falling on a lady of Jewish race, and possessing the beauty which tradition assigns to the maids of Judah. Her family had suffered much from persecution, and she treasured up the memory of their sufferings, not, however, in heroic fashion, but as a motive for contemptuous dislike of the race to which she belonged; "a feeling," remarks her grandson, "which the vain are too apt to adopt when they find that they are born to public contempt." She was, indeed, as little of a Jewess as a daughter of the Jewish race could be; but she never openly adopted the Christian faith, and whether she ever adopted the Christian practice of resignation and forgiveness we are not particularly bound to inquire. Her descendant records that she lived to the age of eighty, "without indulging in a tender expression."

Benjamin D'Israeli, the successful merchant, owner of enough of this world's goods to make life comfortable, and, with Italian rather than the Hebraic instinct, not desiring to devote the remainder of his life to the work of accumulation, retired to a pleasant house at Enfield, near the broad, open Chase, formed a garden in the Italian style, entertained visitors, among them Horace Mann, the friend and correspondent of Horace Walpole, played whist, ate macaroni, and sang canzonettas; and, says Benjamin the younger, "notwithstanding a wife who never pardoned him for his name, and a son who disappointed all his plans, and who to the last hour of his life was an enigma to him, lived till he was nearly ninety, and then died in the full enjoyment of prolonged existence." Eighty-six was the actual age of the genial, kindly, easy-tempered old man when he died at Stoke Newington, on the 28th of November, 1816. His only son, the "enigma," was nearly fifty years old when he laid his father in the grave, and had made himself then a great name in literature; but in his boyish days he was a source of perplexity to his parents, not from misconduct, but because they entirely failed to understand him. Isaac D'Israeli inherited his mother's beauty, but nothing of his mother's character. Something of the father's easiness of disposition was added to a sensitiveness and force of imagination to which the father was an utter stranger. The boy, "a pale pensive child, with large lustrous eyes, delicate features, and hair falling in ringlets on his neck," showed an early love for reading; and actually composed poetry while still young in his teens. The father was puzzled by his intelligence; the mother was angry with his want of spirit in failing to feel what she considered the degradation of the race to which she belonged. His life was made unhappy by want of sympathy, and by his mother's hard nature. "Having a strong, clear mind, without any imagination, she believed that she beheld an inevitable doom. The tart remark and the contemptuous comment on her part elicited on the other all the irritability of the poetic idiosyncrasy. After frantic ebullitions, for which, when the circumstances were analyzed by an ordinary mind, there seemed no sufficient cause, my grandfather always interfered to soothe with good-tempered commonplaces, and promote peace." Once Isaac ran away from home, irritated beyond endurance, but was followed and brought back by his father.

THE AUTHOR OF "THE CURIOSITIES OF LITERATURE."

We have dwelt a little on these incidents in the early life of Isaac D'Israeli, because they explain in some degree why the imaginative, sensitive, studious boy, who afterwards became so famous as the author of the "Curiosities of Literature," and many other works, renounced Judaism, apparently was willing to forget his nationality, and, by omitting the apostrophe his ancestors had used in the family name, depriving it of its significance, and making it the comparatively commonplace Disraeli. His father, an easy-going Galilean, who "cared for none of these things," was indifferent to Judasim. His mother continually expressed her dislike to it, and considered it as a brand which condemned her and her child to a species of social outlawry. At what period Isaac Disraeli openly accepted the doctrines of Christianity is not known with precision, but it was probably early in life. On the 10th of February, 1802, he married Maria, daughter of Mr. George Basevi, of Brighton, to whom he was united for forty-five years. He was devoted to study, and being possessed of a comfortable income left him by his father, was enabled to give his whole time to his favourite pursuit. His son describes him as "a complete literary character, a man who really passed his life in his library. He detested business, and never required relaxation. He had not a single passion or prejudice; all his conviction was the result of his own studies, and very often opposed to the impressions which he had early imbibed. He not only never entered into the politics of the day, but he could never understand them."

For the sake of consulting the books in the British Museum—a very different place indeed from what it is now, and with only about half-a-dozen bookworms investigating its literary treasures—I once Disraeli occupied chambers in one of the streets included in what is known as the Adelphi, in the Strand. Every room, even the bed-chamber, was crowded with books; and here, on the 21st December, 1803, Benjamin Disraeli was born. It has been frequently stated, and generally believed, that he was born in the Upper Street, Islington, in a house then overlooking the fields at Canonbury, one of the pleasantest localities in the northern suburbs of the Metropolis; but shortly before his death he told Lord Barrington that he was born in the Adelphi. It has been stated, on the authority of the register, that he was christened when twelve years old at St. Andrew's, Holborn; and if so, the circumstance tends to show that his father had relinquished the Jewish faith before that time. At any rate, he appears to have so far withdrawn from his people, that he had no objection to his son making a profession of Christianity.

BOYHOOD OF BENJAMIN DISRAELI.

The father's own love of literature and estimation of the value of scholarship, added, in all likelihood, to a perception of his son's remarkable and precocious abilities, induced him to afford the means of a good education to the young Benjamin by sending him to an excellent private school, and himself assisting in the work. The fine library he had collected must, too, have been of great value to his son. When schooldays were over, and it became time to think of a profession, the public service appeared to offer the best prospect; and the father, conscious, perhaps, of his own disqualifications for business-life, and anxious that his son should be more practical than himself, placed him, as a preparation for active life, in the office of a solicitor in the City. Some biographers tell us that it was in the chambers of a conveyancer Benjamin Disraeli acquired the rudiments of legal knowledge; but there is better authority for the statement that he sat at a desk in the Old Jewry office. But, as one of the narrators of his career remarks, "You cannot, by any weight of circumstances, restrain genius, if it be real, from following the bent of its own inclinations. Mr. Disraeli soon began to mix up literature with law."

He inherited something of his father's love of literature and pleasure in collecting illustrations of the sensitiveness and perplexities of literary men, in discovering paradoxes and starting new theories, upsetting old beliefs; and he inherited from his grandmother a keen sense of the sufferings of his race from persecution, but in his mind that was a reason for vindicating, not despising, the people from whom he sprang. His political theories, crude as they were in his "sallet days," were tinged by the traditions of the Venice where his fathers had dwelt, and the other Italian republics; while the far East, the cradle of his race, opened to his vivid imagination scenes of mysterious beauty and strange magnificence. He believed, as he appears to believe now, that the Jewish people have a great future, in which all their sufferings and degradation shall be more than compensated, and that, not as the conquering opponents, but as the leaders of Christianity. He did not and will not accept the phrase "converted Jew," but speaks of one who has accepted Christianity as a "completed Jew," Christianity being the divinely appointed development of the Judaism of the patriarchs.

FIRST APPEARANCE AS AN AUTHOR.

Soon after he had attained his twentieth year he began to write for a London daily paper, The Representative, started in January 1826, in the Tory interest. The journal lasted only about six months, and entailed a heavy loss on its too enterprising proprietor, who appears to have desired to establish a rival to the Times. It is impossible now to identify the contributions of Mr. Disraeli; but the general character of the paper was crude and juvenile, and it is not worth while to endeavour to rescue the articles from obscurity. He had previously visited Germany, and results of his observations appear in some portions of the novel he was shaping in his mind, and which was given to the world in 1828. "Vivian Grey" at once achieved popularity. It was very clever, very ambitious, and very personal. That the writer indulged in an imaginary autobiography is tolerably clear. The hero, the son of an eminent author, devoted to books and utterly indifferent to politics and newspapers, might as well have been named Benjamin Disraeli as Vivian Grey, for the external identity was so far complete. How far the two coincided in views of political morality we cannot venture to define. But a brilliant audacity stretched far beyond, and sketched political influence and social honours which the author appeared to consider not only as probable, but certain. One of the characters bears a title which had then no existence, but which, nearly fifty years afterwards, became a reality—the Earl of Beaconsfield, the selected title of the statesman who had risen to be Prime Minister of England, but who when he first invented it was an almost unknown young author looking for a publisher.

That a new writer of singular power, possessing a fresh style and a mingling of imagination, art, and audacity, had appeared in the literary arena was evident. The originals of his sketches of political notabilities were at once recognized, and the clever touches of caricature were highly appreciated. Higher literary qualities were exhibited. One critic ventured on a high eulogium,—“These volumes abound with passages not surpassed for their beauty in our literature. Delicacy and sweetness are mingled with impressive eloquence and energetic truth.”

Two years before the appearance of "Vivian Grey," another young author of genius, destined afterwards to be the political associate of Disraeli, Edward Lytton Bulwer, had produced a sensation by the publication of "Pelham, or the Adventures of a Gentleman." Disraeli sent him a copy of "Vivian," and in return received an invitation to dinner. The meeting led to a firm friendship, and it is worthy of note that a third guest at the table (there were but four) was a young man who appeared to be shy and sensitive, and spoke but little, exhibiting, however, remarkable intelligence. He was a young barrister named Cockburn, who afterwards became Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, and the most famous judge of modern times.

EASTERN TRAVEL.

On the following day Mr. Disraeli started on a visit to the Continent and the East, which occupied two years. Germany, Switzerland, Spain, Turkey, and Syria were included in the tour, and the various places visited and the historical associations would naturally greatly excite his youthful imagination, and influence his mind. In nearly all his later works this influence is apparent; and his wanderings in Palestine especially deeply impressed him with a conviction of the great part which the Jewish race had sustained and were destined to sustain in the history of the world. His pen was not idle, and while travelling he produced two other novels, "Contarini Fleming" and "The Young Duke." In the former there is again a reflex of the author in the hero, but so surrounded by an atmosphere of mysticism, religious enthusiasm, and animal magnetism, that the image is comparatively indistinct. The style is witty and epigrammatic in parts, but in others rhetorically grandiose and vague. There are picturesque descriptions of scenery and striking sketches of character, and altogether the book exhibited a wider range of imagination than did the preceding novel. The author, in the opening chapter, says he intended the book to be "all truth." "The passion, the thought, the action, and even the style, should spring from my own experience of feeling, from the meditations of my own intellect, from my own observation of incident, from my own study of the genius of expression." There are political reflections and suggestions which are crude enough. As an instance, he says, "I wish that the world consisted of a cluster of small states. There would be much more genius, and what is of more importance, much more felicity. Federal unions would preserve us from the evil consequences of local jealousy, and might combine in some general legislation of universal benefit. Italy might then revive, and even England may regret that she has lost her Heptarchy." This reads like an extract from an essay by a very clever but inexperienced schoolboy; and probably the author smiled at it in later times, although in the preface to a new edition published many years afterwards, he said that, though the book was written in his youth, it had obtained, after a careful critical examination, the approbation of his maturity. He meant, perhaps, the work as a whole, not every expression of opinion contained in it. "The Young Duke" was a novel of fashionable life, which did not make much impression.

He returned to England at the time when the Reform agitation was in full vigour. At first national politics appeared to have little attractions for the young author, who was welcomed into literary society, and became a prominent figure in the saloons, where the impulsive and clever youths who wished to remodel society on a picturesque, historical, and literary basis assembled. At the famous Gore House evenings, where the fascinating Countess of Blessington and the dandy of dandies Count D'Orsay held open house for literary, artistic, and political notabilities, Mr. Disraeli was a frequent visitor—not a great talker, but reserved and taciturn. He dressed elaborately, and as he supposed picturesquely; and the velvet dress coat, the gorgeous waistcoat, and profusion of chains and jewellery would have attracted attention, even if the pale face, the lustrous eyes, and profusion of black ringlets could have escaped observation. His friendship with Bulwer continued; and Bulwer was already interested in politics. A great political revolution was at hand, men's minds were greatly excited, and Disraeli saw that the House of Commons might open a career to a talented and ambitious young man. When he wrote for The Representative, he advocated the highest and driest Toryism; but he had seen much of the world since then, and adopted a vague Radicalism, in which he found scope for his imagination and taste for theorizing. He began to regard Parliamentary life as a profession worthy of his abilities, and circumstances appeared to favour the probability of his entering the House of Commons.

SOCIAL POSITION.

It may be as well to correct, at once, a somewhat prevalent mistake regarding Mr. Disraeli's early career. It has been very generally believed that he began life in a very humble position, and struggled with poverty until his abilities were recognized. The "stool in the solicitor's office" has been frequently mentioned as an antithesis to the seat on the Treasury Bench; and the fact is overlooked that the Disraeli family were in comfortable, indeed almost opulent circumstances, and that from boyhood Benjamin Disraeli enjoyed a good social position. He had received a liberal education, and although he had not studied at either of the great Universities, he was probably quite able to hold his own in scholarship against many who had taken their degrees. His father, Isaac Disraeli, a man of quiet, inexpensive habits, had inherited property, and made money by his books; and when his son returned from eastern travel (which could not have been undertaken if pecuniary means had been limited), had settled down at Bradenham, Buckinghamshire, in the manor-house, which had many historical associations.

Bradenham House is about four miles from High Wycombe, on the road to Prince's Risborough. The mansion was large, with gardens of great beauty, and not adapted for occupation by a man of very limited means. Bradenham Manor had belonged in the early part of the thirteenth century to the Earls of Warwick, and in 1242, Ela, widow of Thomas, Earl of Warwick, and daughter of William Longsword Earl of Salisbury, had it assigned to her for her dower. Twenty years afterwards it came into the possession of Robert de Bradenham, who gave name to the manor and village. In the sixteenth century the manor was the property of Sir Andrew Windsor, who, in 1529, was created by Henry VIII. Lord Windsor, of Bradenham. A later Lord Windsor entertained Queen Elizabeth in the manor-house in 1566; and in the antique little church in a vault under the "patron's chancel," is the heart of this Lord Edward, who died at Spa, in Germany, in 1574, one of his last wishes being that, while his body was laid at Liège, his heart should rest at home. A century later Bradenham was the residence of Sir Edmund Pye, who was voted by Parliament a delinquent and fined about £3,000 for having quitted the house and taken up his abode in the King's quarter. In the eighteenth century some of the Wentworth family lived at Bradenham, which has thus a remote association with the family of the wife of Lord Byron.

ATTEMPTS TO ENTER PARLIAMENT.

Mr. Isaac Disraeli, the occupier of this historic manor house, was therefore entitled to take rank with the local gentry, a matter to which, probably, buried in his library, he was profoundly indifferent. His ambitious and more practical son, however, saw in his father's position a stepping stone to the House of Commons. The borough of High Wycombe was only four miles off, and a vacancy occurring in the representation, Mr. Benjamin Disraeli turned his eyes in that direction. Unknown as he was, however, as a politician, he thought it advisable to obtain an introduction to the constituency by the assistance of some prominent politician, and Mr. Hume was applied to by Bulwer, a friend of both parties. Afterwards, the matter for an acrimonious newspaper controversy arose from the disputed fact whether Mr. Disraeli personally solicited Mr. Hume's aid. He denied that he had done so, but Mr. Hume asserted that he had a distinct remembrance of an interview at his residence in Bryanstone Square, at which Mr. Disraeli explained his views and asked for his support. However that may be, Mr. Hume wrote, on the 2nd of June, 1832, to Mr. Disraeli, expressing a hope that "the reformers will rally round you, who entertain Liberal opinions in every branch of government, and are prepared to pledge yourself to support reform and economy in every department as far as the same can be effected consistent with the best interests of the country. I shall be rejoiced to see you in the new Parliament, in the confidence that you will redeem your pledges, and give satisfaction to your constituents; if they will place you there."

Mr. O'Connell was also asked by Mr. Bulwer to exercise any influence he might possess in favour of the candidate for Wycombe. He returned an answer similar in tone to that of Mr. Hume. This is worth noting, because a year or two afterwards the great Irish orator made statements on the subject which Mr. Disraeli flatly contradicted, and which led to very bitter personal and newspaper disputes. In a speech at Dublin, in May 1835, Mr. O'Connell asserted that Mr. Disraeli "got an introduction to me, and wrote me a letter, stating that as I was a Radical Reformer, and as he was also a Radical, and was going to stand upon the Radical interest for the borough of Wycombe, where he said there were many persons of that way of thinking, who would be influenced by my opinion, he would feel obliged by receiving a letter from me recommending him as a Radical. His letter to me was so distinct upon the subject, that I immediately complied with the request, and composed as good an epistle as I could in his behalf. Mr. Disraeli thought this letter so valuable that he not only took the autograph, but had it printed and placarded. It was, in fact, the ground upon which he canvassed the borough."

Mr. Disraeli, in a letter to the Times, describes the statement as "an unadulterated falsehood," and continues, "I did not require Mr. O'Connell's recommendation, nor that of any one else, for the borough, the suffrages of whose electors I had the honour to solicit. My family resided in the neighbourhood, I stood alike on local influences and distinctly avowed principles, and I opposed the son of the Prime Minister [Colonel Grey]. Opposition to the Whigs, at all hazards, and the necessity of the Tories placing themselves at the head of the nation, were the two texts on which I preached, and to which I ever recurred." He received support both from Tories and Radicals, who united to oppose the Whigs, but he was defeated.

Another chance of entering Parliament presented itself, and Mr. Disraeli appeared as a candidate for the representation of the newly-created metropolitan borough Marylebone. In his address to the electors, dated "Bradenham House, Bucks, April 9th, 1833," he avowed himself a supporter of triennial Parliaments and vote by ballot—the advocates of which were then looked upon as very advanced Radicals, if not indeed Revolutionists; the abolition of the "taxes on knowledge," and a revision of the entire system of taxation, especially pledging himself to exert all his energies to obtain the repeal of assessed taxes—certainly a very original and bold conception. He said: "Although supported by neither of the aristocratic parties, I appeal to you with confidence as an independent member of society, who has no interest, either direct or indirect, in corruption or misgovernment, as one of a family untainted by the receipt of public money, and which can prefer no claims to public consideration but those that are founded on public sympathy. I claim your support as a man who has already fought the battle of the people, and as one who believes that the only foundation on which a beneficent and vigorous government can now be raised is an unlimited confidence in the genius of the British nation."

MORE LITERARY WORK.

Marylebone declined to accept his services, and he returned for a time to literature. An imaginative and exciting Oriental tale, in which romance reaches the verge of extravagance—"The Wondrous Tale of Alroy," the scene of which is laid in Syria in the twelfth century, and the hero of which (David Alroy, a Jewish leader), designated "The Prince of the Captivity," is supposed by his followers to be a descendant of David, king of Israel; and another high-flown production, "The Risk of Iskander," appeared and excited considerable criticism, not unmingled with some ridicule. He had previously produced a satirical burlesque in the style of Swift, "The Voyage of Captain Popanilla." In 1834 appeared "The Revolutionary Epick, a Poem," in quarto, the idea of which, he records, "flashed across my mind like the lightning that was then playing over Ida," as he stood on the plains of Troy. It was intended to represent, in heroic verse, "the spirit of my time." "Standing," he says, "upon Asia, and gazing upon Europe, with the broad Hellespont alone between us, and the shadow of night descending on the mountains, the mighty continents appeared to me, as it were, the Rival Principles of Government that at present contended for the mastery of the world. 'What!' I exclaimed, 'is the Revolution of France a less important event than the siege of Troy? Napoleon a less interesting character than Achilles? For me remains the Revolutionary Epick.'" The ambitious attempt to add another to the small number of immortal poems was not successful. Only the first part appeared, and the publisher's report of its reception by the public did not encourage the completion of the design. The author had said in his preface: "The public will decide whether this work is to be continued or completed; and if it goes in the negative, I shall, without a pang, hand my lyre to Limbo." It is to be presumed that he did so accordingly.

On the 16th of December, 1834, he made a long speech in the Town Hall, High Wycombe, afterwards published with the title "The Crisis Examined," in which he described Lord John Russell as "one who, on the same principle that bad wine produces good vinegar, has somehow turned from a tenth-rate author into a first-rate politician;" and Lord Palmerston as "the child of corruption, born in Downing Street, a second-rate official for twenty years under a succession of Tory Governments, but a Secretary of State under the Whigs." This was sufficiently bold for a young man; but audacity was always a characteristic of his mind, and the personal attacks were certainly not more audacious than the defence of political inconsistency contained in the same speech. It was a political programme which startled old-fashioned thinkers, but which is a key to much of the speaker's later public life, and, indeed, includes enough of truth to make it worthy quotation:—"A statesman is the creature of his age, the child of circumstances, the creation of his times. A statesman is essentially a practical character; and when he is called upon to take office, he is not to inquire what his opinions might or not might not have been upon this or that subject—he is only to ascertain the needful and the beneficent, and the most feasible manner in which affairs are to be carried on. The fact is, the conduct and opinions of public men, at different periods of their career, must not be too curiously contrasted in a free and aspiring country. The people have their passions, and it is ever the duty of public men occasionally to adopt sentiments with which they do not sympathise, because the people must have leaders. Thus the opinions and the prejudices of the community must necessarily influence a rising statesman. I say nothing of the weight which great establishments and corporations, and the necessity of their support and patronage, must also possess with an ambitious politician. All this, however, produces alternate benefit; and these influences tend to form that eminently practical character for which our countrymen are celebrated. I laugh, therefore, at the objection against a man that at a former period of his career he advocated a policy different to his present one; all I seek to ascertain is, whether his present policy be just, necessary, expedient; whether he is at the present moment prepared to serve his country according to its present necessities." In later times, the speaker forgot to test Sir Robert Peel's repeal of the Corn Laws by this philosophy. Humorous personalities and smart epigrammatic phrases abounded in this speech, in which he compared the late Premier, Lord Melbourne, to Ducrow the equestrian, who (the speaker imagined), having announced that he would ride on six horses, found that one after another the noble animals had been attacked with the staggers, and he was compelled to substitute six donkeys:—"Puffing, panting, and perspiring, he pats one sullen brute, thwacks another, and curses a fourth, while one brays to the audience and another rolls in the saw-dust. Behold the late Prime Minister and the Reform Ministry!"

QT ABREL WITH O'CONNELL.

Certainly Mr. Disraeli had little right to complain if others launched personalities at him, for he had audaciously challenged all comers; and before long he had to endure an almost unexampled attack from the greatest living master of vituperation, Daniel O'Connell. When Lord Melbourne had formed his second administration, in April 1835, the appointment of Mr.

Labouchere to the office of Master of the Mint made a vacancy in the representation of Taunton, and Mr. Disraeli offered himself as a candidate in the Tory interest. When he addressed the electors he had to face some close questioning from the sturdy west-country electors. He was called "the Marylebone Radical," and he calmly answered, "If there is anything on which I figure myself, it is my consistency." "Didn't you write a novel?" asked one of the constituency, who appeared to consider the production of a work of imagination as a very terrible matter. "I hope," replied the candidate, "there is no disgrace in having written that which has been read by hundreds of thousands of my fellow-countrymen, and which has been translated into every European language. I trust that one who is an author by the gift of nature may be as good a man as one who is Master of the Mint by the gift of Lord Melbourne." But the great feature of this election speech was an attack on O'Connell, whom he denounced as a traitor. "I look upon the Whigs as a weak but ambitious party, who can only obtain power by linking themselves to a traitor." A few days afterwards, O'Connell addressed a meeting of the Franchise Association in Dublin, and he fired broadside after broadside at his daring assailant. Never, perhaps, was there such an adept at half-humorous, half-savage invective as the great Dan, who had appalled even the most foul-mouthed and vociferous of Dublin fishwives by calling her an "isosceles triangle," and making mysterious references to a "parallelopiped." That a young, inexperienced, romantic novelist, of Jewish race, should have had the temerity to attack him was ample reason why the Liberator should pour out the vials of his wrath. "He calls me a traitor," shouted the deep-voiced O'Connell, his huge frame shaking with the mingled emotions of anger and humour. "My answer to that is—he is a liar. He is a liar in action and words. His life is a living lie! He is a disgrace to his species! What state of society must that be that could tolerate such a creature, having the audacity to come forward with one set of principles at one time, and obtain political assistance by reason of those principles, and at another to profess diametrically the reverse! He is the most degraded of his species and kind; and England is degraded in tolerating or having upon the face of her society a miscreant of his abominable, foul, and atrocious nature. . . . It will not be supposed that when I speak of Mr. Disraeli as the descendant of a Jew that I mean to tarnish him on that account. The Jews were once the chosen people. There were miscreants among them, however, also, and it must certainly be from one of those that Disraeli is descended. He possesses just the qualities of the impenitent thief, whose name, I verily believe, must have been Disraeli. For aught I know the present Disraeli is descended from him, and with the impression that he is, I now forgive the heir-at-law of the blasphemous thief who died on the cross."

Those were days in which many political speakers and writers of ability appeared to forget that it was advisable to speak and write as gentlemen. The writers in Blackwood were as prone to call names and indulge in personalities as was Cobbett when grilling his opponents on his famous gridiron, The Register. Newspaper correspondents abused one another in the style of the Age or Satirist, and editors were willing enough to let the disputants throw as much mud as they chose. Sometimes the strong language led to duels at Wimbledon or Chalk Farm; sometimes able editors were waited on by stalwart persons armed with horsewhips. Disraeli, free as he had been in applying epithets, winced under the lash so vigorously wielded at Dublin. The "impenitent thief" taunt went home. He was proud of his Jewish descent, of the sacredness, high gifts, and high destiny of his race, and O'Connell had hit the tenderest part of his sensitive nature. He wrote a long letter to his assailant, beginning: "Mr. O'Connell,—Although you have long placed yourself out of the pale of civilisation, still I am one who will not be insulted, even by a Yahoo, without chastising it." The letter ended with the words, "I expect to be a representative of the people before the repeal of the Union. We shall meet at Philippi; and rest assured that, confident in a good cause, and in some energies which have not been altogether unimproved, I will seize the first opportunity of inflicting upon you a castigation which will make you at the same time remember and repent the insults that you have lavished upon Benjamin Disraeli."

Duelling had not yet gone out of fashion, and Mr. Disraeli would have eagerly availed himself of the opportunity of challenging his renowned opponent. But Mr. O'Connell having killed young D'Esterre, had made a vow that he would never again give or accept a challenge, and Mr. Disraeli therefore called upon the Liberator's son, Mr. Morgan O'Connell, to undertake the vicarious duty of yielding satisfaction for the insults his father had lavished; and the responsibility being declined, Mr. Disraeli forwarded a second letter, in which he said, "I shall take every opportunity of holding your father's name up to public contempt; and I fervently pray that you, or some one of his blood, may attempt to avenge the inextinguishable hatred with which I shall pursue his existence."

So the dispute ended for a time, and the war of words, discreditable enough, was better than "pistols for two," and a possible coroner's inquest. A defeat at Taunton was the result of the electioneering efforts; and perhaps the unsuccessful candidate consoled himself with the reflection that the Parliamentary world was not yet prepared for his appearance.

POLITICS AND NOVELS.

In the same year appeared a political treatise, "Vindication of the English Constitution, a Letter to a Noble and Learned Lord [Lyndhurst], by Disraeli the younger." The gist of the book is that the Whigs had succeeded in the reign of George I. in reducing the English monarch to the condition of a Venetian Doge; that the Tory parties really represented the democratic instincts of the majority of the English nation, and that one of the greatest if the most misunderstood of political philosophers was St. John, Lord Bolingbroke. The Globe newspaper was at that time a leading organ of the Whig party, and with it Mr. Disraeli contrived to get up a petty quarrel, embellished with personalities in the fashion of the day; and very soon afterwards the first of a series of letters signed "Runnymede" appeared in the Times. The famous letters of Junius, in the last century, had been the model for many imitators, but none of them brought so much literary ability to the work as Mr. Disraeli did in these letters by "Runnymede." If good taste and sound judgment had been equally conspicuous, the letters would have been more worthy of the writer's talents. There was fulsome compliment of Sir Robert Peel (afterwards to be so mercilessly vituperated), of his "splendid talents and spotless character," and plenty of abuse of Lord John Russell, Lord Palmerston, Lord William Bentinck, Lord Lansdowne, and other leading Whigs. The letters were collected into a volume, with, as an appendix, a treatise on "The Spirit of Whigism," and dedicated to Sir Robert Peel.

Laying aside, if not forgetting, politics for a brief space, Mr. Disraeli produced a very pleasing novel, "Henrietta Temple," in which the sympathetic and sentimental elements of his complex nature were exhibited. It was high-flown in style, but altogether a capital love-story, and speedily became a favourite with readers of novels. After the tremendous epithets in the correspondence with O'Connell and the "Runnymede" letters, it was pleasant to turn to such dainty namby-pambyism as "Exquisite, enchanting, adored being! without thee what is existence? how dull, how blank, does everything now seem! it is as if the sun had just set—oh, that form! that radiant countenance! that musical and thrilling voice!" A few months afterwards appeared another novel, "Venetia," for two principal characters in which Byron and Shelley were taken as models. It was rather awkward that a cruel critic discovered that the greater part of one chapter of the book, in which Lord Cadurcis (Byron) is described, was plagiarized, with scarcely a word altered, from Macaulay's review of Moore's "Life of Byron," in the Edinburgh Review for 1831.

MEMBER FOR MAIDSTONE; A FAILURE AND A PROPHECY.

These books were still fresh in the memory of novel readers when William IV. died, in June 1837; and a general election was the necessary result. Then came the opportunity so long waited for. Mr. Disraeli contested Maidstone and was successful, defeating Colonel Thompson, the Radical candidate. The colleague of Mr. Disraeli was another Tory, Mr. Wyndham Lewis, of Hughenden Manor, Bucks, respecting whom something will be said hereafter. On the 20th of November the youthful Queen delivered her first speech to the assembled Parliament; and among the members of the House of Commons who listened at the bar was Benjamin Disraeli, now, in the thirty-second year of his age, after five years' striving, a member of the House of Commons. In little more than a fortnight afterwards (December 7) his voice was heard. The subject was a motion by Mr. Smith O'Brien for a select committee to inquire into the allegations contained in a petition he had presented, respecting subscriptions which had been received to encourage the presentation of petitions against Irish members. In this, his maiden speech, Mr. Disraeli, true to the spirit of his promise made two years before, began by an attack on O'Connell, who had just answered Sir Francis Burdett, in a debate arising out of the Irish Election petition. O'Connell had scarcely sat down when "a singular figure, looking pale as death, with eyes fixed on the ground, and ringlets clustering round his brow, asked the indulgence which was usually granted to those who spoke for the first time." The speaker defended a fund which had been raised for electioneering purposes in Ireland, and said, "The object of the subscription entered into was to procure justice for the Protestant constituencies and the Protestant proprietors of Ireland, these constituencies and these proprietors being unable to obtain justice single-handed." Having had a fling at the "rhetorical medley" of Mr. O'Connell's speech, Mr. Disraeli proceeded to deliver a speech which he had carefully prepared, but which the House was not at all disposed to listen to. His reputation as a romancer, clever but flashy, had preceded him, and members were prepared to laugh at rather than listen to the author of "Alroy" and "Contarini Fleming." Murmurs, laughter, and cries of "Question," interrupted him. He was irritated and confused. "If," he exclaimed, "honourable gentlemen think this is fair, I will submit. I would not do it to others, that is all." Then he attempted to deliver the peroration he had prepared:—

"When the House remembers that, in spite of the support of the hon. and learned Member for Dublin and his well-disciplined band of patriots, there was a little shyness exhibited by former supporters of Her Majesty's Government—when they recollect the 'new loves' and the 'old loves' in which so much of passion and recrimination was mixed up, between the noble Tityrus of the Treasury Bench and the learned Daphne of Liskeard (Mr. Charles Buller), notwithstanding the amantium ira has resulted, as I had always expected, in the amoris integratio, notwithstanding that political duel has been fought, in which more than one shot was interchanged, but in which recourse was had to the scene of arbitration of blank cartridges—-notwithstanding emancipated Ireland and enslaved England, the noble Lord might wave in one hand the keys of St. Peter, and in the other"—[the shouts that followed drowned the conclusion of the sentence]. "Now, Mr. Speaker, see the philosophical prejudice of man. I would certainly gladly hear a cheer, even though it came from the lips of a political opponent. I am not at all surprised at the reception which I have experienced. I have begun several times many things, and I have often succeeded at last. I will sit down now, but the time will come when you will hear me."

Hansard's reporter says, "The impatience of the House would not allow the hon. member to finish his speech, and during the greater part of the time the hon. member was on his legs, he was so much interrupted that it was impossible to hear what the hon. member said." The Times, however, in a leader on the following morning, made a little compensation by describing the effort as "an eloquent speech."

Mr. Disraeli, although he refrained for some time from addressing the House at length, was not extinguished. He was far too courageous and determined to be a "single-speech Disraeli." A week afterwards he spoke briefly, but effectively, in support of Sergeant Talfourd's Bill to amend the law of copyright, to which, he said, "I have been requested to give my support by some of the most eminent literary characters." On the 15th of March, 1838, he made a short speech in opposition to Mr. Villiers's motion for repealing the Corn Laws; and on the 1st of June, when Lord John Russell moved that the House should resolve itself into a committee on the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill, he spoke for a few minutes, and gave utterance to a phrase which seems to embody a policy:—"There is only one principle for the government of such a country as Ireland, and that is the principle of centralization; and for this reason, if for no other, it is that we delegate power from England to Ireland, because it is the only authority which can be trusted to exercise that power without passion." The House soon forgot the unfortunate début, and listened with attention to his more modest utterances.

MARRIAGE AND GOOD FORTUNE.

The year 1839 was marked by an interesting incident in his private life. His colleague in the representation of Maidstone, Mr. Lewis, had died, and his widow became the wife of Mr. Disraeli. By this marriage he became the owner of Hughenden Manor, and was raised to affluence, no unimportant aid to such a career as his talents and ambition pointed to. At a later period, a lady who had never even seen him, but who admired his political career, left him by her will £60,000. The political situation was serious, if not alarming. The Chartists had gained strength, there had been outbreaks, and on the 14th of June Mr. L. Attwood, the member for Birmingham, had presented a monster petition to Parliament. The Ministry, supported by the greater number of the Tory Opposition, were prepared to adopt measures to protect the country from the effect of political disturbances. Mr. Disraeli opposed them, not apparently because he thought the Chartists were right, but because the Ministers, being Whigs, must be wrong. He said the people had grievances, and redress, not repression, "should be the course of action. He spoke against the increase of the police and the county constabulary; and Mr. Fox Maule, the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, accused him of being the advocate of riot and confusion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Spring Rice) reproached him with opposing for party purpose measures introduced for the immediate protection of life and property. Mr. Disraeli replied with a shower of smart personalities. Under-Secretaries, he said, were coarse and ill-bred, and it would be difficult to tell "how Mr. Spring Rice became Chancellor of the Exchequer, and how the Government to which he belonged became a Government; like flies in amber, one wondered 'how the devil they got there.'" When it was moved that the petition should be taken into consideration, he declared that the Charter was owing to the Reform Bill. He expressed strong disapproval of the Charter as a remedy for the ills of which the petitioners complained, but spoke of the Chartists themselves generously, almost kindly. He insisted that the new Poor Laws and other legislation promoted by a middle-class Government had abrogated the civil rights of the people, and pronounced his conviction that the rights of labour were as sacred as those of property. Sooner or later, he said, whether the Whigs desired it or not, the working classes would demand, and obtain too, a larger share than they then had in the management of the affairs of the country.

Before the session closed, Mr. Disraeli took occasion to explain his views as to the causes which had produced Chartism. It must be admitted that his opinions on the subject partook of the fossil character dear to Tories of the old type, but scarcely to have been expected from the brilliant member for Maidstone. The changes in parochial jurisdiction, the establishment of the police force, alterations in the old local administration of justice, and destruction of venerable corporations were the real causes of the Chartist outbreaks, and for all these the Whigs were answerable. As to the British Constitution, it was a system under which "the Sovereign could do no wrong and the Government no right." He was especially a strong opponent of the Poor Law system as recently established, speaking earnestly and generously on behalf of the poor; and when in 1841 the Poor Law Commission Bill was carried by a large majority, he voted against it, though in doing so he opposed his nominal leader Sir Robert Peel, as he did on several other subjects.

In the same session he opposed an Education

Bill brought in by Lord John Russell. His speech was lengthy, and in it he asserted that the great object which every statesman ought to have in view was to encourage the habit of self-government among the people. State education was only found in paternal governments, of which Persia and China were the models. "It has been discovered that the best way to ensure implicit obedience is to commence tyranny in the nursery."

In the autumn of 1839 he published a tragedy, "Count Alarcos," founded on an old Spanish ballad. In the preface he said, "Years have flown away since, rambling in the sierras of Andalusia, beneath the clear light of a Spanish moon, and freshened by the sea breezes that had wandered up a river from the coast, I first listened to the chant of that terrible tale. It seemed to me rife with all the materials of a tragic drama; and I planned as I rode along the scenes and characters of which it appeared to me susceptible." The story is painful and even revolting, and the author of the tragedy failed to make it attractive by any great display of poetic or dramatic power. A few years since it was produced on the stage at Astley's Theatre, but met with scant favour.

THE "YOUNG ENGLAND" PARTY.

About this time several generously-minded and hopeful young men of talent, belonging to the Tory party, came before the public as advocates by speech and writings of the benefits which they believed would accrue if a better understanding between the upper and lower classes of society could be arrived at. Intensely aristocratic, they believed that the aristocracy were the natural leaders of the people in the work of mental and moral development and the cultivation of intellectual tastes and pure manners, and that the doctrines of political economy, and the growing dependence on material wealth, lowered the national character. To these young men the name of "the Young England party" was given. Prominent among them were Lord John Manners, Mr. Smythe and Lord Winchelsea, and the adherence of Mr. Disraeli was eagerly welcomed, although he could not claim aristocratic descent. They were a little quixotic and a little priggish in their endeavours to revive a sort of picturesque feudalism, and perhaps the famous Eglintoun Tournament of 1839 was not unconnected with the movement. There was abundance of ridicule showered on the young men, but they bore up against it gallantly. One unfortunate couplet, in a poem by Lord John Manners, was quoted everywhere, and is still remembered,—

"Let wealth and commerce, laws and learning die, But give us back our old nobility."

The novel "Coningsby, or the New Generation," published in 1844, was the outcome of this movement, and bore besides evident traces of a careful perusal of Carlyle's remarkable work "Past and Present." The hero was an obvious embodiment of the characteristics of the leaders of the Young England party; politicians and authors were introduced under the thinnest possible veils; and a marvellous Jewish merchant, Sidonia, of unlimited wealth, magnificent tastes, and immense influence, afforded opportunities for gorgeous writing of an Oriental flavour. The book achieved an enormous popularity, was of course vigorously criticised, and a parody by Thackeray, it would seem, was peculiarly objectionable to the author, whose character "St. Barbe," in his latest novel, is, almost beyond question, intended as a caricature of the great snob-killer.

PARLIAMENTARY WORK.

There had been changes in the Melbourne Ministry, but it was not strengthened; and in May 1841, Sir Robert Peel having carried a vote of want of confidence, the Ministers decided to appeal to the country. Mr. Disraeli spoke eloquently in favour of the motion, beginning with a high eulogium of Sir Robert Peel,—“He has never employed his influence for factious purposes, and has never been stimulated in his exertions by a disordered desire of obtaining office; above all, he has never carried himself to the opposite benches by making propositions by which he was not ready to abide.”

The general election resulted in a defeat of the Ministry, as shown by the division on the Address. Mr. Disraeli, no longer member for Maidstone, but for Shrewsbury, seems to have expected that Sir Robert Peel, who headed the new Ministry, would have offered him office; but he was disappointed. It was rumoured that he had made a direct application, and that rumour he took care to contradict. He voted in support of Sir Robert's sliding scale of duties on corn, brought forward in February. During the first two years he gave a general support to Sir Robert Peel, but rarely spoke; and in some cases where he could not conscientiously follow his leader, he abstained from voting; but afterwards, especially in respect to the sugar duties, opposed the ministerial proposition. As yet there was no open political opposition. He had begun to dislike Peel, but he was loyal to his party, and when he could not support the Minister he generally absented himself from division. Every motion, by whomsoever made, which had for its object the bettering the condition of the working classes, had his support. He sided with Lord Ashley in his endeavour to protect the factory children; and it was noticed that he systematically abstained from touching questions which affected the Church either in England or Ireland.

In March, 1842, he brought forward a motion for uniting the consular and diplomatic establishments, in the course of which he vigorously attacked Lord Palmerston, the late Foreign Secretary, who had, he said, filled up the consular offices with broken-down political partisans, and some of his own relatives. Sir Robert Peel opposed the motion, and after other speeches, Lord Palmerston rose. Witty, experienced, cool, and audacious, he was quite a match for his opponent. He jocularly alluded to the profound study of the London Gazette made by the honourable member for Shrewsbury,—“but the study of gazettes could not be very profitable for enlarging the mind and improving the understanding.” Mr. Disraeli was ill-informed or unfair in his statements, and he had drawn into the discussion men who had no connection with the party conflicts within the walls of the House of Commons, and who were most sensitive about their characters, and such conduct, he thought, “was not very generous, and not very becoming in any gentleman.” “I would say to the honourable member, that in future I beg he will turn his steel upon me. Here am I who did it. Let him attack me as much as he pleases.” The motion was not pressed to a division. Henceforth, and until Sir Robert Peel presented a more congenial mark for attack, Mr. Disraeli's dislike of Palmerston found continual opportunities of expression.

The famous tariff propositions of Sir Robert Peel in 1842 were supported by Mr. Disraeli; but in the session of 1843 he openly broke with his leader, and soon after became his resolute personal assailant. He was now recognized as a power in the House, and his speeches were looked forward to and listened to attentively. Peel was becoming more and more a Free Trader; the young Tories more and more Protectionists. On the 16th of February, 1844, Mr. Disraeli made a speech on the condition of Ireland, in the course of which he said, “You have a starving population, an absentee aristocracy, and an alien Church; and, in addition, the weakest executive in the world. That is the Irish Question.”

ATTACKS ON SIR ROBERT PEELE.

In 1846 the rupture in the Tory party was complete. Immediately on the opening of the Session, Sir Robert Peel proposed the entire abolition, after two years, of the duties on imported grain. The motion was carried, and the Peel Ministry resigned. A new and small, but very able, party, the Peelites, was formed; and the Tories proper, the Protectionists, chose for their leader Lord George Bentinck, member for King's Lynn, a man of great determination of character and considerable ability, but who had been previously better known in connection with horse-racing than with politics. The Young Englanders threw themselves with ardour into the fray, and Disraeli occupied the foremost rank. Then began the attacks on Sir Robert Peel, the invectives and epigrams, from which the sensitive nature of the great statesman recoiled. He could not return vituperation as O'Connell could; he had not the good-humoured pugnacity of Palmerston, who alike took and gave hard knocks as if he enjoyed them. Speaking on the 15th of May, in opposition to Sir Robert's propositions, Mr. Disraeli said, “When I examine the career of this Minister, which has now filled a great space in the Parliamentary history of the country, I find that for between thirty and forty years that right honourable gentleman has traded on the ideas and intelligence of others. His life has been one great appropriation clause. He is a burglar of others' intellect. I have that confidence in the common sense, I will say the common spirit, of our countrymen, that I believe they will not long endure this huckstering tyranny of the Treasury Bench—those political pedlars that bought their party in the cheapest market, and sold us in the dearest.” The last phrase was, of course, a parody of the Free Trade formula, which Peel had adopted. On another occasion Mr. Disraeli said Sir Robert had “caught the Whigs bathing, and stolen their clothes.”

We do not desire to dwell on these incidents in Mr. Disraeli's Parliamentary career. His power in debate strengthened, and he became more necessary to his party. When Lord George Bentinck died suddenly in 1848, no other but Disraeli could claim to lead the Opposition. In the preceding year he had been returned for Buckinghamshire, and he continued to represent the county with which he had so many personal associations until he was raised to the Peerage.

Isaac Disraeli lived nearly long enough to see his son the leader of a great party and a power in the House of Commons. The venerable author of the "Curiosities of Literature" died on the 19th of January, 1848, in his eighty-second year, having survived his wife only a few months. The Disraelis are a long-lived family. On the brow of a hill, near Hughenden Manor, is a column to the memory of Isaac Disraeli, erected by his daughter-in-law.

On the 20th of June, 1848, Mr. Hume introduced a motion affirming "that this House, as at present constituted, does not fairly represent the population, the property, or the industry of the country, whence has arisen great and increasing discontent in the minds of a large portion of the people; and it is therefore expedient, with a view to amend the national representation, that the elective franchise shall be so extended as to include all householders; that votes shall be taken by ballot; that the duration of Parliaments shall not exceed three years, and that the apportionment of Members to population shall be made more equal." In a lengthy speech Mr. Disraeli opposed the motion, insisting that the franchise was a privilege, not a right, and that, if abstract right were admitted, boys and women should be permitted to vote. He deprecated change either in the way of shortening the duration of Parliament or of voting by ballot. The proposal of electoral districts, by which representation would be in proportion to population, he warmly opposed.

In moving an amendment to the Address, on the opening of the session of 1849, Mr. Disraeli made a speech which his admirers consider to be one of his finest efforts. In the Royal speech was this sentence—"The present aspect of affairs has enabled me to make large reductions in the estimates of the year." Lord Stanley (afterwards the Earl of Derby), the leader of the Tory party, asserted in the House of Lords that the Whig Ministry had yielded to the bidding of the Peace and Free Trade party, and were compelled to do as they were ordered; and in the Commons Mr. Disraeli made a tremendous attack on the Ministry—"Her Majesty's Ministers have yielded to public opinion (the voice and clamour of organized clubs) as a tradesman does who is detected in an act of overcharge—he yields to public opinion when he takes a less sum. So the permanent affairs of this country are to be arranged not upon principles of high policy, or from any imperial considerations, but because there is an unholy pressure from a minority which demands it, and who have a confidence of success because they know that they have beaten the Prime Minister. We (the Tory party) stand here to maintain the majesty of Parliament against the Jacobin manoeuvres of Lancashire. I would sooner my tongue were palsied before I counselled the people of England to lower their tone."

Mr. Disraeli's literary reputation had in the meanwhile been enhanced by the publication of "Sybil, or the New Nation" (1845), and "Tancred, or the New Crusade" (1847), in which his peculiar political and national theories were advocated with great ability, and in a picturesque if ornate style. The former touched on Chartism, the latter indicated his views as to the destiny of the house of Israel. Shortly after the publication of "Tancred," he advocated the admission of Jews into Parliament.

ONE OF HER MAJESTY'S MINISTERS.

At last came the day of success. In 1852, Lord Derby was entrusted with the formation of a Cabinet, and Mr. Disraeli became Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had made the House of Commons listen to his speeches, and now it would listen to his expositions of financial principles. His first Budget received the support of Mr. Gladstone. It was only of a temporary character, for the Ministry awaited the result of the general election, having pledged themselves to abide by the decision of the country as to a free-trade policy. Mr. Milner Gibson endeavoured to pledge the House to a resolution in favour of a repeal of the paper duty; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer successfully opposed it, on financial grounds, without reference to the merits of the question. The result of the appeal to the country was in favour of Free Trade; and Lord Derby in the Lords, and Mr. Disraeli in the Commons, accepted the decision. Mr. Charles Villiers endeavoured to carry a resolution expressing a feeling of triumph at the submission of the Ministers, but Lord Palmerston and Mr. Gladstone generously interfered, and the sense of the House was in favour of bygones being bygones. The Budget was brought forward on the 3rd of December. The prominent features were reductions of some duties, and increase of the area of the income and house taxes. Mr. Gladstone vehemently opposed it, and the Government was defeated by a majority of 19, and consequently resigned.

Once more Mr. Disraeli was the leader on the Opposition side. We must pass over the troubled times of the Aberdeen, the Coalition, and the Palmerston administrations, of the Crimean War, the Ministerial discords, and Mr. Roebuck's Committee of Inquiry. The Conspiracy to Murder Bill was fatal to the Palmerston Ministry, and in February 1858 Lord Derby was again summoned to power, and Mr. Disraeli was again Chancellor of the Exchequer. A year afterwards he brought forward an elaborate Reform Bill, the main feature of which was to ensure a "lateral extension" of the franchise, so that the educated classes should be admitted to the suffrage without regard to property qualification. As before, he warmly opposed the principle of representation according to population. "It is notorious that, if you come to population in round numbers, 10,500,000 of the people of England return only 150 or 160 county members, while the boroughs, representing 7,500,000, return more than 330 members. Admitting, then, the principle of population, you must disfranchise your boroughs and give the members to the counties." He proposed that Lancashire and the West Riding of Yorkshire should have more members, and that some of the small boroughs then returning two each should be deprived of one. The Bill was lost, an appeal to the country was decided on, and the Ministry, being in a minority in the new Parliament, resigned.

Six more years of Opposition followed, marked by great activity, oratorical and literary, on the part of Mr. Disraeli. He opposed the Budgets of Mr. Gladstone, and his speeches were published in a book form, and he also printed his speeches in opposition to the ecclesiastical policy of the Government. In 1866 he was again in office, and having, as he audaciously remarked, "educated his party," he brought in another Reform Bill, which included household suffrage, the taking of thirty Members from small constituencies, enfranchising several towns which had risen into importance, and giving more Members to the larger counties. The Bill was carried.

"VIVIAN GREY" PRIME MINISTER.

A few months afterwards (February 1868) Lord Derby, whose health was failing, resigned, and recommended the Queen to appoint Mr. Disraeli First Lord of the Treasury. Punch had a cartoon inscribed "Vivian Grey sent for." The prize was won; Joseph was chief ruler of Egypt; or in more commonplace and historical language, Benjamin Disraeli, the daring novelist, the mystical theorist, the believer in the destiny of his race, whom twenty-two years before the House of Commons had laughed down, was Prime Minister of England. He held office only until the following December, when he resigned, and Mr. Gladstone became Premier. A peerage was offered the retiring Minister, but he declined it, accepting, however, the honour for his wife, on whom the title of Viscountess Beaconsfield was conferred.

The next five years were occupied in Parliament with fierce disputes on the subject of legislation for Ireland. Mr. Disraeli and his friends opposed Mr. Gladstone's proposition for the disestablishment of the Irish Church, but the Irish Land Bill was permitted to pass with but little opposition. He found time for literary activity, and another political novel, in which real personages appeared in very slight disguises, "Lothair," was published in 1870.

On the 24th of January, 1874, Mr. Gladstone, unable to carry his Irish Universities Bill, suddenly resolved to appeal to the verdict of the country, given at a general election. The feeling of the constituencies had changed, and the Conservatives (the name Tory was nearly forgotten now) had a majority of sixty. On the 17th of February Mr. Gladstone resigned, and Mr. Disraeli undertook the task of forming a Ministry. In his election address, the new Premier said, "I should say of the Administration of the past five years, that it would have been better for us all had there been a little more energy in our foreign policy, and a little less in our domestic legislation." In one respect, however, the energetic domestic legislation had been beneficent, for the new Ministry found themselves in possession of a surplus of nearly six millions.

RAISED TO THE PEERAGE.

In 1876 the honour of a peerage was again offered, and this time accepted by Mr. Disraeli. His wife had died, and he preserved a portion of her title in his new dignity, Earl of Beaconsfield. The leadership of the Commons was entrusted to Sir Stafford Northcote, Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl himself, as the head of the party, exhibiting his old energy and eloquence in the Lords.

We have now to record very recent events, still fresh in the memory. The surplus diminished and finally disappeared, as new expenses were incurred; there were troubles in South Africa, and a cloud in the East was casting ominous shadows. In the latter part of 1874 and the spring of 1875 insurrections in the Herzegovina and Bosnia spread rapidly; it became apparent that Turkey was in an insolvent condition; and in August a joint Note from the great European Powers was addressed to the Porte. In November Russia appeared on the scene, the ambassador of that empire at Constantinople, General Ignatieff, urging on the Sultan the necessity of administrative and financial reform.

Soon after the opening of the session of 1876, the Premier brought in the Royal Titles Bill, by which the Queen was to be enabled to add Empress of India to her other titles. This was carried, although not without considerable opposition. The Turkish difficulty increased, the Sultan was deposed, Eastern Europe was aflame with war. In the summer of the year came the news of the Bulgarian massacres, and the excitement was intense. The Premier declared that the statements were grossly exaggerated, and, with an evident fling at Mr. Gladstone, who had begun his memorable agitation on the subject, said, "The leaders of the popular feeling against Turkey themselves were worse than the authors of the massacres." There was a danger, he said, in a speech at an agricultural meeting at Aylesbury, that "designing politicians might take advantage of sublime sentiments, and apply them for the furtherance of their sinister ends." Russia interfered, and presented an ultimatum to Turkey on the last day of October; and at the Guildhall banquet on the 9th of November, the Earl of Beaconsfield made a speech which was considered as a threat to Russia, and a hint that England would defend the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. While, he said, England was desirous of peace, she was well prepared for war, and was not a country that when she enters into a campaign has to ask herself whether she can support a second or a third campaign.

Early in 1878 there were dissensions in the Cabinet. The Earl of Carnarvon and the Earl of Derby, Colonial and Foreign Secretaries, were unwilling to encounter the chance of hostilities on behalf of Turkey, and the former and shortly afterwards the latter resigned. The action of the latter was induced by the announcement of an intention to call out the reserve forces, and the sending of seven thousand native Indian troops to Malta, which was felt by many to be an unconstitutional proceeding. Shortly afterwards it became known that a secret treaty had been concluded between Great Britain and Turkey, by which a British protectorate had been established over Asia Minor, and Cyprus was ceded by the Sultan. In June the Earl of Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury, the Foreign Secretary, attended, as representatives of England, the Congress at Berlin, held for the settlement of the Eastern difficulty.

Just before the end of the session the affairs of North-Western India and Afghanistan excited attention. British troops were marched to Cabul, and the Ameer fled. Lord Beaconsfield, in another of his characteristic Guildhall utterances, said we were only establishing "a scientific frontier;" but that scientific frontier did not prevent the massacre of our English envoy, Sir Louis Cavagnari, and his suite.

Then followed the Zulu war in South Africa and other troubles. The Budget of 1879 showed an enormous deficit, and no one could say that further expenses would be incurred. The Government had rapidly accumulated unpopularity, and perhaps the final blow was given by the introduction of a Bill empowering the Government to purchase the stock of the Metropolitan Water Companies on terms which the public generally thought exorbitant. Parliament was dissolved on the 24th of March, and Lord Beaconsfield and his policy were again submitted to the verdict of the country.

OUT OF OFFICE; ANOTHER NOVEL.

That verdict was unfavourable. The tide had turned; there was a large Liberal majority, stimulated, no doubt, by the marvellous exertions of Mr. Gladstone, and towards the end of April the Premier and his colleagues resigned office. Lord Beaconsfield accepted his destiny with a smiling face, and retired, as he said, to enjoy the pleasures of the country at Hughenden. The fruit of his leisure soon appeared in the form of another political novel, "Endymion."

ILLNESS AND DEATH.

On the 19th of March, the Earl of Beaconsfield dined with the Prince of Wales at Marlborough House; and on the following day, feeling unwell, he remained at home, and sent for Dr. Kidd, his physician and old friend. A week later several of his political friends assembled in his chamber to discuss the course to be taken by the Conservative party in the approaching debate on the Transvaal question. The Earl was too unwell to take any part in the conversation, but he listened attentively; and that was the last time he could give any attention to political matters. The illness, a combination of bronchitis, asthma, and gout, increased, and although his wonderful vitality struggled long against disease and weakness, he succumbed at about four o'clock on the morning of Easter Tuesday, the 19th of April, the anniversary of the day when, in 1880, he resigned the seals of office. He died very calmly, and in full possession of his faculties. His last words were, "I am overwhelmed."

TRIBUNES OF THE PEOPLE IN OLD TIMES; THEIR DUTIES.

IN the days of ancient Rome, when the people, angry at the tyranny of the patricians, and impatient of the yoke under which they had long been compelled to bow their necks, insisted upon being represented in reality, as well as in theory, in the Senate, they chose officers who were to be invested with the duty of watching the course of government matters in the interest of their constituents the plebeians. They were invested with peculiar and wide-spreading authority. They enjoyed the immunity of the sacrosanctitas, which rendered their persons inviolable; the jus intercessionis, or right of intervention, was theirs also, by which their word had the power of forbidding or placing the "veto" on the proceedings of Consul and Prætor; and the jus precessionis gave them the power to apprehend and hold in custody any official whose actions seemed fraught with injury to the people. The middle ages and modern times have seen the appellation "tribune" assumed by men whose power and authority was especially warranted by the suffrage of the people. Thus Cola di Rienzi, in Rome in 1347, called himself "tribune of freedom, peace, and justice;" and thus in our own times the same name, tribune, has been popularly given to a member of the British House of Commons who, more than any other, has identified himself with the people's cause, and stood up for justice and right as the advocate of the toiling masses of his fellow-countrymen,—opposing persistently the selfish policy that would have taxed their food, narrowed their influence, and left them as far as possible unrepresented. The title, "the great tribune of the people," has frequently and worthily been bestowed upon Mr. Bright by those who have seen in his parliamentary career and strivings a close analogy with the exertions of those champions of the popular cause "in the brave days of old;" and hardly could an epithet have been chosen that did him greater honour. His own words, at the conclusion of a remarkable speech delivered in December 1854, in which he deprecated the Crimean war, show him as placing his chief glory in speaking out boldly what he felt convinced was the truth, irrespective of its effect upon his private interests. "I am not," he declared, "nor did I ever pretend to be, a statesman; and that character is so tainted and so equivocal in our day that I am not sure that a pure and honourable ambition would aspire to it. . . . I have not set my sails to every passing breeze. I am a plain and simple citizen, sent here by one of the foremost constituencies of the Empire, representing, feebly perhaps, but honestly I dare aver, the opinions of very many, and the true interests of all those who have sent me here." Though the speaker here disclaims the character of a statesman as that title was frequently understood a generation ago, he has on many occasions shown some of the best qualities of statesmanship; but his peculiar character has always been that of the "tribune," the champion of the people's rights, and the indefatigable watcher over the interests of the community as a whole.

OLD WAYS AND NEW WAYS; FREE TRADE AND PROTECTION.

In a parliamentary career of unusual length, it has been the fortune of Mr. Bright to see changes within the space of forty years such as centuries would hardly in earlier times have produced. When he first entered the House of Commons, railways were a new institution, and people had not long learnt to believe in the practicability of crossing the Atlantic in steamers; the Penny Post had not long been established, after having been denounced by even so enlightened a man as Sydney Smith as a wild, impracticable scheme; and the idea of a scheme of national education was considered by a great number of well-meaning people as not only impracticable, but as fraught with danger to all authority and rule. It has been Mr. Bright's lot to take a leading part in the settlement of the weightiest political questions that have arisen throughout a period of forty years,—questions of finance, popular representation, war, commerce, and education; and by one of those strange instances in which the tendency of history to repeat itself is seen, the questions to whose settlement his vigorous energies were devoted in parliament more than a generation ago, have again appeared in a morified form, and called forth from him words as outspoken and clear as those with which he impressed the House more than thirty years ago. It was in fighting the battle of Free Trade against Protection, as exemplified in the struggle for the abolition of the duty on corn that he gained his first triumph in parliament; and now in the evening of his active and useful career he is found again lifting up his voice in consistent advocacy of the principles he upheld at that period. In 1849 there was, for a short time, a tendency shown by a party in parliament, headed by the late Lord Beaconsfield, then Member for Buckinghamshire, to reaffirm the principles of Protection as against Free Trade.

MR. BRIGHT'S OPINIONS IN 1849 ON FREE TRADE AND PROTECTION.

In an eloquent speech delivered on March 15th in that year, Mr. Bright emphatically said,—“Let honourable gentlemen beware how they turn their attention to the question of the reimposition of the duties upon corn. If you do so you are doing that which I believe is as impossible as the reimposition of any Act which has passed this House in former times. You might probably effect the repeal of the Reform Bill, or the Catholic Emancipation Act in the same session as that in which you reimpose the duty upon corn. Take care what you are about. Honourable gentlemen fancy that there is a lull in the public mind; that events abroad have frightened people at home. . . . You talk of the experiment of Free Trade as though it had failed, or was but an experiment. I ask, Have you not legislated since the oldest amongst you first came here, in favour of protection, and with the view of keeping up the price of corn; and do you not recollect that under the protective laws in 1836, the whole average price of the year for good wheat—not sprouted wheat—was but 39s. 4d. per quarter? whilst now, we are told, sprouted wheat is sold at 42s. a quarter." In the same speech he said: "If I were myself an owner of land, I should say this to my tenant-farmers: 'Men, you have got the land, and it must be your object to work it to the best of your ability with the capital you have. Parliament, like the landlord, must deal with those on whose behalf this proposition is said to be made, on the same principles on which it would deal with trades of all other descriptions. You must exert the same virtues of perseverance, industry, and frugality which others possess, and in which you are not wanting; you must look to the exercise of these means for your profit and success, not to external aid or exclusive assistance which can only be rendered at the cost of gross injustice to others.'

"But the speech of the Hon. Member for Buckinghamshire was so purely agricultural, that he did not enter into any such considerations." He recognised no such principle of dealing with the interests of all classes, instead of addressing ourselves to the benefit of one only. He himself quoted from the Standard, a newspaper of high authority with his party, and so exclusively agricultural in its predilections, that in one of its leaders a few years ago it contended that if the whole of the manufactures of England were destroyed to-morrow, England would not be a less great country by one iota, or the English a less happy people. But the Standard now takes up different ground. It announced in a recent number that unions were now formed in most of the southern counties of England, the object of which was carefully to exclude all the products of the mills of the north, so that the cloths of Cheshire and Yorkshire would not be allowed to come into competition with the productions of Wiltshire. If this is to be the spirit in which hon. gentlemen are disposed to make common cause against the manufacturing interest, I wonder they do not carry out their principle to its full extent, and, as their ancestors once wandered over the country clothed in skins and with their bodies painted, that they do not come down here in that way. They might come at last to clothe themselves in thatch, by which means I trust the farmers will obtain a remunerative price for their straw. I am not at all disposed to dispute the meritorious and industrious character of the tenant-farmers; on the contrary, I believe them well entitled to the praise of possessing those qualities in a high degree. But I protest against a proposition on their behalf which would certainly prejudice the interests of all other classes for the doubtful benefit of one." At that period he took his stand on the broad principle that free trade was in itself beneficial, and should be the policy of England, without reference to the vacillation and half-heartedness of other nations.

HIS OPINIONS UNCHANGED.

These principles he steadily maintained. In 1881 we find him writing on the subject of "reciprocity," "If you mean that we are only to trade freely without duties at our ports with nations who will do the same to us, then I am against reciprocity, as a stupid and impossible proposition. If you mean that we are to put on duties at our ports with the notion that we shall compel other nations to take off their duties, then I am against it, from the conviction that such a plan must fail, as it has done in all times past. For twenty years before our free trade times, this plan was made use of and offered to foreign parts, and it entirely failed, as it would fail again if offered. . . . The true course for England is to open her ports as completely and widely as possible, whatever may be the tariff of other countries." To another correspondent, who asks him to attend a Liberal meeting in Sheffield, he writes: "As to reciprocity, and the rubbish which is disturbing some minds, I do not think we need to trouble ourselves much about it. . . . Three hundred farmers in Aberdeenshire have just denounced protection as heartily as you or I could have done it. The cry may do some mischief at a single election, but I think it will be dead enough before a general election is upon us." In all that the great "tribune of the people" has done, we note a fine consistency,—not the obstinacy that refuses instruction, or rejects the new light thrown by time and experience on a question, but the grave solidity of opinion proceeding from conviction based upon earnest and deliberate thought and study.

BIRTH, FAMILY, AND EDUCATION.

By birth Mr. Bright belongs to that upper middle-class from which so many of the notabilities in English history have sprung,—the class that produced the first William Pitt and Robert Clive, John Watt and Samuel Johnson. His father, Jacob Bright, was a cotton-spinner of Rochdale, in Lancashire, and resided at Greenbank, near that town; and there the subject of this memoir was born on the 16th of November, 1811. The family belonged then, and has continued to belong since, to the estimable and law-abiding community known as the "Society of Friends," or by the more familiar appellation of "Quakers." His education was not of an elaborate kind, and included no advanced collegiate course. "For myself, I can say that I have never been at school since I was fifteen years of age," he said in one of his speeches, in opposition to a bill restricting the hours of factory labour for all persons under eighteen. In the literal sense of the term, his schooling was limited to those early years; but his actual education must have been going on long after he entered his father's warehouse as a lad; for during the years of his boyhood and youth most important events were developing themselves, and the country was passing through a struggle and approaching a crisis not less momentous in its nature and consequences, though less noted by the historian, than the great warlike conflict that had preceded it,—a struggle in which even so cool-headed and resolute a man as the great Duke of Wellington at last acknowledged that the alternative of consequences lay between reform and revolution.

PERIOD FROM 1815 TO 1830.

It was in many respects a mournful and even a shameful period that intervened between the end of the great war in 1815 and the passing of the first Reform Bill in 1830. The war had left a dismal legacy in the shape of a hugely increased national debt, the interest of which annually swallowed up close upon thirty millions sterling, before a penny could be devoted to the current expenses of the government. Taxation was more grievously felt now that the excitement of the war was over; and while the cessation of the contest did away with the demand for stores, weapons, etc., that had kept various trades employed, the revival of foreign trade, hoped for as a remedy, took place but slowly. The distress among the operative classes and the agricultural labourers increased year by year; wages were low, and work was scarce. In parliament, as then constituted, the voice of the people had little chance of being heard; and thus the popular discontent naturally took two definite forms—a demand for a reform in parliament that should bring about a real representation of the people, and what a somewhat flippant politician once characterized as "an ignorant impatience of taxation," showing itself in an increased determination that the burdens of the community, like parliamentary representation, should be more fairly and proportionately adjusted.

At first the method of coercion was adopted. Meetings were violently interrupted or dispersed by troops of regular cavalry or yeomanry, not without bloodshed, as in the case of the infamous "Peterloo massacre" in Manchester, which, however, found a dignitary of the Church ready to defend it. The statutes against libel and sedition were sharpened and mercilessly put in force, and in many cases the law was disgracefully strained in the prosecution of poor ignorant labourers and operatives driven more by hunger than by any other cause into spasmodic and half-hearted riot. But gradually the feeling grew stronger that something must be done in the way of concession to public opinion and justice, if, as the Duke of Wellington himself, one of the most consistent opponents of all, but with the most indispensable concession expressed it, the king's government was to be carried on.

CHANGES; THE REFORM BILL OF 1832; BRIGHT'S EARLIER ORATORY.

Thus in his early youth, John Bright saw the harsh rule of the Tories of the old school of Eldon and Ellenborough gradually giving way to the milder councils of Canning and his colleagues; he was old enough to appreciate the importance of such steps towards better things as the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and the triumph of the measure for the admission of the Roman Catholics to Parliament; and the year in which he attained his majority was that of the first great popular triumph, the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832. That these things made a deep impression on him, and that he studied public questions in their different bearings long before the commencement of his public career, is shown by the sound knowledge everywhere shown in his speeches concerning the events of these earlier times. His sympathies were with the reformers; and his earliest efforts of oratory belong to this period.

The old axiom, "Poeta nascitur non fit," has its converse in the proposition that an orator is produced by a very gradual process. Of him it may be said, "Fit non nascitur," his power must be matured by practice. Macaulay has observed that most great parliamentary speakers exercised themselves at the expense of their audience, and cites the well-known instance of Fox speaking almost every night during an entire session as a proof of his assertion. That the wonderful eloquence with which Mr. Bright through many sessions charmed his audiences, and held spellbound even those who differed most widely from him in opinion, has been improved and perfected by experience there is no doubt; but much of the effect he never fails to create is due to the earnestness, the impression of thorough conviction in the speaker, the absence of all theatrical trick or striving after effect, the evident truth of every emotion expressed, and more than all to the manly Saxon simplicity of the language in which his thoughts are clothed. It is curious, in view of his present great reputation, to mark the effect recorded on a hearer as produced upon him by one of the young reformer's earliest speeches at a country gathering.

He was dressed in black, and his coat was of that peculiar cut considered by the worthy disciples of George Fox as a standing protest against the fashions of the world. The lecturer was young, square-built, and muscular, with a broad face and forehead, with a fresh complexion, with "mild blue eyes" like those of the late Russian Nicholas, but nevertheless with a general expression quite sufficiently decided and severe. As an orator the man did not shine. His voice was good, though somewhat harsh; his manner was awkward, as is the custom of the country; and the sentences came out of his mouth loose, naked, and ill-formed. He was not master of the situation, yet he wanted not confidence, nor matter, nor words. Practice, it was clear, was all that he required. The orator felt this himself. He told his audience that he was learning to speak upon the question, and that he would succeed in time. His expectation was abundantly fulfilled; for during his long career in the House of Commons, Mr. Bright's oratory has certainly not been either awkward or wanting in clearness.

MARRIAGE; FIRST ASSOCIATION WITH RICHARD COBDEN.

Mr. Bright is not to be put among those public men who entered upon political life i their earliest manhood. He was thirty years old before he obtained his first seat in the House of Commons. There was an advantage, in one sense, in this delay; for he knew more of men and things, and could speak more from his own experience in addressing the House than many of his colleagues. He had, in fact, seen and taken part in a very important public movement before he became a representative of a parliamentary constituency. In 1839 he married Miss Elizabeth Priestman, daughter of Jonathan Priestman, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, a member, like himself, of the Society of Friends. As a partner in the houses of Bright and Co. and Bright and Brothers, established in Rochdale and Manchester as cotton-spinners and carpet manufacturers, he devoted himself for some years to commercial pursuits. Continental travel had enlarged his mind and given him the opportunity of comparing the condition of his own country, socially and economically, with that of foreign nations; and no doubt contributed to the faculty he afterwards showed of judging by a far wider standard than the narrow and insular one frequently set up by his opponents.

It was at this time he became acquainted with that great man, Richard Cobden, who afterwards became his colleague, and with whose name and activity his own was during a series of years so closely interwoven that the two were always associated together in a kind of brotherhood, only to be dissolved by death. Mr. Bright, in giving an account of his first meeting with Mr. Cobden, says they owed their earliest association to the interest both took in the then newly mooted educational question. "I went over to Manchester," says Mr. Bright, "to call upon him and invite him to come to Rochdale to speak at a meeting about to be held in the school-room of the Baptist Chapel in West-street. I found him in his counting-house. I told him what I wanted; his countenance lighted up with pleasure to find that others were working in the same cause. He without hesitation agreed to come. He came and he spoke; and though he was then so young a speaker, yet the qualities of his speech were such as remained with him so long as he was able to speak at all,—clearness, logic, a conversational eloquence, a persuasiveness which, when combined with the absolute truth there was in his eye and in his countenance, became a power it was almost impossible to resist."

THE CORN LAWS; THEIR NATURE.

They were soon destined to be brought into close alliance. Among the grievances endured for many years by the English people, none weighed more heavily upon them than the corn laws. There had from old times been restrictions upon the free traffic in corn, not only with foreign countries, but even from one part of the kingdom to another. In 1815, though the tax on the exportation of corn had been abolished, that on its importation was retained; and not until home-grown corn had reached the price of eighty shillings the quarter, could foreign grain be imported duty free. The price of the nation's food was thus artificially raised by the shutting out of foreign supplies, and the maintaining of a monopoly for the English farmer, within certain limits; and the landed interest, who considered the question of revenue derived from land in the form of rents as bound up with the maintenance of this monopoly, strenuously opposed any movement tending to interfere with it. But bad times came, when wages were low, and thousands of men, earning a very few shillings a week, were rendered desperate by seeing their families in a state of chronic semi-starvation. In 1828, accordingly, the corn laws were somewhat relaxed, a duty of one shilling being placed upon foreign corn, when the market at home had risen to seventy-three shillings, the duty rising to twenty-three shillings and eight pence when the price per quarter sank to sixty-four shillings,—the object of course being to keep out all foreign corn until the farmers had sold their crops. Naturally this state of things was viewed with great discontent by the operative and commercial classes, who considered themselves as being sacrificed to the agricultural interest; and in London, Manchester, and other great commercial centres, the free-traders, who were opposed to each and every kind of tax on corn, increased in number; and naturally, after the manner of Englishmen, they began to combine for the attainment of the object they had in view.

FORMATION OF THE ANTI CORN LAW LEAGUE.

It was in the year 1838, on the occasion of a public dinner, at which Dr., afterwards Sir John, Bowring, had denounced the corn laws as productive of an untold amount of human misery, that the idea of an association to bring about the abolition of these obnoxious imposts was first started by Mr. Howie. In 1839, the Association for the Abolition of the Corn Laws had expanded into the National Anti Corn Law League. From Manchester the idea had spread throughout the kingdom: the League held great meetings in London, in Drury Lane and Covent Garden

Theatres among other places; the leaders, with Mr. Cobden at their head, during a series of years went on expounding with wonderful patience and skill the objects of the League and the benefits that would come to the nation from free trade; and here it was that the closer bond of fellowship between Richard Cobden and John Bright was formed. In 1841, Mr. Bright had the misfortune to lose his wife; and in the first hour of his sorrow he received a visit which had an effect on his whole career. He tells the story in the following words:—

"I was in Leamington, and Mr. Cobden called on me. I was then in the depths of grief, I may almost say of despair, for the light and sunshine of my house had been extinguished. All that was left on earth of my young wife, except the memory of a sainted life and a too brief happiness, was lying still and cold in the chamber above us. Mr. Cobden called on me as his friend, and addressed me, as you may suppose, with words of condolence. After a time he looked up and said, 'There are thousands and thousands of homes in England at this moment where wives and mothers and children are dying of hunger. Now when the first paroxysm of your grief is past, I would advise you to come with me, and we will never rest until the corn laws are repealed.'"

FIRST SEAT IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS; ELECTED MEMBER FOR DURHAM.

The advice thus affectionately given was loyally received and followed. No man ever devoted himself with more singleness of purpose to an object than was shown by Mr. Bright in pulling down the corn laws. Not long afterwards, in 1843, he obtained, after a first unsuccessful effort, a seat in the House of Commons, being returned for Durham. Cobden was also in Parliament; and in the House and out of the House the two friends laboured indefatigably against discouragements enough at first,—for even the artisan and operative classes for whom they chiefly laboured did not at first see the benefits of free trade,—but at last with complete success.

Kinglake, the author of "Eothen," and of the eloquent and exhaustive "History of the Crimean War," speaking of Cobden and Bright, with whose general political opinions his own are very little in accordance, honestly and graphically describes the power they wielded by the force of argument and eloquence in the House of Commons, and the enormous influence they exerted over their opponents. He says: "These two orators had shown with what a strength, with what a masterly skill, with what patience, with what a high courage, they could carry a scientific truth through the storms of politics. They had shown that they could arouse and govern the assenting thousands who listened to them with delight; that they could bend the House of Commons; that they could press their creed upon a Prime Minister, and to put upon his mind so hard a stress that after a while he felt it to be a torture and a violence to his reason to have to make a stand against them. Nay more, each of these gifted men had proved that he could go bravely into the midst of angry opponents, could show them their fallacies one by one, destroy their favourite theories before their very faces, and triumphantly argue them down."

ANTI CORN LAW ARGUMENTS.

In December 1845, when the coming event of Free Trade was casting its shadow before, Mr. Bright made a speech containing these words, at a meeting in Covent Garden Theatre :—

"This contest has now been waged for seven years; it was a serious one when commenced, but it is a far more serious one now. Since the time when we first came to London to ask the attention of Parliament to the question of the corn law, two millions of human beings have been added to the population of the United Kingdom. The table is here as before; the food is spread in about the same quantity as before; but two millions of fresh guests have arrived, and that circumstance makes the question a serious one, both for the Government and for us. These two millions are so many arguments for the Anti Corn Law League—so many emphatic condemnations of the policy of this iniquitous law. I see them now in my mind's eye ranged before me, old men and young children, all looking to the Government for bread; some endeavouring to resist the stroke of famine, clamorous and turbulent, but still arguing with us; some dying mute and uncomplaining. Multitudes have died of hunger in the United Kingdom since we first asked the Government to repeal the corn law; and although the great and powerful may not regard those who suffer mutely and die in silence, yet the recording angel will note down their patient endurance and the heavy guilt of those by whom they have been sacrificed.

"We have had a succession of skirmishes; we now approach the final conflict. It may be worth while to inquire who and what are the combatants in this great battle? Looking in the columns of the newspapers, and attending, as I have attended, hundreds of meetings held to support the principles of Free Trade, we must conclude, that on the face of it the struggle is that of the many against the few. It is a struggle between the numbers, wealth, comforts, the all, in fact, of the middle and industrious classes, and the wealth, the union, and sordidness of a large section of the aristocracy of this empire; and we have to decide,—for it may be that this meeting itself may to no little extent be the arbiter in this great contest,—we have to decide now in this great struggle, whether in this land in which we live, we will longer bear the wicked legislation to which we have been subjected, or whether we will make one effort to right the vessel, to keep her in her true course, and, if possible, to bring her safely to a secure haven. Our object, as the people, can only be, that we should have good and impartial government for everybody. As the whole people, we can by no possibility have the smallest interest in any partial or unjust legislation: we do not wish to sacrifice any right of the richest or most powerful class, but we are resolved that that class shall not sacrifice the rights of a whole people.

"We have had landlord rule longer, far longer than the life of the oldest man in this vast assembly, and I would ask you to look at the results of that rule, and then decide whether it be not necessary to interpose some check to the extravagance of such legislation. The land-owners have had unlimited sway in Parliament and in the provinces. Abroad, the history of our country is the history of war and rapine; at home, of debt, taxes, and rapine too. In all the great contests in which we have been engaged we have found that this ruling class have taken all the honours, while the people have taken all the scars. No sooner was the country freed from the horrible contest which was so long carried on with the powers of Europe, than this law, by their partial legislation, was enacted—far more hostile to British interests than any combination of foreign powers has ever proved. We find them legislating corruptly: they pray daily that in their legislation they may discard all private ends and partial affections, and after prayers they sit down to make a law for the purpose of extorting from all the consumers of food a higher price than it is worth, that the extra price may find its way in to the pockets of the proprietors of land, these proprietors being the very men by whom this infamous law is sustained."

THE BATTLE OF FREE TRADE; PEEL'S CONVERSION TO FREE TRADE PRINCIPLES.

It was, however, an arduous task, and the opponents of free trade fought hard. The British farmer was persuaded by his friends the land owning squires that he required protection in the prosecution of his calling; that unless he was artificially secured against foreign competition, his industry and skill would be thrown away. On the other hand, the free traders exhorted agriculturists to increase the productiveness of their acres by improved cultivation, insisting that under the system of protection, which they declared to be a premium paid by the whole nation for the upholding of sloth and incapacity in one class, the land brought forth far less than it could be made with due care to yield. At length the country generally began to wake up to the reasonableness of the free-traders' propositions, and to see the question in a new light. The pathetic wailings and furious tirades of wealthy landlords and well-to-do farmers against the League and all its works began to excite ridicule. The humourists of the comic papers published a cartoon representing a stout farmer addressing a lean, careworn working man with, "Please, sir, give me half of your loaf." A certain church dignitary and a noble duke, who, during a season of unusual dearth, had respectively recommended swede turnips and mangold wurzels and a pinch of curry in hot water as suitable food for the labourer and artisan, were held up to derision. Ebenezer Elliott, "the Corn Law Rhymers," and other popular men, showed to demonstration how on such a subject the interests of all classes of working men were identical, and professed their regret at seeing—

"Agriculture and trade arrayed against each other,
And corn forgetting that cotton's his brother."

And more than all, the great statesman then at the head of the government, Sir Robert Peel, to whom the country gentlemen looked up with all confidence as their natural leader, gave signs that he was becoming a convert to the principles of free trade. The intelligence of Mr. Bright was prompt to detect this temper in the Premier, as is seen in the remarkable words he uttered in his place in Parliament in the session of 1844.

"There can be no doubt that Sir Robert Peel is, at heart, as good a free-trader as I am. He has told us so in the House of Commons again and again; nor do I doubt that Sir Robert Peel has in his inmost heart the desire to be the man who shall carry out the principles of free trade in this country;" and, indeed, in the same session Peel provoked an ironical cheer from the Opposition benches by declaring, "On the general principle of free trade there is now no great difference of opinion, and all agree in the general rule that we should buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market." But, as if conscious that the man who uttered such a sentiment could not consistently keep corn at an artificial value by taxation, he alluded thus to the interruption he had received: "I know the meaning of that cheer. I do not wish to raise a discussion on the corn laws or the sugar duties, which I contend, however, are exceptions to the general rule, and I will not go into that question now." But the time came when the question had to be gone into. And when the time came, Sir Robert did not shrink from the task before him. Amid the amazement and indignation of many of his supporters, and to the great delight of the Opposition, he announced to the House that he had come to the conclusion that the corn laws were partial and unjust, and ought to be repealed. He accordingly brought in a measure for their abolition, fully aware of the price that he would have to pay for this measure; for he was by far too experienced and astute a statesman not to be aware that many of his followers would be alienated by what they would deem his political apostacy, and that he was exposing himself to obloquy and misrepresentation, and that the fate of his ministry was probably sealed, though he had the power, with the help of his general opponents, to carry the measure. He spoke of this in the finest speech perhaps he ever uttered; and added with a touch of manly pathos: "But it may be that I shall leave a name sometimes remembered with expressions of goodwill in those places which are the abode of men whose lot it is to labour, and to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow,—a name remembered with expressions of goodwill when they shall recreate their exhausted strength with abundant and untaxed food, the sweeter because it is no longer leavened with the sense of injustice."

PEACEFUL NATURE OF THE ANTI CORN LAW AGITATION; COMPLETENESS OF ITS TRIUMPH.

It was the grandest thing Peel had ever done, and all the more praiseworthy because he knew the cost at which he righted the great wrong from which the community had long suffered, and by which even the class for whose behoof it had been maintained and perpetuated had not in reality been benefited. For while labour was starved by the corn laws the land was badly cultivated, and the artificial dearth created by a monopoly terribly increased the aggregate of misery and pauperism and their concomitant, crime. One great feature about the Corn Law Agitation, with which Mr. Bright's name is indelibly associated, is the entirely peaceful action of its proceedings. In other great movements, such as the Reform Bill agitation, and O'Connell's endeavour to obtain repeal, the passions of the audiences were appealed to by inflammatory harangues and impassioned portraiture of wrongs committed perhaps centuries ago. Mr. Bright and his colleagues appealed to the reason, not to the passions of their hearers, and by the logic of facts and figures convinced the country and, as we have seen, the leading statesman, that protection was a fallacy. Eight years of incessant labour, from 1838 to 1846, with the holding of great mass meetings in London, Manchester, Stockport, and various other towns, the means of war being provided by the holding of great bazaars, at one of which £10,000, at another £20,000, was added to the funds of the association, at length culminated in triumphant success,—a success all the more remarkable in view of the tremendous opposition, including almost all the Upper House, and a great part of the Lower, at first arrayed against free trade,—an opposition including moreover, nearly all the influential clergy, not a few of the middle class traders, and what appears marvellous at the present day, many of the working men, especially the whole body of Chartists, who considered that free trade would lower the price of labour. It is instructive to compare the condition of the working man under the "protection" system and under the auspices of free trade, and to see how, in every particular, the position of the labourer has improved under the wholesome stimulus of competition; how with an enormous increase of the population pauperism has decreased; how much greater chance the steady workman has now of obtaining regular employment and laying by something for a rainy day; and how differently the children of artisans are clothed, housed, fed, and taught, than in the "protection days." So thoroughly did the reasonableness of free trade appeal to all thinking men, that only a few years ago, one of the former leaders of the Protectionists in Parliament, publicly proclaimed from his seat in the House, "We are all free-traders now;" and in 1880, Mr. Justice McCarthy, in his "History of our own Times," declared there was no more chance of a reaction against free trade than a reaction against the Rule of Three. Subsequent events have shown that such a reaction may be attempted, though no one probably would try to restore protection under its own name; but as "new presbyter was but old priest writ large," so "reciprocity" may be considered, like "fair trade," a convenient alias for Protection.

OPINION ON IRISH QUESTIONS; MAINTENANCE OF ORDER.

The triumph of the Anti Corn Law League was to some extent hastened by the terrible famine which occurred in Ireland in 1845, and rendered the maintenance of the old restrictions impossible. Soon after, the state of confusion and lawlessness that had supervened there, necessitated the bringing forward by Sir George Grey of the Crime and Outrage Bill of 1847. Here we find Mr. Bright speaking with thorough straightforwardness and good sense, though the course he adopted was not calculated to advance his popularity. Though he knew the calamities of Ireland and sympathised with the sufferings of the people, he recognised above all things the necessity of vindicating the law, and therefore voted for the Bill giving exceptional powers to the executive. He pointed out how, in some districts in Ireland, the public feeling was entirely antagonistic to the law. "I ask the honourable gentleman," he said to Mr. John O'Connell, who cried "No, no," to this statement, "if he has not read accounts which are not contradicted, from which we learn that on some recent cases of assassination, whole districts have been in a state of rejoicing and exultation? These assassinations are not looked upon as murders, but rather as executions. Take the case of Mr. Lloyd, a clergyman, who was recently assassinated. There was no show of vindictive feeling on the part of his murderers; there was little of the character of ordinary murders in it. The servant was allowed to depart unharmed; a boy who was in the carriage was removed that he might not be injured; and the unhappy gentleman was shot with all the deliberation and the calmness with which a man would be made to suffer the extreme penalty of the law. It is clear, then, that the ordinary law fails, and that the Government have a case for the demand they make for an extension of the present powers of the law." It has been the custom, in some quarters, to represent Mr. Bright as a demagogue, whose endeavour is "to set class against class," and encourage lawlessness. On the contrary, he has always been found giving all the weight of his influence to the upholding of the existing laws; but he is equally indefatigable and outspoken in his denunciations of bad laws, and his endeavours by peaceful but persistent effort to get them altered. In 1863, when a savage attack was made in a leading London newspaper upon both Mr. Bright and Mr. Cobden, and anonymous articles represented them as subverters of law and order, Mr. Bright said, addressing a meeting at Rochdale:—"We are charged with all sorts of dreadful things by that gentleman in the Mask. On the 27th of November he wrote this of Mr. Cobden. He said:

"He [Mr. Cobden] stoops down and picks up a weapon which has never yet been used but for anarchy and revolution. Is it not in fact to tell the labourer and the workman to look over the fence of the neighbouring proprietor, and learn to think that they have a natural right to a slice of the soil?"

"Surely, if they are industrious and frugal, and can save the means to purchase, and there be anybody who would wish to sell, and the law steps in and makes it difficult to sell and to buy, then, I say, that labourer has a right to look over the hedge, and to feel that the law deals a grievous injustice to him . . .

"Would you believe it—young men here do not recollect it—that the landed proprietors could never find out, till Mr. Cobden and a few others told them, that the corn law was a great injury to them? They did not know that it actually lowered the value of their land, and diminished the security of their rents, and that it loaded them with an inconceivable amount of public odium; whilst, at the same time, it beggared hundreds and thousands of the people, and it menaced this nation with rebellion.

"Mr. Cobden and I, and others who acted with us, but we chiefly, because perhaps we were the most prominent, were slandered then by the gentleman in the Mask, just as we have been now. The Times was as foul-mouthed upon us twenty years ago as it is at this moment. It said that we went about the country setting class against class. It said that our views led to the confiscation of landed property. It said everything that was spiteful and untrue, as it says now. And yet, is there any man in this country who will not admit that property is more secure in consequence of the abolition of that law, which landowners believed to be the anchor of their safety, and that animosities between class and class have been allayed? And who shall tell how much it is owing to this reform that our Queen at this moment wields an unchallenged sceptre over a tranquil realm? A landowner in the House of Commons, an old Member of the House, a representative of a south-western county, a man of excellent character, for whom I have always had the greatest respect, even when he was most in the wrong,—he told me not long ago, speaking about the corn law, that they did not then know the good we were owing to his class. I smiled and said to him, 'If you would only have faith, I could tell one or two other things that would do you just as much good, if you would let us try them.' But he had no faith."

THE GAME LAWS AND THE AGRICULTURAL INTEREST.

Lord Melbourne's question, when the removal of an abuse or a measure of improvement was proposed to him, was said to have invariably been, "But can't you leave it alone?" Mr. Bright's question, when a grievance comes before him, is, on the other hand, "How is it to be remedied?" and this was the case on the question of the Crime and Outrage Bill. "I feel it impossible to refuse my vote in favour of the Bill now before us; but I am compelled to say, that unless the Government will zealously promote measures in the direction I have indicated" (the Encumbered Estates Bill," etc.), "they cannot hope long to retain the confidence of this House or of the country." At an earlier period, Mr. Bright had already spoken out fearlessly and well on the subject of the excessive preservation of game, and the injury inflicted upon the agricultural interest by the selfishness of landlords, who fed great numbers of hares, pheasants, and rabbits on their tenants' crops. Farmers are now far more outspoken on such subjects than they were forty years ago; and therefore, in 1845, when a Hertfordshire tenant farmer, Mr. Horncastle, spoke out boldly on the game laws, exposing their injustice, and pointing out the hardships they entailed, his brother agriculturists were somewhat astonished at his daring, while they admired it, and testified their appreciation of Mr. Horncastle's courage in true British fashion by giving him a public dinner, to which Mr. Bright, then still engaged in the "Corn Law struggle," was invited,—a proof that even among the farmers, whose interests were supposed to be injuriously affected, the doctrines of free trade were making rapid progress. On this occasion Mr. Bright said: "We have heard a good deal within the last year or two of farmers' friends; but I take it that Mr. Horncastle is a true farmers' friend; and if it were not that circumstances have made him in some degree independent of those who would be likely to injure him, he would not only be the farmers' friend, but he would be likely to become a martyr for farmers. I am delighted to see this meeting, because I take it to be a sign of the times, and a sign of better times,—an evidence that farmers are about to think, act, and do something for themselves. I conceive there is no delusion so great as that of believing that the great and the mighty of the earth will ever be the true, sincere, and disinterested friends of the middle classes, either in this or any other kingdom. . . . Now the farmer gets possession of his land ; it becomes the centre of the hopes of himself and his family ; his capital is more or less invested in it—some sunk in permanent improvements, and some in the stock, implements, and materials upon the surface of the farm. He hopes that it may turn out well for him ; he gets up early, works hard and late, thousands of farmers with their hands, and thousands more with their heads. He gives his skill, industry, and perseverance to the soil ; he is subject to the vicissitudes of seasons, against which no human foresight can altogether prevail ; and he stands the chance and hazard of the markets. He has to contend also against the effect of the ignorance of land-owning legislators, in which ignorance, unfortunately for him, there are no vicissitudes. The result is but a very moderate compensation for his expenditure and labour ; and that compensation is in many cases altogether destroyed, and in very many cases much lessened, by a system which does no good to any human being whatever, which exists solely for the amusement of the rich and powerful class at the expense of the interests of the tenantry and peasantry, and at a very great and enormous sacrifice to the whole community. There can be no success to the farmer under a system of game preserving." At the time these words were looked upon as "flat heresy" by the majority of the class of landed proprietors ; but the sagacity of the speaker has been vindicated by the fact that, in the course of time, the game laws have been modified ; and at the present day a landlord who preserves game, and allows it to accumulate on his estate to such an extent as seriously to injure the tenant, is looked upon as not only tyrannical but shortsighted. It is only another instance among many of principles which, when Mr. Bright had the boldness to enunciate them, were unpopular and discredited among a very large portion of the community, and that now find general and popular acceptance.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES BILL. AND JEWISH DISABILITIES.

One of the most effective of Mr. Bright's speeches, and one whose sagacity was thoroughly vindicated by subsequent events, was spoken on the occasion of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. At the end of 1850 and the beginning of 1851,

Pope Pius IX., chiefly, it is said, at the instigation of some restless ecclesiastics of his creed in England, chose to parcel out England into Episcopal Sees, to be placed under the care of the chief Romanist priests in England. Thus to Cardinal Wiseman, for instance, was given the title of Archbishop of Westminster. A great clamour was raised against Papal aggression, and in some of the ultra-Protestant circles, inflammatory language was used, and impassioned harangues were delivered, declaring the independence of England and the dignity of the Crown to be menaced by the Pope. Lord John Russell, then at the head of the ministry, thought to silence the popular clamour by the introduction of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, which offended so many, that its condition suggested the description of the wit of Lear by the fool, who declared it to have been pared on both sides until nothing was left in the middle. Punch caricatured Lord John as "the boy who chalked up 'No Popery,' and then ran away." Mr. Bright ridiculed the Bill as a weak yielding to a foolish scare, and predicted what afterwards came to pass—namely, that it would be found utterly useless, and would be relegated to the limbo of obsolete measures, and at some convenient opportunity repealed. "The noble lord informs the House that the Bill will meet the emergency," he said, "and that he has proposed nothing that is not required for the precise evil complained of ; and yet within a few days after its first appearance, three-fourths of the Bill are given up . . . The Bill of the noble lord is repudiated by all classes ; and the press also repudiates it. It is well understood that the noble lord is practising a cheat, a delusion on the people of England. The people have been clamouring for a resistance to the aggression of the Pope, but not for such resistance as this measure affords. They expect something that will be felt ; but not the pretence of a measure which, whilst it insults Roman Catholics, offers no defence to Protestants." Especially with great good sense he deprecated the zeal without discretion displayed by some clergymen of the Church of England, especially of one reverend gentleman "whose Protestantism," he says, "seems to be vituperation, and whose Christian charity clamour." With regard to the question of the admission of the Jews to parliament, he expressed his surprise that any sane man could propose that doctrinal differences in religion should be made the test of citizenship and political rights ; and recommended boldly that the whole system of oaths at the bar of the House should be abolished (it was the impossibility of his taking the oath, "on the true faith of a Christian," that kept Baron Rothschild out of the House, session after session, after he had been duly elected Member for the City of London), and that some declaration should be substituted which every honest man could take in as honest and conscientious a spirit.

THE CRIMEAN WAR; RUSSIAN AGGRESSION.

In the year 1854, the contest with Russia known as the Crimean war began. It was the cause of the loss of much popularity to Mr. Bright. From the beginning he was opposed to the contest, considering the contest one the country was not warranted in undertaking. The late Lord Beaconsfield, then Member for Bucks, had paradoxically designated the struggle as a "just and unnecessary war." Mr. Bright took leave to question whether an unnecessary war could in any case be just. He had no belief in the regeneration of the Turkish empire, and considered that the blood and treasure of England was being poured forth for a chimera. He enumerated the various evidences of the increasing weakness of the Porte,—the loss of the Crimea and Bessarabia, of the control of the Danubian provinces, of the kingdom of Greece,—and declared that the recovery and sustentation of such a decaying empire was an impossible task to attempt. He also pointed out the intrigues and factions that were rife at Constantinople, France demanding one thing, Russia another, England another, and Austria something else. Some of his words are singularly prophetic, when we consider the manner in which Russia afterwards repudiated the conditions of the Treaty of Paris, which put an end to the Crimean war, when she found it no longer convenient to observe them. "We are undertaking to repress and to curb Russian aggression," he said, speaking in March 1854; "these are catching words; they have been amplified in newspapers, and have passed from mouth to mouth, and have served to blind the eyes of multitudes wholly ignorant of the details of this question. If Turkey has been in danger from the side of Russia heretofore, will she not be in far greater danger when the war is over? Russia is always there. You do not propose to dismember Russia, or to blot out her name from the map, and her history from the records of Europe. Russia will be always there—always powerful, always watchful, and actuated by the same motives of ambition either of influence or of territory which are supposed to have moved her in past times. What then do you propose to do? and how is Turkey to be secured? Will you make a treaty with Russia, and force conditions upon her? But if so, what security have you that one treaty will be more binding than another? It is easy to find or make a reason for breaking a treaty when it is the interest of a country to break it." He declared that while he sympathized with the Turks on the one hand, he sympathized with the Russian serfs also on the other; and declared that it was not the duty of England to be the knight errant of the human race, and to take upon herself the task of protecting the thousand millions of men with whom the world was peopled.

A STRONG PROTEST AGAINST WAR.

It has been said of the two statesmen Chatham and Grenville, in reference to the wars in which England was engaged in the middle of the last century, that the one could see only the glory, while the other saw nothing but the bill. In war, Mr. Bright always had before the eye of his mind what was popularly termed in the great Napoleonic contest the "butcher's bill." He was never weary of declaiming against the lamentable and sometimes wanton waste of human life involved in the struggle, and pathetically alluded to some of his own parliamentary colleagues who had been sacrificed to the Moloch of the battlefield. "We all know what we have lost in this House," he said, "Here, sitting near me, very often sat the Member for Frome (Colonel Boyle): I met him a short time before he went out (to the Crimea) at Mr. Westerton's the bookseller, near Hyde Park Corner. I asked him whether he was going out. He answered, 'He was afraid he was.'—not afraid in the sense of personal fear; he knew not that; but he said with a look and tone I shall never forget, 'It is no light matter for a man who has a wife and five little children.' The stormy Euxine is his grave; his wife is a widow, his children fatherless." He was especially annoyed, and not wholly without reason, at the somewhat light and jaunty tone in which Lord Palmerston, who took the helm of the state from steady, sober Lord Aberdeen in the very thick of the contest, sometimes discussed questions of the deepest gravity connected with the war, and talked of the alleged necessity of preserving the balance of power in Europe as a piece of antiquated absurdity,—an opinion in which very many of the present generation will be disposed to agree. When Lord John Russell undertook a mission to Vienna, with a hope of establishing a basis of negotiation between the contending Powers, he earnestly conjured Lord Palmerston to endeavour honestly and frankly to put an end to the contest, assuring him that if he did so, no word of the speaker's should be spoken, and no vote given, to shake his power for one single moment, or to change his position in the House. "The angel of Death has been abroad throughout the land," he solemnly said; "you may almost hear the beating of his wings. There is no one, as when the first-born were slain of old, to sprinkle with blood the lintel and the two side-posts of our doors, that he may spare and pass on; he takes his victims from the castle of the noble, the mansion of the wealthy, and the cottage of the poor and the lowly; and it is on behalf of all these classes that I make this solemn appeal."

A LECTURE ON TAXATION.

Nor while he deprecated war, did the more prosaic part of the subject escape his attention. He pointed out how, beyond 20,000 to 30,000 lives, a sum that could not be estimated under forty millions of money had been expended on the Russian war within twelve months. He observed that some of the ministers and many of the members of the House seemed to think very little of taxes, and declared that they reminded him of the anecdote in the history of France, of the aristocratic lady who came to Necker the Finance Minister with a request to be supplied with 1,000 crowns from the public treasury,—a request anything but unusual in those days. Necker refused. The lady started with astonishment. She had an eye on the vast funds of the State, and she asked, "What can 1,000 crowns be to the King?" Necker's answer was, "Madam, 1,000 crowns are the taxes of a whole village." He then went on to argue, with kindly warmth, that the taxes in an English village meant bareness of furniture, of clothing, of the table, in many a cottage in Lancashire, in Suffolk, and in Dorsetshire; that every £100 unnecessarily expended meant additional toil and hardship and decreased food for the labourer. "They mean an absence of medical attendance for a sick wife, an absence of the school pence of three or four little children, hopeless toil to the father of a family, penury through his life, a cheerless old age, and if I may quote the language of a poet of humble life, at last 'the little bell tolled hastily for the pauper's funeral,'—that is what taxes mean." For a while these councils were little heeded in the war frenzy that had seized the nation; but in time public opinion changed in their favour, and the opinions concerning the Turks became considerably modified.

THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR; UNWELCOME TRUTHS FOR UNWILLING MINDS; SLAVERY AND ITS RESULTS.

The next great national subject on which Mr. Bright was at variance with a large section of the public in England, and on which he convinced a great number with eloquence and argument that reminded his hearers of his best efforts in the days of the Anti Corn Law League, was the great question of the American Civil War. At the root of the quarrel which led to the secession of the Southern States from the Union was the question of the maintenance or abolition of slavery; and though at the commencement the feeling of England, assisted by the publication of such works as Mrs. Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin," was strongly against slavery, yet as the contest proceeded, the undoubted heroism with which the Southern Confederates fought against many difficulties and under great disadvantages in point of numbers, produced for a time a reaction in their favour, and a very general sympathy was expressed among the upper and middle classes in favour of the secessionists. Accordingly the Confederate Government made great efforts to procure the alliance, or at least the recognition, of England. Messrs. Hildell and Mason were sent as envoys, with this view; their mission, through the indiscreet zeal of a hot-headed Unionist commodore, almost bringing about a war between the two countries. With the same view of forcing England into an alliance, the supply of cotton to Lancashire was stopped, to produce a pressure on the government from the starving operatives. Mr. Bright persistently pointed out that England of all nations could least countenance rebels who were fighting for the maintenance of slavery; he denied the dogmatic assertion of many that the abolition of slavery would put an end to the production of cotton and to the prosperity of the South; and declared the ruin that had come upon that unhappy region to be a great national retribution upon the United States for a grievous wrong against humanity which, but for the apathy of both sides and the criminal connivance of those who drew profit from it, should have been redressed long before. Speaking in his place in the House of Commons he said emphatically,— "Sir, it is a measureless calamity, this war. I said the Russian war was a measureless calamity, and yet many of your leaders and friends told you that it was a just war, to maintain the integrity of Turkey some thousands of miles off. Surely the integrity of your own country at your own doors must be worth as much as the integrity of Turkey. Is not this war the penalty which inexorable justice exacts from America, North and South, for the enormous guilt of cherishing that frightful iniquity of slavery for the last eight years? I don't blame any man here who thinks the cause of the North hopeless, and the restoration of the Union impossible . . . I do not hold the opinion; but the facts are before us all, and, as far as we can discard passion and sympathy, we are all equally at liberty to form our own opinion. But what I do blame is this,—I blame men who are eager to admit into the family of nations a State which offers itself to us, based upon a principle, I will undertake to say, more odious and more blasphemous than was ever heretofore dreamed of in Christian or Pagan, in civilised or in savage, times. The leaders of this revolt propose this monstrous thing, that over a territory forty times as large as England, the blight and curse of slavery shall be for ever perpetuated." When the Alabama, the privateer built in the shipping yard of Mr. Laird at Birkenhead, was allowed, through official blundering, to escape from England and to start on her piratical career on behalf of the South, Mr. Bright's sagacity made him foretell the magnitude of the difficulty in which this proceeding might involve England with the United States Government, and, as was his wont, he spoke his mind freely on the subject, thereby laying himself open to direct insult in the House from Mr. Laird, and to adverse criticism from various quarters, in which his apprehensions were declared overstrained if not groundless. But here, as in many cases, the event proved him to have been right; and the bitter enmity for a time engendered between England and America was only assuaged by the substantial peace-offering of millions paid for compensation for the damage the Alabama had done, before she was happily sunk, off Cherbourg, by the war steamer Kearsarge.

THE INDIAN MUTINY OF 1857; AN OUTSPOKEN OPINION ON THE EAST INDIA COMPANY.

A subject that especially engaged Mr. Bright's attention, and upon which he gave good and sound advice long before the tremendous catastrophe of the Indian Mutiny of 1857 called general attention, in the most urgent manner, to the vile misgovernment that had almost involved an Empire in ruin. In 1853, when a bill came before Parliament, attempting in a very half-hearted way to remedy some of the most flagrant among the evils of the rule of the East India Company, under whose auspices India had been drained of its resources; the population ground down to the earth by over taxation; public works neglected, and every other object sacrificed to the enrichment of the association of merchants who governed a great empire, and the swelling of the dividends paid to the shareholders of the company, Mr. Bright declared his opinion that nothing short of a measure entirely recasting the government of India, and among other things, obviating the periodical recurrence of aggressive wars for the extension of territory, would save the British authority in India from overthrow. He read out boldly in the House, to the intense disgust of the East India directors and officials present, the statement published by Mr. Marshman, the able editor of the Friend of India, in that journal a few months before. "No one has ever attempted to contradict the fact," said Mr. Marshman, "that the condition of the Bengal peasantry is almost as wretched and degraded as it is possible to conceive, living in the most miserable hovels, hardly fit for a dog-kennel, covered with tattered rags, and unable, in too many instances, to procure more than a single meal a day for himself and family. The Bengal ryot knows nothing of the most ordinary comforts of life. We speak without exaggeration when we affirm, that if the real condition of those who raise the harvest, which yields between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000 a year, was fully known, it would make the ears of one who heard thereof tingle."

After speaking of the enormous amount of the taxes wrung from the poverty of the people of India, "Whatever it is," continued Mr. Bright, "such is the system pursued by the Board of Control,—that is to say by the gentlemen who drop down there for six or eight or twelve months, never beyond two years,—that whatever revenues are collected, they are squandered on unnecessary and ruinous wars, till the country is brought to a state of embarrassment and threatened bankruptcy." He concluded by advising the government of India to abandon the policy of aggression, and to be content with the enormous territory, ten times the size of France, with a population four times as numerous as that of the United Kingdom, which they already possessed. Reminding them, moreover, that if they wished, as they stated, to Christianise India, the readiest way to attain that object was by the establishment of right and justice towards the inhabitants, and by the maintenance of a high-toned Christian morality.

INDIA UNDER A NEW RULE; THE COMPANY'S CHARTER ABOLISHED.

The warning he had given was too soon justified by the terrible events of 1857. In consequence of the mutiny, Parliament at length did what should have been done years before; the government of India was placed directly under the authority of the British crown, and the East India Company ceased to exist. "What we want with regard to the government of India," said Mr. Bright, emphatically, "is that which in common conversation is called 'a little more daylight.' We want more simplicity and more responsibility." This was going to the root of the question; the dual government of the East India Directors and the Board of Control, with its recriminations, squabbles, and shifting of responsibility, had led to tremendous calamity. Justice to the cultivators of the soil, increased facilities for trade, prosecution of public works, the construction of high-roads, canals, and railways,—“everything which human invention can bring to help the industry of the people,” he insisted upon as necessary for India; and again—a bold proceeding in a House numbering many military members—he emphatically recommended the abstaining from ambitious and unnecessary wars. “You have had enough of military reputation on Eastern fields,” he said: “you have gathered large harvests of that commodity, be it valuable or be it worthless. I invite you to something better and higher and holier than that; I invite you to a glory not ‘fanned by conquest’s crimson wing,’ but based upon the solid and lasting benefits which I believe the Parliament of England can, if it will, confer upon the countless populations of India.” On the manner in which the most important offices were filled in India, he made some severe remarks. He said:—

“The Governor-General of India goes out knowing little or nothing of India. I know exactly what he does when he is appointed. He shuts himself up to study the first volumes of Mr. Mill’s History of India, and he reads through this laborious work without nearly so much effect in making him a good Governor-General as a man might ignorantly suppose. He goes to India, a country of twenty nations, speaking twenty languages. He knows none of those nations, and he has not a glimmer of the grammar and pronunciation or meaning of those languages. He is surrounded by half-a-dozen or a dozen gentlemen who have been from fifteen to forty years in that country, and who have scrambled from the moderate but sure allowance with which they began in the service to the positions they now occupy. He knows nothing of the country or the people, and they are really unknown to the Government of India. To this hour the present Governor-General has not travelled through any considerable portion of the territory of India. If he did, he would have to pay an increased insurance upon his life for travelling through a country in which there are very few roads and no bridges at all. Observe the position, then, in which the Governor-General is placed. He is surrounded by an official circle, he breathes an official air, and everything is dim or dark beyond it. You lay duties upon him which are utterly beyond the mental or bodily strength of any man who ever existed, and which he cannot therefore adequately perform.

“Turning from the Governor-General to the Civil Service, see how short the period is in which your servants in that country remain in any particular office. You are constantly criticising the bad customs of the United States, where every postmaster and many other officers lose their situations, and where others are appointed whenever a new President is elected. You never make blunders like the United States, and you will therefore be surprised at a statement given in evidence by Mr. Underhill, the Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society. He says that in certain districts in Bengal there are three or four Englishmen to 1,000,000 inhabitants, and that the magistrates are perpetually moving about. I have here the names of several gentlemen cited. Mr. Henry Lushington went to India in 1821, and remained till 1842. During the twenty-one years he filled twenty-one different offices; he went to Europe twice, being absent from India not less than four and a quarter years. Upon an average, therefore, he held his twenty-one offices not more than nine months each.”

A PERIOD OF UNPOPULARITY.

The uncompromising manner in which Mr. Bright spoke out against aggressive and unjust war, and the freedom with which he attacked what he conceived to be national abuses, like Coriolanus, “not using bolted language,” but throwing meal and husk together without distinction, rendered him at various periods unpopular, when the military spirit of the nation had been aroused. Thus in the General Election of 1857, he and his colleague, Mr. Milner Gibson, were defeated at Manchester. Soon afterwards he was returned for Birmingham. Some part of his unpopularity was due to the insulting behaviour of Lord Palmerston, who had just previously delivered a speech at a banquet, full of jests and quips, which the Member for Manchester had censured as full of unbecoming levity, at a time when the nation was involved in a grave struggle. Lord Palmerston, who was called to order by Cobden for designating Mr. Bright as the honourable and reverend gentleman, covered his opponent with insult and ridicule. It was safe to do so at that time, when England was going through a paroxysm of what has lately been described by the strong term "Jingoism," and in general may be taken to mean aggressiveness, and a tendency to boast, and to sing Rule Britannia in and out of season; but these fits seldom last long, and are generally followed by a long period of reasonableness.

A serious illness for a time interrupted his parliamentary activity. When he reappeared, the question of Parliamentary reform had again come to the front; and in 1858, Lord Derby, then at the head of affairs, brought in a somewhat half-hearted measure, obviously calculated rather to stop the mouths of the more clamorous in the Liberal party, than to bring about any real change. Mr. Bright here emphatically stood up for "a good bill, or none at all," declaring that if a half measure were passed, the anger of the country on discovering its inefficacy would be far greater than that provoked by an immediate rejection of the Bill. His voice was for something good, or nothing. The Bill was rejected. Lord Palmerston came into office, and until his death the question of reform was put aside. Lord Russell took office in 1865, and the subject came up again. Mr. Gladstone's Reform Bill of 1866 was overthrown by Mr. Lowe and the "Adullamites," though Mr. Bright defended it manfully. The Government went out; and in the next year their political opponents succeeded in outbidding them and passing a bill which considerably astonished the country party whom Mr. Disraeli declared it necessary to educate as to the political situation.

IN OFFICE ; CONCLUSION.

In 1867, Mr. Gladstone was again in power, at the head of a Liberal ministry; and he offered Mr. Bright the office of Secretary of State for India; but the latter, whose health was again failing him, accepted the less onerous post of President of the Board of Trade. Even this office brought for a time too much work for his energies, overtaxed as they had been during a long and laborious career; his health broke down utterly, and for a time his wise and weighty words were missed in the counsels of his country. Since the establishment of his health, his influence has been seen especially on two great questions. The first of these was the so-called "Burial Bill" of Mr. Osborne Morgan, to give Dissenters the right of using a form of religious service at the interment of Nonconformists in parish churchyards. His eloquent appeal for toleration went far towards procuring the settlement of that vexed question. The second was when, in 1878, the clamours of a hot-headed section of the community and the press seemed likely to precipitate the country into war with Russia. The Free Trade Hall in Manchester, built on a piece of ground given by Mr. Cobden, and with a strange irony of fate occupying the very site that had once been the scene of the "Peterloo massacre," was crowded to the doors, at a great demonstration held in favour of the maintenance of peace. On this occasion Mr. Bright acted as chairman; and the splendid welcome accorded to him proved that the heart of England had not been alienated from the great tribune of the people.

A modern historian has well described Mr. Bright's power of oratory. He says: "It is doubtful whether English public life has ever produced a man who possessed more of the qualifications of a great orator than Mr. Bright. He had a commanding presence; not, indeed, the stately and colossal form of O'Connell, but a massive figure, a large head, a handsome and expressive face. His voice was powerful, resonant, clear, with a peculiar vibration in it, which lent unspeakable effect to any passages of pathos or of scorn. His style of speaking was exactly what a conventional demagogue's ought not to be. It was pure to austerity. It was stripped of all superfluous ornament. It never gushed or foamed. It never allowed itself to be mastered by passion. The first peculiarity that struck the listener was its superb self-restraint. The orator at his most powerful passages appeared as if he were rather keeping on his strength than taxing it with effort. His voice was for the most part calm and measured; he hardly ever indulged in much gesticulation. He never, under the pressure of whatever emotion, shouted or stormed. The fire of his eloquence was a white heat, intense, consuming, but never sparkling or sputtering. He had an admirable gift of humour and a keen ironical power. He had read few books, but of those he had read he was a master."

AN APPARENTLY IMPOSSIBLE TASK.

THE story of Joseph, or Giuseppe, Garibaldi is a striking example of the oft quoted but seldom believed axiom, that truth is stranger than fiction. Hardly in history is to be found another instance of such magnificent results, obtained under circumstances apparently hopeless and desperate, as those which finally crowned the efforts of the heroic and simple-hearted liberator of Italy. Never was there a stronger instance of the power wielded by a man who, indomitable in the feeling of an honest cause, and in the attachment and sympathy of an oppressed people, strikes again and again for justice and for right; until at length, after many failures and much repeated effort, the hour comes when retribution is to follow tyranny, and a great nation is set free from its oppressors, and starts joyfully, in renewed youth, upon a fresh career.

Of all possible tasks, the unification of Italy, the binding together into one homogeneous whole, of that peninsula which sneering Metternich, the chief representative of Austrian despotism, pronounced to be, "not a country, but a geographical expression," appeared the most utterly hopeless. Even by many who fervently desired to see the country free and happy, the possibility of the success of a popular rising against the strongly established despotic powers was not for a moment contemplated; and by the majority the man who achieved the great work of Italy's liberation was looked upon as a mischievous adventurer, or at best as a Quixotic enthusiast, certain to bring destruction upon himself and upon all who should be foolish enough to follow him. But at last the hour came, and the man; the hour was in the year 1860, and the man was the decried enthusiast, who returned, strong in the consciousness of right, to the scene of his former mournful but not inglorious failure, to redeem that failure, and wipe out its very memory by an astonishing and unparalleled success; and then were the men who had been most sceptical as to the possibility of Garibaldi's success among the loudest to shout "c'era" for him in the day of his victory and triumph.

The story of his life is especially valuable as teaching the lesson of the insufficiency of mere argument by experience, in judging of the changes brought about by great undertakings. A project may fail over and over again, and yet be crowned by success at last, when time has fully prepared the ground for the seed that takes root at length.

ITALY AND HER WOES; CONDITION UNDER NAPOLEON I.; THE CONGRESS OF VIENNA.

For many generations, the fair land of Italy had suffered under the yoke laid upon her by irresponsible power.

"Man seems the only growth that wanders here," wrote Goldsmith in the middle of the last century; and went on to tell how

"Each nobler aim, repressed by long control, Expires at last, or feebly mans the soul."

But Goldsmith did not live long enough among the Italians justly to appreciate the national character. He had no idea of the fire that lay smouldering beneath the apparent indifference and carelessness of those fiery southern nations, like volcanic forces beneath a vine-clad hill, ready to burst forth when least expected. The first Napoleon, himself an Italian, understood the national spirit better, and used it, as he used everything, from the self-devotion of his soldiers to the national aspirations of the Poles, for his own advantage. Whether the "Kingdom of Rome," of which the investiture was bestowed upon the conqueror's infant son, would ever have been more than a name, is very doubtful; at any rate, the fall of Napoleon in 1814, put an end to any idea of a united Italy under imperial auspices; and the Congress of Vienna proceeded to parcel out the country among the different Powers of Europe, with a disregard of the feelings of the Italians themselves that was quite heroic in its completeness. The kingdom of Naples, which Murat, the beau sabreur, had endeavoured to retain by deserting Napoleon, his brother-in-law and benefactor, after the battle of Leipzig in 1813, was taken from that hot-brained but not unskillfully adventurer, and handed over to Ferdinand, its former Bourbon possessor, who speedily proceeded, after the fashion of his family, to demonstrate by his narrow and selfish tyranny that he had learned nothing and forgotten nothing in exile. Venetia, which had been handed over to Austria by Napoleon at the peace of Campo Formio in 1797, remained in the possession of that Power, which also retained Lombardy. The temporal government of the Pope was set up again in the States of the Church; and the part of Italy situated between these States and the Austrian possessions in the north, was parcelled out into duchies, Tuscany, Modena, Parma, etc., under the auspices and the protection of Austria; Parma and Lucra, for instance, being given for life to Marie Louise the daughter of the Austrian Emperor Francis, and the second wife of Napoleon. In the north-western corner of the Peninsula was the Kingdom of Sardinia, consisting of Piedmont, to which was now added Genoa, and the island of Sardinia; and everywhere throughout Italy irresponsible despotic government was established. The great Powers of the Continent united in that "Holy Alliance," afterwards sarcastically but justly designated as "the holy alliance of kings against the liberties of nations," which Canning, on the part of England, to his lasting honour, refused to join. It was one of the principles of this confederacy that any of its members might invoke the military assistance of the rest in putting down any movement of discontent among its subjects; and this principle was displayed in action on more than one occasion. Thus in 1823, a French army, under the Duke of Angoulême, entered Spain, and put down by force the resistance of the Cortes against the worthless king, Ferdinand, who had arbitrarily abolished the constitution he had sworn to maintain; and similarly Austrian troops crossed the frontier into Italy, to maintain the despotic power of the King of Naples, threatened with overthrow by his indignant subjects.

ITALY AND THE YEAR 1830.

The July Revolution of 1830 drove King Charles X. into exile, and gave a heavy blow to the Holy Alliance and its method of rule. For the new King, Louis Philippe, Duke of Orléans, son of that worthless "Philippe Egalité," who, after professing violent democracy, and voting for the death of his relative Louis XVI., had been unable to save his own head in the storm of the reign of terror, professed to rule as a "citizen king," called himself "Roi des Français," instead of "Roi de France," and for the time at least took his stand upon the platform of constitutional monarchy. The hopes aroused in Italy by the July revolution faded away; but there was formed in the Kingdom of Naples a secret society, under the name of the Carbonari, or charcoal-burners, having for its object the overthrow of the despotic kings, and the establishment of a constitutional government, if not of a republic. Popular discontent on the one hand was met by stern repression on the other. Military executions were the favourite method of terrorism, especially in the provinces under Austrian rule; and the dungeons of Spielberg and other fortresses were filled with prisoners whose chief offence was that they belonged to the liberal party in Italy. What these dungeons were like, and what manner of life the captives led who were incarcerated therein, may be ascertained by any one who chooses to read Silvio Pellico's account given in his "Prigioni." Such was the condition of things in Italy during the youth and early manhood of Joseph Garibaldi.

GARIBALDI'S BIRTH AND EARLY YEARS; HIS FAMILY.

This distinguished patriot was born at Nice (at that time a part of the Kingdom of Sardinia, but now the capital of the French department of the Maritime Alps), on the 22nd of July 1807. His father, Dominique Garibaldi, had come to settle there from the old Italian seaport of Chiavari, on the Bay of Rapallo, not far from Genoa. Dominique, Garibaldi's father, had been a shipowner, and he himself had served an apprenticeship to the sea in one of his father's ships; and he already owned a vessel of his own when he came to live permanently at Nice, with his young wife, Rosa Ragundo. The house in which they lived at Nice was remarkable as the building in which the great soldier of the Revolution, Marshal Masséna was born. It was destined to witness the birth of a still more remarkable man in the person of Joseph Garibaldi.

Of his mother Garibaldi always spoke with unbounded admiration and affection. "I declare with pride," he says, "that she was a perfect model of a woman. If there is any good feeling in my nature, I distinctly declare that it is from her I have derived it." He also was accustomed to express his regret at the constant anxiety caused to her by his adventurous and perilous career, and declared that, although not superstitious, in the most perilous moments of his life, he used to have a vision of her on her knees praying for him, and that this strengthened him marvellously in positions of danger and trouble. She lived to a good old age, dying in 1851, after she had seen her famous son fighting for his country at the head of the patriotic Italians in Rome, but was not spared to see the glorious part he played in the emancipation of the country, when Italy was converted into a kingdom.

A SAILOR'S CAREER CHOSEN: FIRST DREAMS OF UNITY AND LIBERTY.

Something of the roving disposition of the sailor, a strain of the salt in the blood derived from sea-going forefathers, showed itself in the disposition of the boy. He delighted in everything that appertained to the sea, and cared little for study; though his parents, themselves illiterate, but recognising the importance of learning, made various sacrifices to give him a good education. Active and daring, and even in his early boyhood a leader of others, he determined to be a sailor, and one day, in a fit of Robinson Crusoe enthusiasm, absolutely persued some of his companions to join him in a projected voyage to seek their fortunes, setting off with them in a boat from the harbour of Nice with that laudable purpose in view. They were brought back, of course, their departure having been observed with the utmost astonishment from his window by a reverend Abbé; but they had got opposite Monaco before they were overtaken. This was the first occasion, not a very successful one, in which he figured as a leader; but then he was only twelve years old.

The wish of Dominique and Rosa Garibaldi that their son should enter one of the learned professions was not likely to be fulfilled in the case of so active and enterprising a lad, and they wisely abandoned the idea of seeing him invested with academic honours, and gave way to his evident passion for the sea. Accordingly he made his first trip in the brigantine Costanza, bound for Odessa. He returned home more in love with the sea than ever; and Dominique, like a wise man, took the youngster on board his own vessel, determined that if he would needs be a sailor, he should at least be a good and efficient one.

A thorough initiation he certainly had, in storm and calm, through years of voyaging on the Mediterranean; and in a few years became captain of a coasting trader, the Notre Dame de Grèce. But while thus pursuing his vocation on the deep, his mind was not entirely engrossed by his maritime duties. A sailor's life affords many opportunities for thought, and leisure for the entertainment of dreams, when the wind is fair and the weather bright, and the ship is slipping easily through the water. Though no scholar, Joseph Garibaldi had read much of the former glory of his country, and had been deeply impressed by a visit to the eternal city, Rome; and the dream that already filled his youth, and made his heart beat quicker when he looked forward to its realization, was nothing less than the conquest of independence for his countrymen, and the setting up of a firm, united, and free kingdom of Italy. The idea at first appeared chimerical enough; for the despotic Governments were acting in strict and close concert, and all had the same interest of the most vital kind in preventing the unification of Italy, or the establishment of a government in which the people's voice should be heard. But events were occurring that irresistibly pointed towards a great change soon to take place; and those who were looking forward to the advent of a brighter day for Italy, took heart of grace in view of the events of 1830.

HOPES EXCITED BY THE EVENTS OF 1830.

In that year, the restored kingdom of the Bourbons, set up at the cost of oceans of blood and millions of treasure, was swept away in the tempest of the three days' revolution of July. The infatuated Charles X., true to the traditions of his family, had persistently endeavoured during his six years' rule to put back the clock of the world, so far as finance was concerned, to the period before 1789, and paid the penalty of his obstinacy and blindness in an exile so well deserved as to arouse little more than contemptuous pity; Louis Philippe, as already said, ascended the throne, chiefly through the good offices of the old general, Lafayette and the banker Latitte, with ardent promises of constitutionalism, and of scrupulous regard for "La Charte" and the liberties of the people. Nay more, little Belgium had followed suit. Brussels, curiously illustrating the saying, "What great effects from trivial causes spring," had risen in insurrection, after a representation of "Masaniello" at the theatre; and the country actually succeeded in shaking off the yoke of that odious union with Holland into the "Kingdom of the Netherlands," imposed by the Treaty of Vienna, and gaining an independent position as a constitutional monarchy, under Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, the widower of the Princess Charlotte of Wales. And what had been done in the west, might surely, when the time came, be achieved by unhappy and enslaved Italy.

"I positively declare," Garibaldi writes in his account of his life, "that Christopher Columbus was not more happy when, lost in the middle of the Atlantic, and threatened by his companions, of whom he had asked three days more, he heard, towards the end of the third day, the cry of 'Land!' than I was on hearing the word 'Patrie' pronounced, and seeing in the horizon the beacon kindled by the French Revolution of 1830. I knew then," he adds, "that there were men working for Italy's deliverance."

CHARLES ALBERT AND CHARLES FELIX OF PIEDMONT; NAPLES AND HER KINGS.

For the time, however, things looked black enough. The only part of Italy where a reasonable hope of constitutional government had arisen was Piedmont, where in 1821, Charles Albert, Prince of Carignano, acting temporarily as regent until the arrival of Charles Felix, who had been appointed king, had granted a constitution to the Kingdom of Sardinia; but Charles Felix, a monarch of the "divine right" school, had invoked the intervention of the Holy Alliance, and not only utterly abolished the Constitution, but inflicted merciless punishment on those who had been most active in procuring it. The edict published by this King is interesting as a specimen of the tone taken by the kings towards their subjects in the days of the reaction between 1815 and 1818. It contains the following passage:—"As it is the duty of every faithful subject to submit willingly to the order of things which he finds established by God and by the exercise of the sovereign authority, we declare that, holding our power from the Almighty alone, it is for us to choose the means which we consider to be the most suitable to promote the public weal, and that we shall consequently no longer regard any man as a faithful subject who dares to murmur against the measures which we shall think it necessary to take. We declare, therefore, as a rule of conduct for every one, that we will only recognize those as faithful subjects who make immediate submission to our authority, making a return to our States subordinate to this submission." The completeness of the "submission," demanding the "unmurmuring," slavish obedience to a single, irresponsible will, set forth as the duty of a faithful subject, is most characteristic.

But in 1831, the King, Charles Felix, died, and the Prince of Carignano, who had granted the Constitution, succeeded him, with the title of Charles Albert I., King of Sardinia. From that day many eyes were turned towards the Piedmontese Kingdom as the quarter whence deliverance might be expected to come. As yet, however, no very definite signs of that deliverance could be discerned, even afar off. In Naples, the old King, Ferdinand I., who sat on the Neapolitan throne for nearly sixty years, excepting the time of his exile in the Napoleonic period, died in his 75th year, and was succeeded by the weak and conciliating Francis I., who in turn was followed in 1830 by his son, a monarch destined to achieve a sinister reputation among his contemporaries, and to leave behind him a name loaded with the execrations of an outraged people, the infamous tyrant Ferdinand II.

SECRET SOCIETIES; THE CARBONARI, ETC.; MAZZINI AND "YOUNG ITALY."

The Carbonari and other secret societies in Italy, such as "The Consistorial Society," and the "Catholic, Apostolic and Roman Congregation," failed to accomplish the task they had set themselves; perhaps from the repugnance that will always withhold many from co-operating with associations working in the dark, and setting ordinary laws at defiance; though they undoubtedly contributed to nourish and maintain the flame of patriotism during the gloomiest portion of a dark period of tyranny and repression. It is fortunate for the reputation of Garibaldi that he was not associated with any of them; and, indeed, their activity had ceased before he was of an age to play a part in the great events of his time; for he was just the ardent, simple-hearted kind of man who might have been induced to join one of these associations upon an impulse, when smarting under the sense of tyranny and wrong; and those who joined one of the ill-omened brotherhoods, belonged to it, as it were, with body and soul; and was bound by the most tremendous of oaths to fulfil the behests of the leaders; the penalty for disobedience or treachery being death. A far healthier movement had succeeded, and was now taking the position from which the Carbonari had fallen. The party, known as "Young Italy," advocated, with tongue and pen, in spite of a rigid censorship, and an elaborate system of police repression and denunciation by spies, the principles of democratic liberty.

At the head of this movement stood Joseph Mazzini, the son of an eminent physician of Genoa, a man of liberal education and untiring energy, and thoroughly devoted to the idea of the liberation of Italy. The place of his birth was, indeed, associated from old times with the idea of republican independence and strength. The Piedmontese had long been accustomed to a despotic yoke, and were not likely to offer much opposition to the "divine right" pretensions of Charles Felix; but Genoa had been recently added to the Kingdom of Sardinia; and the descendants of the old Genoese, remembering the glories of their republic in the old days of the Doria, were the very people among whom an effort for the regeneration of Italy was likely to find favour and to flourish. Accordingly, Joseph Mazzini, as editor of newspapers advocating liberal ideas, which were as an abomination in the eyes of the absolute government, and as the chief, moreover, of the "Young Italy" party, soon became a marked man,—a man to be spied upon and arrested and imprisoned, and, when nothing directly punishable could be proved against him, to be banished from his country; all which was done to him, with the effect of making him a ten times more dangerous enemy to those who attempted to crush him than if he had remained in Italy under "surveillance." For the dream of his life was the liberation of Italy by the union of all the scattered States—Rome, Naples, Tuscany, Lombardy, Venetia, Piedmont, and the smaller duchies—into one. And when he was thus driven beyond the Italian frontiers, he came in contact with a multitude of men from various parts of his native land, and succeeded in inspiring many among them with his own views; so that the "Young Italy" party increased in importance under the guidance of this indefatigable apostle. Among those on whom he exercised a paramount influence was Giuseppe Garibaldi.

GARIBALDI AND MAZZINI; HALF-HEARTEDNESS OF CHARLES ALBERT; A DESPERATE PLOT.

In 1833, Garibaldi, as commander of a trading vessel, came to Marseilles, where Mazzini was living under the protection of the then newly-established quasi-constitutional government of Louis Philippe; for it was "early days" with the Orleanist dynasty then, and the selfish self-aggrandizing policy of the potentate, afterwards bitterly caricatured as "Robert Macaire," had not yet developed itself. Garibaldi was at once deeply impressed with the views of Mazzini, and became one of his partisans, describing him as a determined thinker whom nothing could ever turn from his purpose, and whom nothing, not even ingratitude, could discourage in the work he had once undertaken. When this interview took place, Charles Albert had been more than a year on the throne of Piedmont; and as the "Young Italy" party was ready to strike a blow for the independence of Italy, which its leaders thought, and as it turned out correctly, could only be achieved by the union of all the "Young Italy" men under one commander, a prominent member of the fraternity made an urgent appeal to the new King to come forward and direct the movement, and thus to give freedom and happiness to the country. "Place yourself at the head of the nation," said this appeal; "write upon your banner 'UNION, LIBERTY, INDEPENDENCE;' declare yourself to be both the avenger and the interpreter of popular rights; call yourself the 'Regenerator of Italy;' deliver her from the barbarians who oppress her; build up a glorious future for her; give your name to the present age, and establish an era which shall date from the commencement of your reign!"

But Charles Albert was not a man of decision; nor did he know or appreciate at its true value the strength that lies in a nation moved through its heart of hearts by a general and mighty impulse. He was afraid of the huge military power of Austria; he hesitated, evaded, and lingered: 'letting 'I dare not,' wait upon 'I would,' like the poor cat i' the adage,"—and finally left the work of Italian liberty to be accomplished by others; his own blow for fame being at last struck when the favourable conjunction was long past that would have rendered it effectual, and his career closing at last in heart-breaking failure, when the sun went down upon the lost battle of Novara.

At length, the courtiers, working upon the fears of the King, and anxious above all things to prevent him from casting in his lot with the popular party, persuaded him that a conspiracy was on foot against his authority and his life. They gained their end. An extraordinary commission was established at Turin, the capital of the Piedmontese Kingdom; civilians, tried by court-martial, were condemned to death, and executed under circumstances of exceptional cruelty. A poor sergeant was shot for the crime of reading an extract from Mazzini's Journal La Giovane Italia to the men of his company; a lieutenant for having seditious books in his possession, and so on; the testimony of the lowest police spies being considered conclusive in these cases of life and death. At Chambéry and Alexandria, as well as at Genoa, these judicial murders were perpetrated in such numbers as to excite universal horror. Mazzini also was commanded by the French Government to quit Marseilles. Thereupon a rising was projected in Genoa; and Garibaldi undertook the task of winning the Navy for the popular cause; entering for the purpose as a first-class sailor on board the Sardinian man-of-war Eurydice. It was expected that the Genoese would declare in a body for the republic, and that the flame, once lit up, would spread through Italy.

FAILURE AND FLIGHT; GARIBALDI AND MAZZINI EXILED.

But the design failed utterly. There were traitors in the camp, and the Piedmontese Government received timely notice of the intended rising. A very short combat decided the affair against the patriots. Mazzini, who had returned to Genoa, was compelled to make his way with all speed to Switzerland; and Garibaldi also understood that for him likewise there was no other alternative but the dungeon and the firing party, unless he bade farewell to Italy for a time, and consented to eat the bitter "bread of banishment." It was to South America that he bent his course; after a short stay at Marseilles, which port, to him a harbour of refuge, he managed to reach after various narrow escapes; for the Piedmontese authorities were then in their pursuit of him, and would have given but a short shrift and a volley of bullets—in the back, according to the ignominious way of executing political criminals at that time—had he fallen into their hands. Even at Marseilles, secrecy was necessary; for Louis Philippe was but a half-hearted constitutionalist, even in those early days of his rule, and would have given up the fugitive with little compunction; accordingly, Garibaldi passed under the name of Joseph Pane at Marseilles. Mazzini, of whose safety in Switzerland he heard before he quitted Europe, passed the ensuing fourteen years in exile, first in Paris and then in London; and many will remember the intense unpopularity incurred by Sir James Graham, who caused some of the letters written by and to the indefatigable head of the Young Italy party to be opened during their passage through the Post-Office. It was generally felt that an English Minister of State disgraced himself by acting the part of a police spy in the interests of despotic governments warring against the rights and liberties of their subjects; and there is reason to believe that Sir James, great and powerful as he was, heartily wished he had left Mazzini and his correspondence alone. Meanwhile a section of the press, misled by foreign calumny, and imperfectly informed on the rights of the case, took to denouncing Mazzini in no measured terms, as a man who, secure under the agis of English protection, advocated assassination, and was an enemy of the rights of property. That Mazzini was in many points a mistaken man, and that he did not weigh the objects he had in view with the extent of the means at his command, and thus often advocated harebrained enterprises, in which failure was the only probable result, is certain; but he never advocated murder or regicide, but simply upheld the right of the people, if all redress were denied them, to wrest from their rulers by force the justice denied to remonstrance, as the English in the course of their history have done over and over again.

THE SOUTH AMERICAN REPUBLIC; GARIBALDI A COMMANDER BY SEA AND LAND.

Meanwhile Garibaldi, destined to meet his friend under very different circumstances, was speeding across the Atlantic to Rio Janeiro, on board the Nautilus, Captain Beauregard, of Nantes; for he felt that for some time at least nothing was to be done in the cause of freedom, and that the people of the Italian peninsula would strike no new blow until renewed wrongs should have aroused them to vengeance. In Rio Janeiro he met with various Italians of his own way of thinking; and amongst them Rossetti, who afterwards became his lifelong and trusty friend. He found events taking place that soon gave full employment to his active and enterprising spirit. The province of Rio Grande, moved by various grievances, had renounced its allegiance to the Empire of Brazil, and declared itself a free republic. The President of the new republic, Zambecari, who had just escaped from captivity in the fortress of Santa Cruz, finding the two friends ready to fight in the cause of freedom and a republic against an empire, eagerly availed himself of their services, and granted them a letter of marque to cruise against Brazil; and in a small fishing vessel, which he named the Mazzini, with Rossetti for his lieutenant, and sixteen men for a crew, he entered on a new phase of his career, as a combatant in the struggle of the South American States. During this period he played many parts; at one time in command of vessels, and triumphantly maintaining the flag of Rio Grande against her far stronger opponent; at another, a prisoner in the hands of his enemies, and ruthlessly tortured by a ruffianly commander; now brought into contact with the grim, truculent tyrant Rosas; now complimented for his courage and prowess by the Government he loyally served. At one time he commanded an "Italian legion" in the service of the Republic, fighting like a hero, and afterwards refusing, in a dignified letter, a grant of land offered to him and the officers of the legion by the gratitude of General Rivera; declaring that, in espousing the cause of the Republic, they never expected to receive any other reward but the honour of sharing the danger incurred by the children of the country which has afforded them hospitality. "They will continue, as long as the exigencies of the siege require it," he writes, "to share the toils and perils of the noble Montevideans, but they desire no other price and no other recompense for their labours." "Consequently," he concludes, "I return you the deed of gift." This letter is a sufficient refutation of the calumnies that represented Garibaldi as a mercenary partisan leader, engaging in a strife in which he had no concern for the sake of profit and plunder.

There is no doubt that these years of adventure and warfare, during which he was repeatedly shipwrecked and wounded, and underwent almost every conceivable difficulty and danger, were of great use in exercising and developing his powers as a leader of irregular troops. That quickness of resource, that power of achieving great results with means that seemed utterly inadequate, that strange and invaluable faculty of influencing, by a word or a glance, large bodies of men, which he displayed during the gigantic struggles of his later life, were to a large extent acquired by his experiences in America. Throughout the whole period he gained the respect of his followers and opponents by his cheerful daring, simplicity, and honesty. Incorruptible and a despiser of wealth, he was yet ready to labour for his living. On those rare occasions when he had funds at his command, they were always at his friends' service. Never was there a man more simply and thoroughly disinterested. It was during this stirring time that he married the fair Anita, a Brazilian. It was a case of love at first sight, and the marriage proved an entirely happy one. Three children were born to Garibaldi, two sons, Menotti and Ricciotti, who lived to take part with their father in the glorious task of liberating Italy, and a daughter named Teresa.

And already at this period of his life the stubborn independence and disinterestedness of the man were fully displayed. At the time when he was playing a most important part in the history of the republic for which he fought, he was frequently so poor that the barest necessities of life were scarcely within his reach.

MASTAI FERRETTI, A LIBERAL POPE; GARIBALDI'S LETTER TO PIUS IX.

While Garibaldi was fighting for the independence of Monte Video, and afterwards living, as poor and contented as might be, in that far-off city beyond the Western main, important events had been taking place in Europe. The party of Young Italy had been increasing in number and in influence, in spite of all the antagonism of the native governments, the Austrians, and the Jesuits. On the death of Gregory XVI. in 1846, Mastai Ferretti was raised to the pontifical throne with the title of Pius IX.; and, to the surprise and delight of the party of progress in Italy, the new pontiff began to develop liberal tendencies, greatly at variance with the general actions of his predecessors and the traditions of the Papal see. He allowed a certain amount of freedom to the press, introduced salutary economics and reforms in the management of affairs, surrounded himself with popular and respected men, and seemed ready to inaugurate a new and better epoch for enslaved Italy. Thus the name of Pio Nono was uttered with shouts of gratulation and with evras from Turin to Palermo; and the bewildered and jealous despots, from Ferdinand of Naples to the weakest duke who leaned upon Austria for support, shuddered to find the name of the Pope associated with popular progress and reform rather than with repression. The wonderful tidings even made their way across the Atlantic, and reached Monte Video, when Garibaldi, in a characteristic letter, hastened to lay his services, and those of the survivors of the Italian Legion, at the feet of the Pontiff. "We who write thus, most illustrious and venerable lord," he says, "are those who, always animated by the same spirit which made us bear up in exile, have taken up arms at Monte Video for a cause which appeared to us just. During the five years that its walls have been besieged, each of us has more or less given proofs alike of courage and resignation. . . . If, then, to-day, the strong arms that have been used to war are accepted by His Holiness, it is unnecessary to state that we shall consecrate them more willingly than ever to the service of one who has done so much for his country and the Church." But this letter remained unanswered. Pius IX., though an amiable and well-meaning, was not a firm-hearted, man. He was alarmed at the very enthusiasm his liberalism had called forth, and within a short time put himself into the hands of a reactionary party, headed by the bad, bold Cardinal Antonelli, who, by strong and determined pressure upon him, forced him to retrace his steps, and to become the persistent enemy of the movement he had once encouraged. Receiving no reply to his somewhat sanguine offer, Garibaldi, with his friend Anzani, and the remainder of the Italian Legion, resolved nevertheless to return to Italy, to take part in the struggle which they felt sure was about to begin. "There was one obstacle to our intention, however," says Garibaldi himself, in his simple way; "we had not one of us the money to pay our passage." However, a subscription list was opened; and though the gloomy prognostications of many, who declared the exiles were returning to meet certain death, deterred many from joining, a body of sixty or seventy at last embarked for Europe, to follow the star of Garibaldi and of Italian liberty.

THE YEAR 1848; HOPES OF THE REGENERATION OF ITALY; PIEMONTESE AND AUSTRIANS.

Meanwhile in Italy, hopes swelled high in the hearts of the liberal party. In Sicily, the people rose in insurrection; and though the despot King met the movement with the command "Bombardare!" and Messina was bombarded accordingly from the citadel (an exploit whose frequent repetition in various parts of his dominions at last procured for Ferdinand the title King Bomba), the movement, continued and spread so rapidly to Naples itself, that the King was compelled to promise a Constitution, to calm the excitement. And now the Duke of Modena fled from his dominions to escape the storm; Maria Louisa, the Duchess of Parma, who had disgraced her name and family, was dead; and Charles Albert, returning once more to the principles with which he had commenced his career, and rapidly regaining his old popularity, was once more looked upon as the man under whose rule Italy might be established as one State. In Lombardy and Venetia the hatred against the "Tedeschi," the German strangers, flamed up so fiercely, that the garrison soldiers lived as in an enemy's country; and on the 22nd of February, 1848, Lombardy was declared in a state of siege.

And now Charles Albert unfurled the tricolor flag of Italian independence. In Lombardy the insurrection had burst forth, and, after an obstinate struggle of five days, the veteran Field-Marshal Radetzky was driven out of the city with his ruffianly Croats, whose atrocities, perpetrated alike on men, women, and children, proved them the true descendants of the fiends who had added a darker horror to the thirty years' war in the seventeenth century, and to the wars between Austria and Prussia in the eighteenth. The news of this great national triumph greeted the Garibaldians, as the legion may now be called, on their landing. Venice soon after compelled the Austrian commandant, Count Zichy, to capitulate, and joined the national movement. Charles Albert drew the sword, and the victory of Goito in April gave him the command of the fortress of Peschiera. Then the enthusiasm attained its height, and the youth of Italy streamed forth, under the name of Crociati, to take part in a crusade for the deliverance of their country from foreign domination. A provisional government was formed at Milan, which gave to Garibaldi the rank of General, and commissioned him to raise a body of Lombard volunteers. But, unfortunately, there was division when everything depended upon unity. Garibaldi's connection with Mazzini was well-known, and the Piedmontese authorities, looking upon Mazzini as a dangerous man of extreme and impracticable schemes, extended their jealousy to Garibaldi, whom they thwarted and annoyed in every way; even refusing uniforms and arms to his followers, many of whom became disgusted, and abandoned the undertaking altogether. Charles Albert himself had received Garibaldi with sufficient courtesy, expressing his gratification at the offer of assistance from so renowned and gallant a soldier; but responded to the General's request for active employment against the enemy by referring him to the Council at Turin, who did nothing for him. The brilliant successes of the beginning of the campaign were neutralized by want of organization and by conflicting councils and jealousies among the Italians: Radetzky recovered the ground he had lost; and before the close of 1848, Charles Albert was compelled to quit Milan, which was once again occupied by the Austrians; while the camp before Verona was entrusted to General Haynau, the commander who not long afterwards distinguished himself in Hungary by flogging women, and on a subsequent visit to London, narrowly escaped "military execution" from the whips of Barclay and Perkins's draymen.

1849; MISTAKES OF CHARLES ALBERT; BATTLE OF NOVARA; TRIUMPH OF RADETSKY.

In 1849, matters were in a still worse condition. Charles Albert was no general, and his obvious hesitation weakened the courage of his troops. He chose paltry positions, and allowed the Austrians to establish themselves on ground from which they should have been excluded: and old "Father Radetzky" was just the man to take advantage of errors of this kind. Thus the decisive battle of Novara was fought, under every disadvantage to Charles Albert, whose army was badly posted, badly supported, and cut off from expected reinforcements. Thus, on the evening of that fatal day, the poor King mournfully declared that, having twice sought death in vain, he offered himself as a sacrifice to his country, laying down his crown in favour of his son; whereupon he rode mournfully away towards the Austrian outposts. He was allowed to withdraw to Nice, and after a few months of broken-hearted retirement, died at Oporto in Portugal.

Then, indeed, in Northern Italy, all was lost. Discouragement took the place of enthusiasm when the news of Novara was confirmed. Haynau took Brescia, after a brave resistance, and scenes of rapine and violence, such as had scarcely been witnessed since the great Napoleonic wars disgraced the entry of the Austrians into the conquered city. Venice still held out, but was closely blockaded by the Austrians, and at length, at the end of August, was compelled to capitulate; Radetzky entering the city in triumph on the 30th.

It was a miserable failure; but one lesson had been impressed upon the nations of Europe, who looked on in wonder; there was now no doubt that the Italians could fight to the death in a cause in which their sympathies were once thoroughly enlisted, and it was equally certain that centuries of oppression and tyranny had not crushed their national spirit out of them.

EVENTS IN ROME; THE REPUBLIC PROCLAIMED; ARRIVAL OF GARIBALDI.

In Rome, a remarkable and continually increasing excitement existed all through the memorable year of revolutions, 1848. The liberalism of Pius IX., of which by this time he heartily repented, had brought to the Holy City men from all parts and of all shades of opinion, including a number of the most intractable and ferocious of red republicans. To stem the torrent, the Pope had chosen as his Minister the astute and moderate Rossi, formerly ambassador to France, whose influence he hoped might pour oil upon the troubled waters. But a number of fanatics saw in the honest Minister an enemy of freedom; he was mobbed on the day of the opening of the Chambers, the 15th of November, and was killed with a dagger, thrust by a wretch named Constantadini, who, moreover, was not convicted of the murder until nearly six years afterwards.

A republic was then proclaimed by the most violent section of the democrats, and compelled the unhappy pontiff to sign a list of Ministers headed by two liberals. Soon afterwards he escaped from the city in disguise, and betook himself to Gaeta, from whence he issued a protest repudiating the action taken in Rome. Mazzini arrived soon after, and, with Saffi and Armellini, undertook the Government. Garibaldi was sent for, and soon after arrived. On the 28th of April, 1849, he marched into Rome, at the head of the remnant of his old comrades of Monte Video, and a motley crew of volunteers, in red blouses and red coats, to the number of 2,500 men.

An eye-witness gives the following description of his personal appearance at this time:—"He is a man of middle height, his countenance scorched by the sun, but marked with lines of antique purity. He sat his horse as calmly and firmly as if it had been a part of him. Beneath his hat—broad-brimmed, with a narrow loop, and ornamented with a black ostrich feather—spread a forest of hair; a red beard covered all the lower part of his face. Over his red shirt was thrown an American poncho, white, lined with red, like his shirt. His staff wore the red blouse; and afterwards, the whole Italian Legion adopted that colour. Behind him galloped his groom Aguyar, a stalwart negro, dressed in a black cloak, and carrying a lance with a black pennant. All who had come with him from America wore pistols and poniards of fine workmanship in their belts, and carried whips of buffalo skin in their hands.

FRENCH INTERVENTION; SIEGE OF ROME; HEROIC RESISTANCE AND RENEWED FAILURE.

Austria and Naples took up the cause of the Pope, and sent their armies to invade the Roman dominions from different quarters, so that Garibaldi, to whom the defence of Rome was entrusted, had a difficult task to perform. But the heaviest blow was struck from the direction of France. Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, the President of the new French Republic, once himself a Carbonari, but now deeply impressed with the importance of gaining the suffrage of the clerical party in France, thoroughly understood that he could take no better means of gaining that important object than by re-establishing the Papal dominion in Rome; and a large force was despatched under General Oudinot to Civita Vecchia, whence they marched to the capital and besieged the city. The exertions of Garibaldi in the defence of Rome were almost superhuman, and the manner in which he attacked his various foes in turn would not have disgraced a veteran commander of regular armies. Oudinot was beaten back and compelled to retire to Civita Vecchia to await reinforcements. It was only by a piece of treachery, in the violation of an armistice, that the city was at last taken. It is exceedingly creditable to Garibaldi, that, recognising the point at which further resistance became useless, he manfully gave his opinion to Mazzini, who, with unfortunate obstinacy, ignorant as he was of military affairs, refused to acknowledge the unwelcome truth, and caused many valuable lives to be sacrificed in defence of an untenable position that ought to have been preserved for a more propitious day. At length a mournful manifesto had to be issued, declaring in the name of the triumvirs that the further defence of Rome had become impossible, and must be discontinued. After three months' siege, Rome fell to an overwhelming force, seconded by unscrupulous perfidy. On leaving Rome, Garibaldi still expressed his determination to fight to the last against Austrian and Neapolitan tyranny. "Soldiers," he cried, "I have nothing to offer you but hunger, thirst, the bare earth for a bed, the heat of the sun as a solace for your fatigues, no pay, no barracks, no rations, nothing but continual alarms, forced marches, and bayonet charges. Let those who love glory, and who do not despair of Italy, follow me!" And such was his influence that nearly 5,000 men responded to his appeal.

GARIBALDI AGAIN A SAILOR; DESPOTISM RE-ESTABLISHED IN ITALY; NAPLES.

It was Garibaldi's intention to force his way through to Venetia; but the Austrians were in overwhelming force in the northern provinces; and the plan was impracticable. During this unfortunate year the General lost his devoted wife Anita, who died of pure exhaustion on the retreat. He himself retired to Caprera, a little island off the north-east coast of Sardinia, since rendered famous by his residence. Then he turned his face once more to the west, resolved to earn his living by some honest industry in the New World, till better days should dawn upon his country. His young children were consigned to the care of the faithful friends of his youth, Monsieur and Madame Deideri, of Nice. In 1861 his daughter Teresa married Major Ganzio, of Genoa.

In New York, in 1850, he was earning his living by making and selling candles, in a small shop next door to a tobacco store kept by his friend and comrade General Joseph Avezzana. After this he went to Peru, and once more took to the sea for a livelihood, obtaining the command of a vessel trading to China. Returning in 1854 to the United States, he became captain of an American trader, the Commonwealth. Thence returning to Europe, he commanded a steamer trading between Nice and Marseilles; and this position he held for several years.

Then absolutism in Italy, though sorely shaken by the events of 1848 and 1849, obtained a new lease; and in the case of Naples at least it appeared as though the ruler had been anxious to show how entirely the lesson of the "revolution years" had been thrown away. The ruthless tyrant Ferdinand II. seemed bent on parading the ugliest features of his wretched system of government before the eyes of disgusted and indignant Europe. He inflicted tortures worthy of the palmy days of the Inquisition upon political prisoners. The foremost members of the abolished parliament, among them Carlo Poerio the patriot, were loaded with chains, compelled to sweep the streets, and confined in loathsome dungeons. The priests, the lazzaroni, and his numerous army, especially the Swiss Guard, were the instruments by which he ruled; and to the remonstrances of the Cabinets of England and France, especially to a warning despatch from Lord Palmerston and John Russell, pointing out that the course he was pursuing must ultimately lead to the downfall of his throne, he listened with cynical indifference. His trust was in the guns of the Castle of St. Elmo, a fortress on the heights above Naples, from which "Bomba" could convert Naples into a heap of ruins in a few hours. At length diplomatic relations were almost entirely suspended between Naples and the Western Powers, and the miserable king was left to his own infatuation. Meanwhile the Crimean War was fought; the Piedmontese troops gained no small amount of credit at the battle of the Tchernaya; and Sardinia had a voice in the Treaty of Paris in 1856. The year 1859 saw Napoleon III. at war with Austria, with Victor Emmanuel, the son of Charles Albert, as his ally; and Austria, defeated at Magenta and Solferino, gave up Lombardy to France; and Napoleon transferred the territory to Victor Emmanuel, in return for Nice and Savoy, annexed by secret treaty to France, to the great indignation of Garibaldi, who thus found himself transformed, entirely against his will, to a French subject.

1859; LOMBARDY GAINED FOR ITALY.

At this time Garibaldi was residing at Caprera, which he had bought for £520, having succeeded to an inheritance of £1,600 some years before by the death of his mother. Count Cavour, whose wise moderation swayed the councils of Victor Emmanuel in 1859, considered that the name and prowess of Garibaldi might be useful in the campaign, and enlisted his services against Austria. Garibaldi at once quitted his retirement at Caprera, and had several interviews with Victor Emmanuel, in which each of the men took a thorough liking to the other. Garibaldi was put in command of a band of volunteers, with the rank of Major-General.

That campaign at length settled the question of Italian unity, though the work was not completed until later. The old Garibaldians rallied round their leader, and took a glorious part in the struggle, though Della Marmora, the Head of the War Department, and something of a red-tapist, was disposed to look down upon them as irregulars, talked of the necessity for more discipline and less dash, and affected to think lightly of Garibaldi himself, as a guerilla chief. But the effects of that campaign were marvellous. The power of Austria in Italy was broken. The central portion of the peninsula, consisting of the duchies of Tuscany, Modena, Parma, and Lucca, declared for Victor Emmanuel, and clamoured for annexation to the Piedmontese Kingdom. No longer supported by Austria, the princes of those duchies fled precipitately; and the work was proceeding bravely, when the Treaty of Villafranca suddenly stopped the course of victory. One of the articles of that convention stipulated for the restoration of the fugitive dukes; but that article the Italian people repudiated altogether, and refused to receive back the protégés of the Austrians.

FRANCIS II.; GARIBALDI'S EXPEDITION OF 1860; ASTONISHING SUCCESS.

Garibaldi, who had proposed a scheme of arming the nation generally, was bitterly disappointed at this sudden end, as it appeared, permanent halt in the triumphant march towards Italian unity. An event had occurred which opened to him a path in which he and his men could work without the necessity of consulting diplomatic necessities and doubts. The tyrant Ferdinand was dead, and had been succeeded by his weak, vacillating son, Francis II. On the throne of Bomba the hated and dreaded, sat Bombalino, or Bomba the little, the despised, notoriously incapable, a mere tool in the hands of the priestly party. Disturbances in various parts of the Neapolitan Kingdom, and in the capital itself, though put down by the large military force maintained by the King, showed the direction of public opinion; and now the "guerilla chief" entered upon a course of action of such desperate boldness that it was denounced as mere botheaded temerity, until vindicated by a most astonishing and unparalleled success.

At the beginning of May 1860, an expedition left the harbour of Genoa bound for Sicily. Garibaldi had with him about 1,000 men, including many of his old Lombard companions. In the sight of the Neapolitan frigates they landed at Marsala, near the western extremity of the island, and proceeded at once, strengthened by some of the natives who joined them, to march against the 25,000 Neapolitan troops posted in and around Palermo. Though supported by a naval squadron, the royal troops were worsted at Monreale and Catalafimi. They then retired into Palermo. New disembarkations swelled the army of Garibaldi to about 20,000 men; and with these, and a few field pieces, he invested Palermo. The panic and incapacity of the Neapolitan troops and their officers is almost incredible. The garrison evacuated Palermo after a short resistance, and the enterprise that had at first appeared the most utterly hopeless among the many efforts for Italian liberation, began to assume the proportions of a great and hopeful success.

King Francis was bewildered by these astonishing events; he showed nothing but weakness, inconsistency, and terror in the crisis. With a vague remembrance of his lamented father's policy in similar cases, he ordered the bombardment of Palermo; but he acquiesced in the capitulation of his troops, and did nothing to restore confidence among those who were still numerically by far the stronger party. After being beaten at Melazzo, the Neapolitan troops retired into the citadel of Messina, and Garibaldi took possession of the island, proclaiming himself Dictator. Then the unhappy King promised to grant a Constitution, and appealed to England and France for help against the revolutionists; but, as may be supposed, his prayer was disregarded.

THE KINGDOM OF ITALY SET UP; GARIBALDI AND VICTOR EMMANUEL.

In Northern Italy, the enthusiasm at the news of these astonishing successes was tremendous. Everywhere volunteers were ready to set forth and to inaugurate a crusade for the unification of Italy. The great object of the Sarlinian Government was to obtain the sanction of the French Emperor for a movement they could no longer control. The Ministers, Cavour and Farina, had an interview with Napoleon III., who was making a progress through his new dominions on the Italian frontier, and an understanding was speedily arrived at. In August, the army of Garibaldi crossed the Straits into Italy; and the result of the interview with the French Emperor was seen in a summons from Sardinia to the Pope to dismiss his foreign legions. Upon his refusal, the States of the Church were invaded by a great Piedmontese army; and thus the work was proceeding at once in north and south. The Papal troops were beaten and dispersed; Lamoricière, an exiled French General who commanded them, being obliged at last to capitulate in the fortress of Ancona. Garibaldi meanwhile advanced rapidly upon Naples itself; the King, with his 50,000 regulars, falling back upon Capua and Gaeta. The splendid battle of the Volturno added another to Garibaldi's triumphs; and the King, Francis, shut himself up with his discomfited troops in the strong fortress of Gaeta.

And now occurred another of those pauses, infinitely annoying to the impatience of the single-minded hero, who announced his intention to declare the liberation of Italy from the summit of the capital in Rome, but exceedingly necessary to consolidate what had been won where various and conflicting interests had to be consulted. Garibaldi was no diplomatist. "Je ne sais que trancher avec l'épée," was his own account of himself; but every Gordian knot was not to be thus cut. His desire was simply to drive all foreign domination out of Italy—to expel the French from Rome and the Austrians from Venetia; and he never doubted his ability, backed by the nation, to effect both these objects. But Cavour and the Cabinet at Turin knew better. To provoke a combat with the two great Powers would simply have been fatal to the splendid prospects now rising brightly for Italy. The danger was, that Garibaldi, simple-minded, honest, and unsuspecting as he was, might be made a tool in the hands of the extreme party, who would be sure to unite all the established Governments against them. But the unselfish loyalty of Garibaldi averted the danger. The flame of his patriotism never shone with a brighter ray than in this year, the time of his great and unexampled success. He surrendered his power as Dictator into the hands of Victor Emmanuel, whom he hailed as King of Italy. With the King he entered Naples; and then, like Cincinnatus, retired to his little island of Caprea, refusing any office or emolument from the monarch whose territory he had more than doubled.

REASONS FOR GARIBALDI'S RETIREMENT; THE TRIUMPH AND THE DEPARTURE.

That Garibaldi best consulted his own honour and dignity in thus withdrawing, like Cincinnatus, directly the work he had set himself to do was accomplished, there is no doubt. His ideas were to some extent visionary, and the King exercised a very wise discretion in forbidding him to march on Rome. Neither with Cavour nor Farini, moreover, the Ministers of Victor Emmanuel, could he have acted, with any prospect of success. To the single-minded and enthusiastic leader, the wise caution of Cavour, the greatest and most reliable of the King's advisers, appeared like timidity that even approached cowardice; inasmuch that he even quarrelled with Cavour, while he regarded Farini with the deepest suspicion.

On the triumphant entry into Naples, the English were nationally represented by the presence of the English legion of Garibaldians, a force recruited chiefly in London, and despatched in two steamers to Italy. They were ready to do good service, though they arrived too late to take part in the most arduous part of the struggle. The triumphal spectacle in Naples, when the English brigade landed, and the King and the liberator rode side by side through the streets of the city, is graphically told by one who witnessed it:—"It was a sultry, drizzling morning, and we were in despair lest the brilliant spectacle might be spoilt by the rain. As ten o'clock, however, approached, the sun deigned to shine on us a little, and then retired into his gloomy reserve; and so he continued yielding and sulking the whole day. There was brightness, however, just enough to put us in good humour; so, early in the morning, every one of us turned out. The Neapolitans, of course, are out in the prima mattina, so fond are they of spectacle; and it would require a brush dipped in the rainbow to paint all that passed before me on this striking occasion of the landing of 650 of our countrymen.

"We took up our place under the balcony from which Ferdinand II. periodically reviewed whole regiments of monks, following in procession the image of their patron saint. What a mighty change! The ladders were planted against the gateway, and the lilies had not only faded, but had been removed by the hands of workmen at 1s. 8d. a-day. I remember a year ago, when the war in Lombardy was raging, that Englishmen were pooh-poohed in Naples, and now they are overwhelmed with honours. Why? Because we have spent our thousands for the Italian cause? No! This change of feeling is a homage to our national integrity and consistency; and let every Englishman remember that he is an element in the composition of the nation, and is bound, as a true son of his country, to stand by and maintain the eternal principles of honour. Here they are surging on, and music and clapping of hands announce at last that the real business of the day is beginning. The flags of the National Guard appear above the ascent from the arsenal, and then the newly-created militia—really fine-looking, military men; and they are greeted on all sides with 'vivas' sung to the tunes of Garibaldi and Victor Emmanuel.

"There is a great display of white handkerchiefs, and the clapping of hands is redoubled as the English appear: and all pass under the palace windows, flanked and thronged by thousands of spectators, who applaud them to the echo. They carry the tricoloured flag, with 'Viva Victor Emmanuel' inscribed on it. . . . Look round on the scene. How gay, striking, and impressive! Sullen and gloomy looks the royal palace behind; the palaces on either side are all filled with people. Just in front are the equestrian statues of the Bourbons, covered up with sheets; and the long legs of one of them peep out, as if threatening to kick us all over, if he could. After a few minutes' pause all are in motion again towards the Toledo, where every window is decorated with a flag; and the spectacle is as grand and as brilliant as it can well be imagined. There is a sea of human heads. In some windows flowers and evergreens are showered down; 'vivas' are shouted, and handkerchiefs are waved from all. Some dirty young gamins were calling out, 'Viva nostri fratelli l'inglesi!' It is always pleasant to find relatives turn up unexpectedly in a foreign land, especially if they do not make exorbitant demands upon the pocket; but as I looked upon our new connections, I felt that, except on the most Christian principle, I should be indisposed to acknowledge the relationship.

"Were I to write a ream, I could only repeat what I have already said—it was a brilliant spectacle. It was a kind and courteous reception on the part of the Neapolitans, who are as kindhearted a people as any on earth, and who are what they are, not because they have not all the elements of good within them, but because the image of God within them has been defaced by brutal rulers, and yet more by an ignorant, superstitious, abundant, and self-seeking priesthood."

It must have been an impressive sight, when Garibaldi, the Republican free-lance, and Victor Emmanuel, the King born in the purple, publicly grasped each other's hands, the King attired in a glittering field-marshal's uniform, and attended by a brilliant staff, the General in the red shirt and wideawake, that, like Napoleon's grey "redingote" coat, had become historical, and followed by a battered troop with "lank, lean cheeks and war-worn coats."

A few days afterwards, Garibaldi, loyally anxious to avoid any occasion of quarrel or disunion that might retard the great work he had undertaken, and had thus far loyally carried out, voluntarily disappeared from the scene. He went to pay a farewell visit to the English Admiral, Mundy, on board the Hannibal, who received him with the honours due to a general officer. An hour after, the ex-Dictator, having utterly and completely divested himself of the mighty power he had wielded, embarked on board the steamer Washington, which was to convey him to his island home. The vessel that bore the great Italian to Caprera could not have been more appropriately named; for he himself had every right to be associated in men's minds with the great American patriot, who, after securing his country's liberties, had given up the command with an equally sublime abnegation of self, when the work he had undertaken had been successfully and triumphantly accomplished.

Thus, after taking leave of his weeping followers, who lingered long on the shore watching the Washington as she steamed out of Naples Harbour, Garibaldi disappeared from the scene he had for some months filled with his deeds to the admiration of Europe: and the grandest epoch of his life was brought to a close.

GARIBALDI AT HOME; DOMESTIC ECONOMY IN CAPRERA.

The proclamation in which he announced his retirement is terse and to the point. "Neapolitans," he says, "the two Sicilies, which owe their redemption to the blood of the Italians, and have made me their Dictator, form an integral and indivisible part of Italy, under the constitutional King, Victor Emmanuel, and his descendants. I shall place in the hands of the King on his arrival the dictatorship conferred on me by the nation.—G. Garibaldi."

When he retired to Caprera, after handing over a kingdom to Victor Emmanuel, he was informed that the funds at his disposal amounted to just £30. "Never mind," he said, "we have plenty of corn and wool at Caprera, which we can send to Maddalena for sale."

Nothing could well be plainer than the house occupied by Garibaldi at Caprera. Before 1861, when he undertook some improvements, it consisted of a small square white house, only one storey in height, and surmounted by a kind of cupola. "The white house," says Colonel Vecchi, who visited the General in 1861, "is situated on a level spot, shut in on one side by great rocks, and on the other by walls, the gate in which is a movable rail, a horizontal pole such as is used to let horses in and out of a meadow. There is a path running all round it. In front, on the other side of the path, some poles are stuck in the ground to make a trellis for the vines in summer. On entering, there is a vestibule which opens on the left into the room where Teresita and Madame Deideri sleeps; on the right, into the chamber occupied by the General. At the back is a staircase leading up to the roof and terrace; the short, dark passage leads to a small bedroom and to the kitchen. Here, on the right, is the wine-cellar; on the left, a pantry, from which you pass into the secretary's room, which is also a bedroom, and the arsenal. In August, when I first visited the house, there was only one chair, and that had no back. Now there are some new maple-wood chairs, presented by the officers and crew of the Washington, with the donors' names inscribed on the back, and some walnut-wood chairs belonging to Deideri. The hero's room, also, is more comfortably furnished. It contains a small, plain iron bedstead, with muslin curtains hanging from a cane tester, a walnut-wood writing-table, and a chest of drawers, with a dressing glass on the top, blocking up a window that looks towards the north. Close to the bed stands a deal stool, covered with books and letters. On a cord stretched from the walls across the room are hung to dry the General's red shirts and various other garments, for he changes his clothes every time he changes his occupation. The fireplace is in the middle of the wall at the end of the room; some logs are always kept blazing in it on account of the damp, for beneath the stone floor is the cistern which receives the water from the gutters when it rains, and this causes the flags to be always slimy and wet. On each side of the fireplace are bookcases containing works on shipping, history, and military tactics; but books and bundles of papers, to tell the truth, are all around, lying on every available piece of furniture. Over the mantelpiece hangs a portrait, in watercolours, of his infant daughter Rosita, who died at Montevideo. At the head of the bed, in an ebony frame, hangs a lock of hair of his wife Anita, the brave woman who is no more. There never was a more simple Spartan retreat chosen by a hero.

COUNT CAVOUR; EXPEDITION OF 1862; ASPRONTE; GARIBALDI A PRISONER.

In 1861, the first Parliament of the Kingdom of Italy was opened at Turin. Garibaldi had been elected as deputy for Naples, but was unable to take his seat at the opening from ill-health. Soon after, however, he appeared in the assembly, and a kind of reconciliation was effected between him and Count Cavour, to whom he had been bitterly hostile, on account of Cavour's cession of Nice and Savoy to France.

Soon after this, to the great loss of Italy, to whose unification his astuteness and moderation had largely contributed, Count Cavour died. He was succeeded by Ricasoli and Rattazzi, neither of whom possessed the confidence of the nation in a very large degree. Rattazzi, wishing to gain the favour of the "party of action," to whom the possession of Rome and Venetia, in the teeth of Austrian and French opposition, appeared a feasible project, made overtures to Garibaldi, which resulted in a complete misunderstanding; for the General became convinced that an expedition to Venice or Rome, if he chose to undertake it, would be connived at, if not directly assisted, by the Government. But he found himself grievously mistaken. The enrolment of volunteers for an attack on Venetia was promptly stopped by Government interference; and Garibaldi, loudly proclaiming his dissatisfaction, proceeded southwards, everywhere giving expression to his feelings in a manner as frank as it was imprudent. He could not understand what Rattazzi could possibly have wanted him for, if not for the liberation of Venetia and Rome. He proceeded to Sicily, where Pallavicini, a friend and partisan of his own, was in command; and, at a rifle meeting at Palermo, where Prince Humbert, the King's eldest son, was present, he openly declared his intention of organizing another expedition. This was the time at which the illegality of the proposed action, and the impossibility of sanctioning the levying of private war by a subject, should have been clearly pointed out to him, with a positive command from the King to desist,—a command to which Garibaldi, in his loyalty, would not have failed to obey. But Rattazzi continued to tempo-rise; and the liberator crossed from Sicily to the mainland, with the idea of contributing further to the unification of Italy by a march on Rome. What mischief, perhaps irreparable, might have been done had he come into contact with the French troops, and thus aroused the French Empire against the newly-established kingdom, it is impossible to say. But his expedition soon came to an untimely and a mournful end. Cialdini and Della Marmora, convinced that his proceedings were certainly mischievous, and might not improbably be fatal to Italy, took vigorous steps to encounter him as an enemy to the public peace. At Aspromonte, in Calabria, he found himself face to face with a body of Bersaglieri, light troops in the royal service. A skirmish took place; and, at the first discharge, Garibaldi was wounded slightly in the hip, and severely in the ankle. The order to cease firing was at once given; and both sides looked mournfully at the spectacle of the liberator and patriot wounded by an Italian bullet, and a prisoner. He was carried to Spezzia, and thence to Varignano. His imprisonment, however, was little more than nominal. Throughout all Europe the greatest sympathy was expressed. From London and Paris the most eminent surgeons were despatched to consult over his wound and assist in its cure; and soon afterwards he was once more at his island home in Caprera.

THE GENERAL'S LATER YEARS; REALISATION OF HIS HOPES; VENICE AND ROME; CONCLUSION.

Cheered once more by the affection and sympathy of a gallant nation, and with his couch surrounded by a number of attached friends, Garibaldi gradually recovered his health; and with returning strength his hopes revived for the completion of Italian liberty. The necessity of waiting on the goodwill of the autocrat in the Tuilleries was very bitter, but he saw the necessity of it; and meanwhile the work was not abandoned, though delayed. In 1864, Garibaldi paid a visit to England, where he was received with an outburst of affectionate welcome and popular enthusiasm that is said to have provoked official remonstrance from Napoleon III. Two years afterwards, in 1866, Italy had a new opportunity, in the war that broke out between Austria and Prussia. Italy took part in the contest as an ally of Prussia; and although the campaign in itself brought no triumphs, it resulted in the cession of Venetia by Austria to France, and the transfer of the long-desired province to the Kingdom of Italy. And this, while helping to build up the edifice of Italian unity, was in itself an advantage to Austria, who was enabled to relinquish a position in Italy alike dangerous and costly. Garibaldi was sure to be found present at such a contest. He was placed in command of a volunteer force in the Tyrol; but the campaign was too short to give any great opportunity for warlike achievement, the battle of Sadowa overthrowing Austria's power at a blow.

In the next year, 1867, Garibaldi and his followers once more prepared to march to Rome, but once again, though his bands actually crossed the Roman frontier, state policy arrested the movement. At last, in 1870, the Franco-Prussian war compelled the withdrawal of the French garrison from Rome; and the Government of the Pope fell virtually without a struggle, and the Italian troops entered Rome. Here again Garibaldi, though more than sixty years old, took the field; but his career was ended, and his political life aptly concludes with the proclamation of Rome as the capital of the Kingdom of Italy.

IN EARLY LIFE.

WILLIAM PITT, the first Earl of Chatham, was descended from a highly respectable family in Cornwall, and was born in London on the 15th of November, 1708. He was educated at Eton, where he was distinguished for his habits of unwearied application, in spite of his suffering frequently from hereditary gout. Here he acquired that love of the classics which he carried with him throughout life, and which had so strong an influence on his character as an orator, and he also formed at Eton those habits of easy and animated conversation for which in after life he was so celebrated.

The state of his health forbidding him to indulge in the active sports of the school, he and Lord Lyttleton, a still greater invalid than himself, found their chief pleasure during the intervals of study in the lively interchange of thought. Thus it may readily be supposed they acquired that quickness of thought, that dexterity of reply, and that ready self-possession which are indispensable to success in public debate.

At the age of eighteen, Pitt was removed to the University of Oxford. Here, in addition to his other studies, he entered on a severe course of rhetorical training, to which he often afterwards referred, as forming an important part of his early discipline. He wrote out translations of the ancient orators and historians on the broadest scale. Demosthenes was his model, and he rendered a large part of his orations again and again into English, as the best means of acquiring a forcible and expressive style.

By way of gaining a command of words, he read and re-read the sermons of Dr. Barrow till he knew many of them by heart. With the same object he went twice through the folio dictionary of Bailey (the best before that of Johnson), examining each word attentively, dwelling on its peculiar import and mode of construction, and thus endeavouring to bring the whole range of language completely under his control. At this time also he began those exercises in elocution by which he is known to have obtained his extraordinary powers of delivery. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that no man of genius since the days of Cicero has ever submitted to an equal amount of drudgery.

Leaving the university a little before the regular time of graduation, Pitt travelled on the Continent, and particularly in France and Italy. During this tour he enriched his mind with a great variety of historical and literary information, making everything subservient, however, to the one great object of preparing for public life.

AS A MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT.

On returning to England, he applied a large part of his slender patrimony to the purchase of a commission in the army, and became a cornet of the Blues. This made him dependent on Sir Robert Walpole, then Prime Minister; but with his habitual boldness he took his stand about this time in the ranks of Opposition. Walpole by his jealousy had made almost every man of talent in the Whig party his personal enemy. His long continuance in office against the wishes of the people was considered a kind of tyranny; and young men like Pitt and Lyttleton, who came fresh from college, with an ardent love of liberty, inspired by the study of the classics, were naturally drawn to the standard of Pulteney, Carteret, and the other leading "patriots" who vehemently declaimed against a corrupt and oppressive government.

The Prince of Wales having quarrelled with his father, had now come out as head of the Opposition. A rival court was established at Leicester House, within the very precincts of St. James's Palace, which drew together such an assemblage of wits, scholars, and orators as had never before met in the British empire.

Pitt became a member of Parliament for the small borough of Old Sarum in 1735. For nearly a year he remained silent, studying the temper of the House, and waiting for a favourable opportunity to come forward. Such an opportunity was presented by the marriage of the Prince of Wales in April, 1736. It was an event of the highest interest and joy to the nation; but such was the king's animosity against his son, that he would not suffer the address of congratulation to be moved as usual by the ministers of the Crown. The motion was brought forward by Mr. Pulteney, and it shows the high estimate put upon Pitt, that when he had not yet opened his lips in Parliament, he should have been selected to second the motion, in preference to some of the most able and experienced members of the House. His speech was received with the highest applause, but it was wormwood and gall to the king. It awakened in his mind a personal hatred of Pitt, which, aggravated as it was by subsequent attacks of a more direct nature, excluded him for years from the service of the Crown, until he was forced upon a reluctant monarch by the demands of the people.

Sir Robert Walpole, as might be supposed, listened with alarm to the eloquence of his youthful opponent, and is said to have exclaimed, "We must at all events muzzle that terrible cornet of horse." Without giving him time to make another speech, he deprived him of his commission within eighteen days. This, however, only rendered the court more odious, while it created a general sympathy in favour of Pitt, and turned the attention of the public with new interest to his speeches in Parliament. As a compensation for the loss of his commission, the Prince appointed him Groom of the Bedchamber at Leicester House.

Thus, at the age of twenty-seven, Pitt was made, by the force of his genius and the influence of concurrent circumstances, one of the most prominent members of Parliament, and an object of the liveliest interest to the great body, especially the middle classes, of the nation. These classes were now rising into an importance never before known.

They looked on Sir Robert Walpole, sustained as he was in power by the will of the Sovereign and the bribery of Parliament, as their natural enemy. Pitt shared in all their feelings. He was in truth "the Great Commoner."

The next remarkable speech of Pitt's which is reported is that celebrated reply to Horace Walpole the elder, beginning, "The atrocious crime of being a young man." We know that this speech was modelled into its present shape by Dr. Johnson, and it certainly is a striking example of sententious sarcasm; but the balanced structure of the phrases and the measured amplification of the ideas are so entirely Johnsonian—so ultra-Johnsonian, indeed—that we are satisfied that it affords little resemblance to the vivid and energetic invective of the original.

Archdeacon Coxe asserts, indeed, that this celebrated retort existed only in Johnson's imagination, and repeats an anecdote told him by Lord Sydney to show how slender was the foundation on which this supposed philippic was formed. In a debate in which Pitt and some of his younger friends had violently attacked old Horace Walpole, the latter complained of the self-sufficiency of the young men of the period, on which Pitt got up with great warmth, beginning with these words, "With the greatest reverence for the grey hairs of the honourable gentleman," upon which Walpole pulled off his wig and showed his head covered with grey hairs, which occasioned general laughter, in which Pitt joined, and the dispute subsided.

Now Lord Sydney's anecdote is perfectly true, for we find it told at the time it happened in one of the younger Horace's letters to Sir Horace Mann; but this does not decide the question, for however strange and improbable it may appear that there should have been two incidents of this nature between the same parties, the fact seems certain. The affair of the wig occurred on the 21st of November, 1745, whereas the celebrated retort was delivered on the 10th of March, 1741, and is printed in the Gentleman's Magazine for that year; so that Archdeacon Coxe was certainly mistaken in supposing that Johnson's report was an amplification of an event which did not happen till four years later.

As to many of the measures for which Walpole was hated by the people and opposed by Pitt, time has shown that they were in the wrong and he in the right. It has also been shown that nearly all the great leaders of the Opposition, the Pultneys and Carterets, were unprincipled men who played on the generous sympathies of Pitt and Lyttleton, and lashed the prejudices of the nation into rage against the minister for no other purpose than to obtain his place. Still the struggle of the people, though in many respects a blind one, was prompted by a genuine instinct of their nature, and was prophetic of an onward movement in English society.

THE FIRST PERIOD OF PITT'S CAREER, 1735-1744.

On briefly tracing the career of Pitt as a statesman, we shall divide his public life into distinct periods, and consider them separately with reference to his measures in Parliament.

The first period covers nearly ten years, down to the close of 1744. All this time he was an active member of the Opposition, being engaged for nearly seven years in unwearying efforts to put down Sir Robert Walpole, and when this was accomplished, in equally strenuous exertions for three years longer to resist the measures of his successor, Lord Carteret. This minister had rendered himself odious to the nation by encouraging the narrow views and sordid policy of the king in regard to his continental possessions. George II. was born in Hanover, and he always consulted its interests before those of Great Britain, seeking to throw on the national treasury the burden of supporting the Hanoverian troops during his wars on the Continent, and giving the Electorate, in various other ways, a marked preference before the rest of the empire.

To these measures Pitt opposed himself with all the energy at his command. It was on this subject that he first came into collision on the 10th of December, 1742, with his great antagonist Murray, afterwards Lord Mansfield. Oswald, a well-known literary man of the period, who was present, thus describes the two combatants: "Murray spokelike a pleader, who could not divest himself of the appearance of having been employed by others. Pitt spoke like a gentleman—like a statesman who felt what he said, and possessed the strongest desire of conveying that feeling to others, for their own interest and that of their country. Murray gains your attention by the perspicuity of his statement and the elegance of his diction; Pitt commands your attention and respect by the nobleness and greatness of his sentiments, the strength and energy of his expressions, and the certainty of his always rising to a greater elevation both of thought and sentiment. For this talent he possesses beyond any speaker I ever heard, of never falling from the beginning to the end of his speech, either in thought or expression. And as in this session he has begun to speak like a man of business as well as an orator, he will in all probability be, or rather is, allowed to make as great an appearance as ever man did in that House."

Pitt incessantly waged war on Carteret, who, strong in the king's favour, was acting against the wishes of his associates in office. He exclaimed against him as "a sole minister who had renounced the British nation, and seemed to have drunk of that potion described in poetic fictions, which made men forget their country." He soon gained a complete ascendancy over the House. No man could cope with him; few tried even to oppose him; and Carteret was given up by all as an object of merited reprobation.

Under these circumstances, Pelham, who had now become the head of the Government, opened a negotiation for a union with Pitt and the dismissal of Carteret. The terms were easily arranged, and the king at last yielding, Pelham formed a new ministry in November, 1744, with the understanding that Pitt should be brought into office at the earliest opportunity that the king's prejudices would permit.

During the same year the Duchess of Marlborough died, leaving Pitt a legacy of £10,000, "on account of his merit in the noble defence of the laws of England, and to prevent the ruin of the country." It may as well be mentioned here, that about twenty years after he received a still more ample testimony of the same kind from Sir William Pynsent, who bequeathed him an estate of £2,500 a year, together with £30,000 in ready money.

THE SECOND PERIOD OF PITT'S CAREER, 1744-1754.

We now arrive at the second period of Pitt's political life, embracing the ten years of Pelham's ministry down to the year 1754. So bitter was the hostility of the king to his old opponent, that no persuasion could induce him to receive Pitt into his service. On the contrary, when pressed on the subject, he took decided steps for getting rid of his new ministers.

This led Pelham and his colleagues, who were aware of their strength, instantly to resign. The king was now at his wit's end. The Earl of Bath (Pulteney), to whom he entrusted the formation of a ministry, could get no one to serve under him. The king was compelled to take back Pelham, and Pitt along with him; he stipulated, however, that the man who was thus forced upon him should not, at least for a time, be brought into immediate contact with his person. Pitt therefore received provisionally the situation of joint-treasurer of Ireland. He now resigned the post of Groom of the Chamber to the Prince of Wales, and threw himself heartily into the interests of the Pelham ministry.

About a year after, in May, 1746, on the death of Mr. Winnington, he was appointed paymaster of the forces. On entering on his new office, Pitt gave a remarkable example of disinterestedness, which greatly raised him in the estimation of the public. It was then the custom that £100,000 should constantly lie as an advance in the hands of the paymaster, who invested the money in public securities, and thus realized about £4,000 a year for his own private benefit. Pitt at once placed all the funds at his control in the Bank of England, satisfied with the moderate compensation attached to his office.

He gave another proof of his superiority to all mercenary considerations by declining a certain percentage which had been always paid to the paymaster, on the enormous subsidies then granted to the Queen of Austria and the King of Sardinia. The latter, on being told of this, asked Pitt to accept as a mark of royal favour what he had rejected as a perquisite of office. Pitt still refused. It was this total disregard of the ordinary means of becoming rich that made Grattan say "his character astonished a corrupt age."

In casting in his lot with the Pelham ministry, Pitt yielded more than might have been expected to the king's wishes in regard to German subsidies and continental alliances. For this he has been accused of inconsistency. He thought, however, that the case was materially changed. The war had proceeded so far, that nothing was left but to fight it through, and this could only be done by German troops. In addition to this, the Electorate was now in danger, and he could without any sacrifice of principle unite with Pelham to prevent her being wrested from the empire by the ambition of France. Pitt saw, too, that the king, as he grew older, grew more obstinate, and that if the Government was to be administered at all, it must be by those who were ready to make some concessions to the prejudices of an aged monarch. That he was influenced in all this by no ambitious motives—that his wish to stand well with the king had no connection with a desire to stand highest in the state, it certainly would be unsafe to affirm; but his love of power had nothing in it that was mercenary or selfish.

THE THIRD PERIOD OF PITT'S CAREER, 1754-1757.

Pelham died suddenly in March, 1754, and with this event we come to the third period of Pitt's public life, embracing about three years, down to 1757. On the death of Pelham, everything fell into confusion. "Now I shall have no more peace," said the old king, when he heard the news. Just so it happened. The brother of Pelham, the Duke of Newcastle, through his borough interest and family connections, obtained the post of Prime Minister. The leadership of the House of Commons was now to be disposed of, and there were only three men who had the slightest pretensions to the prize; viz., Pitt, Fox, and Murray, afterwards Lord Mansfield. And yet Newcastle, out of a mean jealousy of their abilities, gave it to Sir Thomas Robinson, a man of very poor ability. "Sir Thomas Robinson lead us!" said Pitt to Fox; "the Duke might as well send his boot-jack to lead us!" Robinson was accordingly baited on all sides, falling perpetually into blunders, which provoked the stern animadversions of Pitt, or the more painful irony of Fox.

Robinson was soon extinguished, and Murray was appointed in his place. Pitt did not resign, but after this rejection he felt absolved from all obligations to Newcastle, and resolved to make both him and Murray feel his power. An opportunity soon presented itself, and he carried out his design with a dexterity and effect which excited general admiration. At the trial of a contested election, when the debate had degenerated into mere buffoonery, which kept the members in a continual roar, Pitt came down from the gallery where he was sitting, and took the House to task for their conduct in his highest tone. He inquired whether the dignity of the House stood on such sure foundations, that they might venture to shake it thus. He exhorted the Whigs of all conditions to defend their attacked and expiring liberties. "unless," said he, "you are to degenerate into a little assembly, serving no other purpose than to register the arbitrary edicts of one too powerful subject," laying, it is reported, a most remarkable emphasis on the words one and subject. The application to Newcastle was seen and felt by all. "It was the finest speech," says Fox, "that was ever made; and it was observed that by his first two sentences he brought the House to a silence and attention that you might have heard a pin drop." According to another who was present, this thunderbolt, thrown in a sky so long clear, confounded the audience. Murray crouched silent and terrified, not without reason, for his turn came next.

On the following day, November 27th, 1754, Pitt made two other speeches, ostensibly against Jacobitism, but intended for Murray, who had just been raised from the office of solicitor to that of attorney-general. "In both speeches," says Fox, "every word was MURRAY, yet so managed that neither he nor anybody else could take public notice of it, or in any way reprehend him. I sat near Murray, who suffered for an hour."

It was perhaps on this occasion, says Charles Butler, in his Reminiscences, that Pitt used an expression which once was in everybody's mouth.

After Murray had "suffered" for a time, Pitt paused, threw his eyes around, then fixing their whole power on Murray, exclaimed, "I must now address a few words to Mr. Attorney; they shall be few, but shall be daggers. Murray was agitated; the agitation increased. "Felix trembles!" exclaimed the orator; "he shall hear me some other day!" He sat down, Murray made no reply; and a languid debate showed the paralysis of the House.

Newcastle found it impossible to go on without adding to his strength in debate. He therefore bought off Fox in April, 1755, by introducing him to the Cabinet, while Pitt was again rejected with insult.

To this incongruous union Pitt alluded, a few months after, in terms which were much admired for the felicity of the image under which the allusion was conveyed. Newcastle, it is well known, was feeble and tame, while Fox was headlong and impetuous. An address prepared by the ministry was objected to as obscure and incongruous. Pitt took it up, saying, "There are parts of this address which do not seem to come from the same quarter as the rest. I cannot unravel the mystery." Then, as if suddenly recollecting the two men thus brought together at the head of affairs, he exclaimed, clapping his hand to his forehead, "Now it strikes me! I remember at Lyons to have been carried to see the conflict of the Rhone and the Saone—the one a feeble, languid stream, and though languid, of no great depth; the other a boisterous and impetuous torrent. But different as they are, they meet at last, and long," he added, with the bitterest irony, "long may they continue united, to the comfort of each other, and the glory, honour, and security of this nation." In less than a week Pitt was dismissed from his post of paymaster.

PARLIAMENTARY WARFARE.

This was the signal for open war—Pitt against the entire ministry. Ample occasion for attack was furnished by the disasters which were continually occurring in the public service, and the dangers resulting therefrom—the loss of Minorca, the defeat of General Braddock, the capture of Calcutta by Shujah Dowlah, and the threatened invasion of the French. These subjects afforded just grounds for the terrible onset of Pitt.

"During the whole session of 1755-6," says an eye-witness, "Pitt found occasion in every debate to confound the ministerial orators. His vehement invectives were awful to Murray, terrible to Hugh Campbell; and no malefactor under the stripes of the executioner was ever more helpless and forlorn than Fox, shrewd and able in Parliament as he confessedly is. Doddington sheltered himself in silence."

With all this vehemence, however, he was never betrayed into anything coarse or unbecoming the dignity of his character. Horace Walpole, writing to General Hamilton, says of his appearance on one of these occasions, "There was more humour, wit, vivacity, fine language, more boldness—in short, more astonishing perfection than even you, who are used to him, can conceive." And again, "He surpassed himself, as I need not tell you he surpassed Cicero and Demosthenes. What a figure they would make, with their formal laboured cabinet orations, by the side of his manly vivacity and dashing eloquence at one o'clock in the morning, after a sitting of eleven hours!"

The effect on the ministerial ranks was soon apparent. Murray was the first to shrink. The ablest by far among the supporters of the ministry—much abler, indeed, as a reasoner than his great opponent, and incomparably more learned in everything pertaining to the science of government, he could stand up no longer before the devouring eloquence of Pitt. On the death of Chief-Justice Ryder, which happened on the 25th of May, 1756, he at once demanded the place. Newcastle resisted, entreated, offered in addition to the profits of the attorney-generalship a pension of £2000, and at last of £6000 a year. It was all in vain. Nothing could prevail on Murray to remain longer in the House. He was accordingly made chief justice in November, with the title of Lord Mansfield; and on the day on which he took his seat on the bench, Newcastle resigned as minister.

Nothing now remained for the king but to place the Government in the hands of Pitt. It was a humiliating necessity; but the condition of public affairs was dark and threatening, and no one else could be found of sufficient courage or capacity to undertake the task. Pitt had said to the Duke of Devonshire, "My lord, I am sure that I can save this country, and that nobody else can." The people believed him. "The eyes of an afflicted and despairing nation," says Glover, who was far from uniting in their enthusiasm, "were now lifted up to a private gentleman of slender fortune, wanting the parade of birth or title, with no influence except marriage with Lord Temple's sister, and even confined to a narrow circle of friends and acquaintances. Yet under these circumstances Pitt was considered the saviour of England." His triumph was the triumph of the popular part of the constitution. It was the first example of the middle classes of our country breaking down in Parliament the power which the great families of the aristocracy had so long possessed, of setting aside or sustaining the decisions of the throne.

THE FOURTH PERIOD OF PITT'S CAREER, 1757-1761.

Pitt's entrance on the duties of Prime Minister in December, 1756, lands us at the fourth period of his political life, which embraces about five years, down to October, 1761. For about four months, however, during his first ministry his hands were in a great measure tied. Though supported by the unanimous voice of the people, the king looked upon him with personal dislike: Newcastle and his other opponents were able to defeat him in Parliament; and in April, 1757, he received the royal mandate to retire.

This created a storm throughout England. The stocks fell. The Common Council of London met, and passed resolutions of the strongest kind. The leading cities of the kingdom—Bath, Chester, Norwich, Salisbury, Worcester, Yarmouth, Newcastle, and many others—sent Pitt the freedom of their respective places as a token of confidence and a warning to the king. "For some weeks," says Horace Walpole, "it rained gold boxes."

The king in the meantime spent nearly three months in the vain endeavour to form another administration. It was now perfectly apparent that nothing could be done without concessions on both sides. Pitt therefore agreed, on the 29th of June, 1757, to resume his office as Principal Secretary of State and Prime Minister, in conjunction with Newcastle as head of the Treasury, satisfied that he could more easily overrule and direct the duke as a member of the cabinet than as leader of the Opposition. The result verified his expectations.

His second ministry now commenced that splendid era which raised England at once, as if by magic, from the brink of ruin and degradation. The genius of one man completely penetrated and informed the mind of the whole people. "From the instant he took the reins, the panic which had paralyzed every effort disappeared. Instead of mourning over former disgrace, and dreading future defeats, the nation assumed in a moment the air of confidence, and awaited with impatience the tidings of victory."

To the wonderful power possessed by Pitt, of throwing his spirit into other minds, Colonel Barré referred at a later period, in one of his parliamentary speeches. "He was possessed of the happy talent of transfusing his own zeal into the souls of all those who were to have a share in carrying his projects into execution; and it is a matter well known to many officers now in the House, that no man ever entered his closet who did not feel himself, if possible, braver at his return than when he went in."

He knew also how to use fear, as well as affection, for the accomplishment of his designs. "It will be impossible to have so many ships prepared so soon," said Lord Anson, when a certain expedition was ordered. "If the ships are not ready," replied Pitt, "I will impeach your lordship in presence of the House." They were ready as directed.

Newcastle yielded with quiet submission to the supremacy of his genius. All the duke wanted was the patronage, and this Pitt cheerfully resigned for the salvation of his country. Horace Walpole, in his lively style, says, "Mr. Pitt does everything, and the Duke of Newcastle gives everything. As long as they can agree in this partition they will do what they will."

A curious anecdote illustrates the ascendancy of Pitt over Newcastle. The latter was a great valetudinarian, and was so fearful of taking cold, especially, that he often ordered the windows of the House of Lords to be shut in the hottest weather, while the rest of the peers were suffering for want of breath. On one occasion he called upon Pitt, who was confined to his bed by the gout. Newcastle, on being led into the bed-chamber, found the room, to his dismay, without fire on a cold wintry afternoon. He begged to have one kindled, but Pitt refused; it might be injurious to his gout. Newcastle drew his cloak around him, and submitted with the worst possible grace. The conference was a long one. Pitt was determined on a naval expedition, under Admiral Hawke, for the annihilation of the French fleet. Newcastle opposed it on account of the lateness of the season. The debate continued until the Duke was absolutely shivering with cold, when, at last, seeing another bed in the opposite corner, he slipped in, and covered himself with the bedclothes! A secretary, coming in soon after, found the two ministers in this curious predicament, with their faces only visible, bandying the argument with great eagerness from one bedside to the other.

One of the first steps taken by Pitt was to grant a large subsidy to Frederick the Great of Prussia, for carrying on the war against the Empress Maria Theresa. This was connected with a total change in the continental policy of George II., and was intended to rescue Hanover from the hands of the French. Still there were many who had a traditional regard for the Empress Maria Theresa, in whose defence this country had spent more than ten millions sterling. The grant was therefore strenuously opposed in the House, and Pitt was taunted with a desertion of his principles. In reply he defended himself, and maintained the necessity of the grant with infinite dexterity. "It was," says Walpole, "the most artful speech he ever made. He provoked, called for, defied objections, promised enormous expense, demanded never to be tried by events." By degrees he completely subdued the House, until a murmur of applause broke forth from every quarter. Seizing the favourable moment, he drew back with the utmost dignity, and placing himself in an attitude of defiance, exclaimed in his loudest tone, "Is there an Austrian among you? Let him come forward and reveal himself!" The effect was irresistible. "Universal silence," says Walpole, "left him arbiter of his own terms."

There was very little debate after his administration had fairly commenced. All parties joined in supporting his measures. It is indeed a remarkable fact that the Parliamentary History, which professes to give a detailed report of all the debates in Parliament, contains not a single speech of Pitt, and only two or three by any other person during the whole period of his ministry. The supplies which he demanded were, for that day, enormous—twelve millions and a half in one year, and nearly twenty millions the next—"a most incredible sum," says Walpole, respecting the former, "and yet all subscribed for, and even more offered! Our unanimity is prodigious. You would as soon hear 'No' from an old maid as from the House of Commons." "Though Parliament has met," says Walpole again in 1759, "no politics are come to town. One may describe the House of Commons like the stocks: Debates, nothing done; votes, under par; patriots, no price; oratory, book shut."

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

England now entered into the war with all the energy of a new existence. Spread out in her colonies to the remotest parts of the globe, our country resembled a strong man who had long been lying with palsied limbs, and the blood collected at the heart; when the stream of life suddenly set free, rushes to the extremities, and he springs to his feet with an elastic bound to repel injury or punish aggression.

In 1758, the contest was carried on at once in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America—wherever France had possessions to be attacked, or England possessions to be defended. Notwithstanding some disasters at first, victory followed on victory in rapid succession. Within little more than two years all was changed. In Africa, France was stripped of every settlement she had on that continent. In India, defeated in two engagements at sea, and driven from every post on land, she gave up her long contest for the mastery of the East, and left the British to establish their government over a hundred and fifty millions of people. In America, all her rich possessions in the West Indies passed into the hands of Great Britain. Louisburg, Quebec, Siconderoga, Crown Point, Oswego, Niagara, Fort Duquesne, afterwards Pittsburg, were captured, and the entire chain of posts with which France had hemmed in and threatened our early settlements fell before the united arms of the colonists and the English, and not an inch of territory was left her in the western world. In Europe, Hanover was rescued, the French were defeated at Crevelt, and again at Minden, with still greater injury and disgrace; the coasts of France were four times invaded, with severe loss to the English, but still with a desperate determination to strike terror into the hearts of the enemy. Havre was bombarded; the port and fortification of Cherbourg were demolished; Brest and the other leading seaports were blockaded; the Toulon fleet was captured or destroyed; and the brilliant victories of Admiral Hawke off Quiberon annihilated the French fleet for the remainder of the war.

At home the only subjects of the empire who continued hostile to the Government, the Highlanders, who had been disarmed for the rebellion in '15 and '45, and insulted by a law forbidding them to wear their national costume, were for ever detached from the Stuarts, and drawn into grateful affection round the throne, by Pitt's happy act of confidence in putting arms into their hands, and sending them to fight the battles of their country in distant quarters of the globe.

Finally the commercial interests of the kingdom, always the most important to a great manufacturing people, prospered as never before; and commerce, in the words inscribed by the City of London on the statue which they erected to Pitt, "commerce for the first time was united with and made to flourish by war."

THE END OF PITT'S MINISTRY.

France was now effectually humbled. In 1761 she sought for peace, and Pitt announced to his supporters, when entering on the negotiations, that "no peace of Utrecht should again stain the annals of England." He therefore opposed every attempt made by France to obtain a restoration of conquests, and was on the point of concluding a treaty upon terms commensurate with the triumphs of the English arms, when the French managed to draw Spain into the contest. After a season of long alienation an understanding once more took place between the two branches of the house of Bourbon.

The French instantly altered their tone. They proposed that Spain should be invited to take part in the treaty, specifying certain claims of that country upon England, which required adjustment. Pitt was indignant at this attempt of a prostrate enemy to draw a third party into the negotiation. He rejected the proposal, and declared that "he would not relax one syllable from his terms until the Tower of London was taken by storm." He demanded of Spain a disavowal of the French claims. This gave offence to the Spanish court, and France accomplished her object. The well-known Family Compact was entered upon, which once more identified the two countries in all their interests; and Spain, by a subsequent stipulation, engaged to unite in the war with France, unless England should make peace, on satisfactory terms, before May, 1762.

Pitt, whose means of secret intelligence were scarcely inferior to those of Cromwell, was informed of these arrangements—though they were studiously concealed—almost as soon as they were made. He saw that a war was inevitable, that he had just cause for fighting, and he determined to strike the first blow—to seize the Spanish treasure ships which were on their way from America; to surprise Havana, which was quite unprepared for defence; to wrest the Isthmus of Panama from Spain, and thus put the keys of her commerce between the two oceans for ever into the hands of the English.

Unfortunately, when Pitt proposed these measures to the cabinet, he was met, to his surprise, by an open and determined resistance. George II. was dead. Lord Bute, the favourite of George III., was jealous of Pitt's ascendancy. The king most likely shared in the same feelings, and in the language of Grattan, "conspired to remove him, in order to be relieved from his supremacy." An obsequious cabinet voted down Pitt's proposal. He at once resigned; and Spain, as if to prove his sagacity, and justify the measure he had urged, drove England into war within three months.

The king, however, in thus ending the most glorious ministry which England had ever seen, manifested a strong desire to conciliate Pitt. The very next day he sent a message to him through Lord Bute, declaring that he was impatient "to bestow upon him some mark of the royal favour." The ex-minister was melted by these unlooked-for tokens of kindness. He replied in terms which have frequently been cersured as unbecoming a man of spirit under a sense of injury—terms which certainly now-a-days would be thought obsequious, but which were probably dictated by the sudden revulsion of his feelings and the courtly style which he always maintained in his intercourse with his Sovereign.

On the day after his resignation he accepted a pension of £3,000—much less than was offered to him—together with a peerage for his wife. Some indeed complained that, acting as he did for the people, he should have allowed the king to place him under any pecuniary obligations. "If he had gone into the city," said Walpole, "and told them that he had a poor wife and children unprovided for, and opened a subscription, he would have got £500,000 instead of £3,000 a year." Burke has truly said, "With regard to the pension and the title, it is a shame that any defence should be necessary. What eye cannot distinguish at the first glance, between this and the exceptionable case of titles and pensions? What Briton, with the smallest sense of honour or gratitude, but must blush for his country, if such a man had retired unrewarded from the public service, let the motives of that retirement be what they would? It was not possible that his Sovereign should let his eminent services pass unrequited; and the quantum was rather regulated by the moderation of the great mind that received, than by the liberality of that which bestowed it."

It is hardly necessary to add that the tide of public favour, which had ebbed for an instant, soon returned to its ordinary channels. The City of London sent him an address in the most flattering terms of commendation. On Lord Mayor's Day, when he joined the young king and queen in their procession to dine at Guildhall, the eyes of the multitude were turned from the royal equipage to the modest vehicle which contained Pitt and his brother-in-law, Lord Temple. The loudest acclamations were reserved for the great Commoner. "The crowd," says an eye-witness, "clustered around his carriage at every step, hung upon the wheels, hugged his footmen, and even kissed his horses." Such were the circumstances under which he retired from office, having resigned on the 5th of October, 1761.

THE FIFTH PERIOD OF PITT'S CAREER.

We come now to the fifth and last period of Pitt's life, embracing about sixteen years, down to his decease in 1778. During the whole of this period, except for a brief season when he was called upon to form a new ministry, he acted with the Opposition.

When a treaty of peace was concluded by Lord

Bute, in 1762, he was confined to his bed by the gout; but his feelings were so excited by the concessions made to France, that he caused himself to be conveyed to the House in the midst of his acute sufferings, and poured out his indignation for three hours and a half, exposing in the keenest terms the loss and dishonour brought upon the country by the conditions of peace. This was called his "sitting speech," because after having stood for some time, supported by friends, "he was so excessively ill," says the Parliamentary History, "and his pain became so exceedingly acute, that the House unanimously desired that he might be permitted to deliver his sentiments sitting—a circumstance that was unprecedented." But whether this peace was disgraceful or not, the ministry had no alternative. Lord Bute could not raise money to carry on the war. The merchants, who had urged upon Pitt double the amount he needed whenever he desired a loan, refused their assistance to a minister whom they could not trust.

Under these circumstances Lord Bute was soon driven to extremities; and as a means of increasing the revenues, introduced a Bill subjecting cider to an excise. After six divisions the Bill was passed, but it drove Lord Bute from power. He resigned a few weeks after, and in May, 1763, was succeeded by Mr. Grenville, whose mistakes as minister, in connection with the peculiar temperament of the king, opened a new era in the history of Great Britain.

It was the misfortune of George III., in the early part of his life, to be governed first by favourites and then by his own passions. He was naturally of a quick and obstinate temper. During the first twenty years of his reign (for he afterwards corrected this error) he allowed his feelings as a man to mingle far too much with his duties as a sovereign. This led him into two steps, one of which agitated, and the other dismembered, his empire—the persecution of John Wilkes, and the attempt to force taxation on the American colonies. It is now known that he sent a personal order to have Wilkes arrested under a general warrant, against the advice of Lord Mansfield, and insisted on all the subsequent violations of law which gave such notoriety and influence to that restless demagogue. And although he did not originate the plan of taxing America, the moment the right was questioned, he resolved to maintain the principle to the utmost extremity. This it was that forced the "Declaratory Act" on Lord Rockingham, and held Lord North so long to the war, as it now appears, against his own judgment and feelings. In respect to both these subjects,

Pitt took from the first an open and decided stand against the wishes of the king. He did it on the principle which governed his whole political life; which led him, nearly thirty years before, to oppose so violently the issue of search-warrants for seamen: the principle of resisting arbitrary power in every form; of defending, at all hazards, the rights and liberties of the subject, "however mean, however remote." During the remainder of his life, all his speeches of any importance, with a single exception, related to one or the other of these topics. It was his constant aim, in his own emphatic language, "to restore, to save, to confirm the constitution."

IN THE SERVICE OF THE CROWN.

It has already been said that, during the period under review, Pitt was called for a brief season into the service of the Crown. George Grenville, who succeeded Lord Bute, after acting as minister for about two years, and inflicting on his country the evils of the American Stamp Act, became personally obnoxious to the king, and was dismissed from office about the middle of 1765. The eyes of the whole country were now turned toward Pitt, and the king asked the terms on which he would accept office. Pitt answered that he was prepared to go to St. James's if he could "carry the constitution along with him." But upon entering into details it was found impossible to reconcile his views with that court influence which still overruled the king. Lord Rockingham was then called upon to form a ministry, and Pitt has been censured by many for not joining heartily in the design, and lending the whole weight of his influence to establish under his lordship another great Whig administration. This, perhaps, might have been an act of magnanimity; but considering his recent splendid services, the known wishes of the people, and his acknowledged superiority over every other man in the empire, it could hardly be expected of Pitt that he should make himself a stepping-stone for the ambition of another.

In the debate on the address, Pitt made a kind of double speech in his best style. He was civil to the ministers, but could not, he said, give them his confidence; and then bowing to the Treasury bench, in a manner not quite in order, but full of grace and dignity, addressed them: "Pardon me, gentlemen, but confidence is a plant of slow growth in an aged bosom."

This apostrophe made a great sensation at the moment, and is still quoted as a specimen of Pitt's peculiar style; but in truth the interest created was not by the dramatic manner, but by the important fact that the ministry had not the confidence of Pitt, or, in other words, that unless they could satisfy him, their days were numbered. He expressed, with an eloquent enthusiasm, tempered, however, by much courtesy and moderation towards the present ministers, his strong disapprobation of the recent course of American policy, its follies, and its dangers.

This called up George Grenville, who defended the measures of the late ministry as right in themselves, and sanctioned as to their principle by Parliament, without a dissentient voice; and he added that the "seditious spirit of the colonies owed its birth to factions in that House."

To this Pitt replied, in what—to evade the rules of the House against speaking twice in the same debate—he called a portion of his speech, which he had reserved, but was now forced from him. He answered Grenville with a contemptuous gravity, designating him as "the gentleman who had spoken," without the usual prefix of "honourable; he defended himself from the charge of having by his speeches given birth to sedition in America; he asserted, in the broadest terms, the supreme right of the mother-country on all points except the taxation of an unrepresented people, "the distinction between legislation and taxation being," he said, "essential to liberty;" and concluded by recommending lenient measures, with a quotation from a ballad, which in any other mouth would have appeared trivial, but from his was accepted as the apophthegm of a sage:—

"Be to her faults a little blind,
Be to her virtues very kind."

This speech, powerful in its effects at the moment, is also remarkable for containing the first germ of parliamentary reform. "There is an idea in some," he says, "that the colonies are virtually represented in the House. I would fain know by whom an American is represented here. Is he represented by any knight of the shire in any county in this kingdom? Would to God that respectable representation was augmented to a greater number! Or will you tell him that he is represented by any representative of a borough—a borough which its own representatives never saw? This is what is called the rotten part of the constitution. It cannot continue a century; if it does not stop, it must be amputated."

The Rockingham administration performed one important service—they repealed the Stamp Act; but they held together only a year, and were dissolved on the 30th of July, 1766.

Pitt was now called upon to form a ministry. It was plainly impossible for him to succeed, and no one but a man of his sanguine temperament would have thought of making the attempt. The Rockingham Whigs, forming the wealthy and aristocratic section of the party, might of course be expected to oppose. Lord Temple, who had hitherto adhered to Pitt in every emergency, now deserted him and joined his brother, George Grenville, in justifying American taxation.

Lord Camden and a few others supported Pitt, and carried with them the suffrages of the people. But the Tories were favourites at court. They filled all the important stations of the household; they had the readiest access to the royal person; and though Pitt might at first undoubtedly rely on the king for support, he could hardly expect to enjoy it long without gratifying his wishes in the selection of the great officers of state.

PITT ACCEPTS A PEERAGE.

Under these circumstances, the moment Pitt discovered his real situation, he ought to have relinquished the attempt to form a ministry. But he was led on step by step. His proud spirit had never been accustomed to draw back. He at last formed one on coalition principles. He drew around him as many of his own friends as possible, and filled up the remaining places with Tories, hoping to keep the peace at the council-board by his personal influence and authority. He had put down Newcastle by uniting with him, and he was confident of doing the same with his new competitors. But he made a mistake at the outset, which, in connection with his subsequent illness, proved the ruin of his ministry. This error related to the "lead" of the House of Commons. His voice was the only one which could rule the stormy discussions of that body, and compose the elements of strife which were thickening around him; and yet he withdrew from the House, and gave the lead to Charles Townsend. Never was a choice more unfortunate. Townsend was indeed brilliant, but he was rash and unstable; filled with the desire to please everybody; utterly devoid of firmness and self-command, and therefore the last man in the world for giving a lead and direction to the measures of the House. But Pitt's health was gone. He felt quite inadequate, under his frequent attacks of the gout, to take the burden of debate; he therefore named himself Lord Privy Seal, and passed into the Upper House, with the title of Lord Chatham.

As might be expected, his motives in thus accepting the peerage were for a time misunderstood. He was supposed to have renounced his principles and become a creature of the court. The city of London, which he had ruled with absolute sway as the Great Commoner, refused him their support or congratulations as Lord Chatham; the press teemed with invectives; and the people, who considered him as having betrayed their cause, loaded him with maledictions. Such treatment, in connection with his sufferings from disease, naturally tended to agitate his feelings and sour his temper. He was sometimes betrayed into rash conduct and passionate language. His biographer has indeed truly said that "highly as Lord Chatham was loved and respected by his own family, and great as were his talents and virtues, he possessed not the art of cementing political friendships. A consciousness of his superior abilities, strengthened by the brilliant successes of his former administration, and the unbounded popularity he enjoyed, imparted an austerity to his manners which distressed and offended his colleagues."

Such were the circumstances under which Lord Chatham formed his third ministry. It would long since have passed into oblivion, had not Burke handed it down to posterity in one of the most striking pictures (though abounding in grotesque imagery) which we have in our literature. "He made an administration," says Mr. Burke in his speech on American taxation, "so checkered and speckled; he put together a piece of joinery so closely indented and whimsically dovetailed; a cabinet so variously inlaid; such a piece of diversified mosaic; such a tessellated pavement without cement, here a bit of black stone, and there a bit of white; patriots and courtiers, king's friends and republicans, that it was indeed a very curious show, but utterly unsafe to touch and unsure to stand on. The colleagues whom he assorted at the same boards stared at each other, and were obliged to ask, 'Sir, your name?' 'Sir, you have the advantage of me.' 'Mr. Such-a-one, I beg a thousand pardons.' I venture to say it did so happen, that persons had a single office divided between them who had never spoken to each other in their lives until they found themselves (they knew not how) pigging together, heads and points, in the same truckle-bed. . . . If ever he fell into a fit of the gout, or if any other cause withdrew him from public cares, principles directly the contrary were sure to predominate. When he had executed his plan, he had not an inch of ground to stand on. When he had accomplished his scheme of administration, he was no longer a minister."

Such was literally the fact. Only a few weeks after his final arrangements were made, he was seized with a paroxysm of the gout at Bath, which threatened his immediate dissolution. Having partially recovered, he set out on his return to London in February, 1767; but he was again violently attacked on the way, and was obliged to retire to his country seat at Hayes, where he lay in extreme suffering, with a mind so much disturbed that all access to him was denied for many months.

It was during this period that Charles Townsend, in one of his rash and boastful moods, committed himself to Mr. Grenville, in favour of taxing the colonies, and was induced to lay those duties on tea, glass, and other articles, which revived the contest, and led to the American revolution. It was indeed an odd circumstance that such a bill should have been passed under an administration bearing the name of Chatham. But he had ceased to be a minister except in name. Some months before he had sent a verbal message to the king (for he was unable to write), that "such was the ill state of his health, that his majesty must not expect from him any further advice or assistance in any arrangement whatever."

When Grafton became minister, Lord Chatham sent in his formal resignation by the hands of Lord Camden. It is striking to observe how soon great men are forgotten when they fall from power and withdraw, on the decline of their faculties, from the notice of the public. Lord Chatham's former resignation was an era in Europe. The time of his second resignation was scarcely known in London. His sun appeared to have sunk at mid-day, amid clouds and gloom. Little did any one imagine that it was again to break forth with a purer splendour and to fill the whole horizon round with the radiance of its setting beams.

REAPPEARANCE IN PARLIAMENT.

After a complete seclusion from the world for nearly three years, Lord Chatham, to the surprise of all, made his appearance in Parliament, with his health greatly improved, and in complete possession of his gigantic powers. He was still so weak, however, that he went on crutches, and was swathed in flannels when he entered the House of Lords at the opening of the session, on the 9th of January, 1770.

In commenting on the address, he came out at once in a loftier strain of eloquence than ever, in reply to Lord Mansfield on the case of John Wilkes. This speech gave a decisive turn to political affairs. A leader had now appeared to array the Whigs against the Duke of Grafton.

Lord Camden, who, as chancellor, had continued in the cabinet, though hostile to the measures which prevailed, came down from the woolsack at the close of Lord Chatham's speech, and declared against the minister. "I have," said he, "hung down my head in council, and disapproved, by my looks, those steps which I knew my avowed opposition could not prevent. I will do so no longer.

I now proclaim to the world that I entirely coincide in the opinion expressed by my noble friend—whose presence again reanimates us—respecting this unconstitutional vote of the House of Commons." He was of course dismissed, and united with Lord Chatham, Lord Rockingham, and the rest of the Whigs, to oppose the Grafton ministry.

They succeeded in nineteen days; the Duke resigned on the twenty-eighth of the same month. But the Whigs did not profit by their victory. The hostility of the king excluded them from power, and Lord North was placed at the head of affairs.

An attempt was now made to put down Lord Chatham by personal insult. He was taunted before the House on the 14th of March, 1770, with having received a pension from the Crown, and having unjustifiably recommended pensions for others. He rose upon his antagonist, as he always did on such occasions, and turned his defence into an attack. He at once took up the case of Lord Camden, whom he had brought in as chancellor three years before, with a pension of fifteen hundred pounds. "I could not," said he, "expect such a man to quit the Chief Justiceship of the Common Pleas, which he held for life, and put himself in the power of those who were not to be trusted, to be dismissed from the chancery at any moment, without making some slight provision for the event. The public has not been deceived by his conduct. My suspicions have been justified. His integrity has made him once more a prior and private man. He was dismissed for the vote he gave in favour of the right of election in the people." Here an attempt was made to drown him with clamour. Some lords called out, "To the bar! to the bar!" and Lord Marchmont moved that his words be taken down. Lord Chatham seconded the motion, and went on to say, "I neither deny, retract, nor explain these words; I do reaffirm the fact, and I desire to meet the sense of the House. I appeal to every lord in the House whether he has not the same conviction." Lord Rockingham, Lord Temple, and many others rose, and upon their honour affirmed the same.

The ministry were now desirous of dropping the subject; but Lord Marchmont, encouraged by Lord Mansfield, persisted, and moved that nothing had appeared to justify the assertion. Lord Chatham again declared, "My words remain unretracted, unexplained, and reaffirmed. I desire to know whether I am condemned or acquitted, and whether I may still presume to hold my head as high as the noble lord who moved to have my words taken down." To this no answer was given.

It was easy for the ministry to pass what vote they pleased; but they found that every attempt to disgrace such a man only recoiled on themselves. His glowing defence of the people's rights regained him the popularity he had lost by his accession to the peerage. The city of London addressed him in terms of grateful acknowledgment, thanking him for the zeal he had shown in support of those most valuable privileges, the right of election and the right of petition. The people again looked up to him as their best and truest friend; and though raised to an earldom, they felt, in the language of his great-grandson, Lord Mahon, that "his elevation over them was like that of Rochester Castle over his own shores of Chatham—that he was raised above them only for their protection and defence."

After this session, Lord Chatham was unable to attend on Parliament except on occasional and distant intervals. His time was chiefly spent on his estate at Burton Pynsent, superintending the education of his children, and mingling in their amusements with the liveliest pleasure, notwithstanding his many infirmities. He tried to interest them, not only in their books, but in rural employments and country scenery. He took great delight in landscape gardening, and in speaking of its fine arrangements for future effect, called it, with his usual felicity of expression, "the prophetic eye of taste."

"When his health would permit," says the tutor to his son, "he never suffered a day to pass without giving instruction of some sort to his children, and seldom without reading the Bible with them." He seems, indeed, to have studied the Scriptures with great care from early life. He read them not only for the guidance of his faith, but for improvement in oratory. "Not content," says Lord Lyttleton, "to correct and instruct his imagination by the works of men, he borrowed his noblest images from the language of inspiration." His practice in this respect was imitated by Burke, Junius, and other distinguished writers of the day. At no period in later times has secular eloquence gathered so many of her images and allusions from the pages of the Bible.

A GREAT SPEECH.

Thus withdrawn from the cares and labours of public life, there was only one subject which could induce him to appear in Parliament. This was the contest with America. He knew more of America than any other man in England, except Burke. During the war in which he wrested Canada from the French, he was brought into the most intimate communication with the leading men of the colonies. He knew their spirit and the resources of the country. Two of the smallest states (Massachusetts and Connecticut) had, in answer to his call, raised twelve thousand men for that war in a single year. Feelings of personal attachment united therefore with a sense of justice to make him the champion of America.

Feeble and decrepit as he was, he forgot his age and sufferings. He stood forth in presence of the whole empire to arraign as a breach of the Constitution every attempt to tax a people who had no representatives in Parliament. It was the era of his sublimest efforts in oratory. With no private ends or party purposes to accomplish, with a consciousness of the exalted services he had rendered to his country, he spoke "as one having authority," and denounced the war with a prophetic sense of the shame and disaster attending such a conflict. His voice of warning was lost, indeed, upon the ministry, and on the great body of the nation, who welcomed a relief from their burdens at the expense of America. But it rang through every town and hamlet of the colonies; and when he proclaimed in the ears of Parliament, "I rejoice that America has resisted," millions of hearts on the other side of the Atlantic swelled with a prouder determination to resist even to the end.

Before we arrive at the last solemn scene of all there is one circumstance personally relating to Lord Chatham, and illustrative of his character, which must be noticed. It will also enable us to give the only example of his high-toned eloquence which our limited space enables us to present to the reader.

In one of the debates on the conduct of the war, Lord Suffolk had said, in reply to an objection which had been made to the employment of the Indians, that "we were justified in using all the means which God and nature had put into our hands."

In reply to this, Lord Chatham burst out into one of his finest strains:—

"I am astonished, shocked, to hear such principles confessed—to hear them avowed in this House or in this country; principles equally unconstitutional, inhuman, and unchristian! My Lords, I did not intend to have encroached again upon your attention, but I cannot repress my indignation; I feel myself impelled by every duty.

"My Lords, we are called upon as members of this House, as men, as Christian men, to protest against such notions standing near the throne, polluting the ear of majesty. 'That God and nature put into our hands!' I know not what ideas that lord may entertain of God and nature, but I know that such abominable principles are equally abhorrent to religion and humanity. What! to attribute the sacred sanction of God and nature to the massacres of the Indian scalping-knife—to the cannibal savage, torturing, murdering, roasting, and eating—literally, my Lords, eating the mangled victims of his barbarous battles!

"Such horrible notions shock every precept of religion, divine or natural, and every generous feeling of humanity. And, my Lords, they shock every sentiment of honour; they shock me as a lover of honourable war and a detester of murderous barbarity.

"These abominable principles, and this more abominable avowal of them, demand the most decisive indignation. I call upon that right reverend bench, these holy ministers of religion, and pious pastors of our Church; I conjure them to join in the holy work, and vindicate the religion of their God; I appeal to the wisdom and the law of this learned bench to defend and support the justice of their country; I call upon the bishops to interpose the unsullied sanctity of their lawn to save us from this pollution; I call upon the honour of your lordships to reverence the dignity of your ancestors, and to vindicate your own; I call upon the spirit and humanity of my country to vindicate the national character; I invoke the genius of the constitution. From the tapestry that adorns these walls the immortal ancestor of this noble lord frowns with indignation at the disgrace of his country. In vain he led your victorious fleets against the boasted armada of Spain; in vain he defended and established the honour, the liberties, the religion—the Protestant religion—of this country against the arbitrary cruelties of popery and the inquisition, if these more than popish cruelties and inquisitorial practices are let loose among us, to turn forth into our settlements, among our ancient connections, friends, and relations, the merciless cannibal, thirsting for the blood of man, woman, and child, and to send forth the infidel savage—against whom? against your Protestant brethren, to lay waste their country, to desolate their dwellings, and extirpate their race and name with these horrible hell-hounds of savage war! hell-hounds, I say, of savage war. Spain armed herself with bloodhounds to extirpate the wretched natives of America, and we improve on the inhuman example even of Spanish cruelty; we turn loose these savage hell-hounds against our brethren and countrymen in America, of the same language, laws, liberties, and religion; endeared to us by every tie that should sanctify humanity.

"My Lords, this awful subject, so important to our honour, our constitution, and our religion, demands the most solemn and effectual inquiry; and I again call upon your Lordships and the united powers of the state to examine it thoroughly and decisively, and to stamp upon it the indelible stigma of the public abhorrence. And I again implore these holy prelates of our religion to do away these iniquities from among us. Let them perform a lustration; let them purify this House and the country from this sin.

"My Lords, I am old and weak, and at present unable to say more; but my feelings and indignation were too strong to have said less. I could not have slept this night in my bed, nor reposed my head on my pillow, without giving this vent to my eternal abhorrence of such preposterous and enormous principles."

This is, no doubt, splendid oratory; but it was retorted on Lord Chatham, and his friend Lord Amherst was obliged reluctantly to confess to the fact, that the Indians had been employed in the Canadian war in Pitt's own administration. Lord Chatham attempted to make some distinction between the cases, which, however, did not altogether protect him from the recoil of his own eloquence.

THE DEATH OF LORD CHATHAM.

But, while he thus stood forth as the champion of America, he never for a moment yielded to the thought of her separation from the mother-country. When the Duke of Richmond brought forward his motion, in April, 1778, advising the king to withdraw his fleets and armies, and to effect a reconciliation with America, involving her independence, Lord Chatham heard of his design with unspeakable concern, and resolved to go once more to the House of Lords for the purpose of resisting the motion.

He entered the House for the last time, leaning upon two friends, wrapped up in flannel, pale and emaciated. Under his large wig little more was to be seen than his aquiline nose and his penetrating eye. He looked like a dying man: yet never was seen a figure of more dignity; he appeared like a being of a superior species. He rose from his seat with slowness and difficulty, leaning on his crutches, and supported under each arm by two friends. He took one hand from his crutch, and raised it, casting his eyes towards Heaven, and said, "I thank God that I have been enabled to come here this day—to perform my duty, and to speak on a subject which has so deeply impressed my mind. I am old and infirm—I have one foot, more than one foot, in the grave—I am risen from my bed, to stand up in the cause of my country—perhaps never again to speak in this House." The reverence, the attention, the stillness of the House was most affecting; if any one had dropped a handkerchief, the noise would have been heard. At first he spoke in a very low and feeble tone; but as he grew warm his voice rose, and was as harmonious as ever : oratorical and affecting, perhaps, more than at any former period, both from his own situation and from the importance of the subject on which he spoke.

He rejoiced that he was yet alive to give his vote against so impolitic, so inglorious a measure as the acknowledgment of the independency of America ; and declared that he would rather be in his grave than see the lustre of the British throne tarnished, the dignity of the empire disgraced, the glory of the nation sunk to such a degree as it must be when the dependency of America on the sovereignty of Great Britain was given up.

After speaking for some time with great enthusiasm, he sat down exhausted, and the Duke of Richmond rose to explain. While he was speaking, Lord Chatham listened to him with attention, and when his grace had ended, rose to reply ; but his strength failed him, and he fell backwards in convulsions. He was immediately supported by the peers around him, and by his younger sons, who happened to be present as spectators. He was conveyed first to the house of Mr. Sargent, in Downing Street, and thence to Hayes, where he lingered for three days ; and Monday, the 11th of May, terminated a glorious life by a death, it may be said, in the service of his country, and on the very field of battle.

That same evening—on the motion of Colonel Barré, formerly the bitterest of his enemies, but lately become a close ally—the House of Commons voted him a public funeral and a monument in Westminster Abbey—a tribute in which men of all parties generously and cordially joined.

LORD CHATHAM AS AN ORATOR.

Lord Chatham has been generally regarded as the most powerful orator of modern times. He certainly ruled the British senate as no other man has ever ruled over a great deliberative assembly. There have been stronger minds in our Parliament, abler reasoners, profounder statesmen, but no man has ever controlled it with such absolute sway by the force of his eloquence. He did things which no other human being but himself would ever have attempted. He carried through triumphantly what would have covered any other man with ridicule and disgrace.

His success, no doubt, was owing in part to his extraordinary personal advantages. Few men have ever received from the hands of nature so many of the outward qualifications of an orator ; in his best days, before he was crippled by the gout, his figure was tall and erect, his attitude imposing, his gestures energetic even to vehemence, yet tempered with dignity and grace. Such was the power of his eye, that he very often cowed down an antagonist in the midst of his speech, and threw him into utter confusion by a single glance of scorn or contempt. Whenever he rose to speak, his countenance glowed with animation, and was lighted up with all the varied emotions of his soul.

"His voice," says a contemporary, "was both full and clear. His lowest whisper was distinctly heard ; his middle notes were sweet and beautifully varied ; and when he elevated his voice to its highest pitch, the House was completely filled with the volume of sound. The effect was awful, except when he wished to cheer or animate, then he had spirit-cheering notes which were perfectly irresistible." The prevailing character of his delivery was majesty and force.

Much, however, as he owed to these advantages, it was his character as a man which gave him his surprising ascendancy over the minds of others. There was a fascination for all hearts in his lofty bearing, his generous sentiments, his comprehensive policy, his grand conceptions of the height to which England might be raised as arbiter of Europe, his preference of her honour over all material considerations. There was a fascination, too, for the hearts of all who loved freedom in that intense spirit of liberty which was the ruling principle of his life. From the time when he opposed Sir Charles Wager's Bill for breaking open private houses to press seamen, declaring that he would shoot any man, even an officer of justice, who should thus enter his dwelling, he stood forth to the end of his days the defender of the people's rights. It was no vain ostentation of liberal principles, no idle pretence to gain influence or office. The nation saw it ; and while Pulteney's defection brought disgrace on the name of patriot, the character of Pitt stood higher than ever in the public estimation. His political integrity, no less than his eloquence, formed an era in the senate, and that comparative elevation of principle which we now find among our politicians, dates back for its commencement to his noble example. It was his glory as a statesman, not that he was always in the right, or even consistent with himself upon minor points ; but that, at a time of shameless profligacy, when political principle was universally laughed at, and every one, in the words of Walpole, "had his price," he stood forth to stem the torrent of a downward age.

The range of his powers as a speaker was uncommonly wide. He was equally qualified to conciliate and subdue. When he saw fit, no man could be more plausible and ingratiating ; no one had ever a more winning address, or was more adroit in obviating objections and allaying prejudice. When he changed his tone, and chose rather to subdue, he had the sharpest weapons at command—wit, humour, irony, overwhelming ridicule, and contempt. His forte was the terrible; and he employed with equal ease the indirect mode of attack with which he so often tortured Lord Mansfield, and the open, withering invective with which he trampled down Lord Suffolk. His burst of astonishment and horror at the proposal of the latter to let loose the Indians on the settlers of America is without a parallel in our language for severity and force. In all such conflicts, the energy of his will and his boundless self-confidence secured him the victory. Never did that "erect countenance" sink before the eye of an antagonist. Never was he known to hesitate or falter. He had a feeling of superiority over every one around him, which acted on his mind with the force of an inspiration. He knew he was right. He knew he could save England, and that no one else could do it! Such a spirit, in great crises, is the unfailing instrument of command, both to the general and the orator. We may call it arrogance; but even arrogance here operates upon most minds with the potency of a charm; and when united to a vigour of genius and firmness of purpose like his, men of the strongest intellect fall down before it, and admire—perhaps hate—what they cannot resist.

The leading characteristic of eloquence is force; and force in the orator depends mainly on the action of strongly excited feeling on a powerful intellect. The intellect of Chatham was of the highest order, and was peculiarly fitted for the broad and rapid combinations of oratory. It was at once comprehensive, acute, and vigorous; enabling him to embrace the largest range of thought, to see at a glance what most men labour out by slow degrees, and to grasp his subject with a vigour, and hold on to it with a firmness, which have rarely, if ever, been equalled. But his intellect never acted alone. It was impossible for him to speak on any subject in a dry and abstract manner; all the operations of his mind were pervaded and governed by intense feeling.

The great preponderance of feeling in Lord Chatham made him, in the strictest sense of the term, an extemporaneous speaker. His mind was, indeed, richly furnished with thought upon every subject which came up for debate, and the matter he brought forward was always thoroughly matured and strikingly appropriate; but he seems never to have studied its arrangement, much less to have bestowed any care on the language, imagery, or illustrations. Everything fell into its place at the moment. He poured out his thoughts and feelings just as they arose in his mind; and hence, on one occasion, when despatches had been received which could not safely be made public, he said to one of his colleagues, "I must not speak to-day; I shall let out the secret." It is also worthy of remark, that nearly all these great passages, which came with such startling power upon the House, arose out of some unexpected turn of the debate, some incident or expression which called forth these sudden bursts of eloquence.

THE CHARACTER OF LORD CHATHAM.

The following "Character of Lord Chatham," by the famous Irish statesman and orator, Henry Grattan, has been often quoted:—

"The Secretary stood alone. Modern degeneracy had not reached him. Original and unaccommodating, the features of his character had the hardihood of antiquity. His august mind overawed Majesty; and one of his Sovereigns (George III.) thought royalty so impaired in his presence, that he conspired to remove him, in order to be relieved from his superiority. No state chicanery, no narrow system of vicious politics, no idle contest for ministerial victories, sunk him to the vulgar level of the great; but, overbearing, persuasive, and impracticable, his object was England—his ambition was fame. Without dividing, he destroyed party; without corrupting, he made a venal age unanimous. France sunk beneath him; with one hand he smote the house of Bourbon, and wielded in the other the democracy of England. The sight of his mind was infinite, and his schemes were to affect, not England, not the present age only, but Europe and posterity. Wonderful were the means by which these schemes were accomplished, always seasonable, always adequate, the suggestions of an understanding, animated by ardour, and enlightened by prophecy.

"The ordinary feelings which make life amiable and indolent—those sensations which soften and allure, and vulgarize, were unknown to him. No domestic difficulties, no domestic weakness reached him; but, aloof from the sordid occurrences of life, and unsullied by its intercourse, he came occasionally into our system to counsel and decide.

"Upon the whole, there was in this man something that could create, subvert, or reform; an understanding, a spirit, and an eloquence to summon mankind to society, or to break the bonds of slavery asunder, and rule the wildness of free minds with unbounded authority; something that could establish or overwhelm empire, and strike a blow in the world that should resound through its history."

BIRTH, FAMILY, AND EARLY YEARS.

CHARLES JAMES FOX was born on the 24th of January, 1749, and was the second son of Henry Fox, the first Lord Holland, and Lady Georgiana Lennox, daughter of the second Duke of Richmond. His father, the great antagonist of Lord Chatham, was a man of amiable feelings but dissolute habits; poor, as the natural consequence, during most of his life, and governed in his politics by the master principle of the Walpole school—love of power for the sake of money.

In 1757, Lord Holland obtained the appointment of Paymaster of the Forces. This office, as then managed, afforded almost boundless opportunities for acquiring wealth; and so skilfully did he use his advantages, that within eight years he amassed a fortune of several hundred thousand pounds. A part of this money he spent in erecting a magnificent house on his estate at Kingsgate, in the Isle of Thanet. "Upon a bleak promontory," says one of his contemporaries, "projecting into the German Ocean, he constructed a splendid villa worthy of Lucullus, and adorned it with a colonnade in front of the building, such as Ictinus might have raised by order of Pericles. Here Charles spent a portion of his early years, and the estate fell to him as a part of his patrimony after his father's death."

AN EXTRAORDINARY EDUCATION.

Lord Holland's eldest son Stephen being affected with a nervous disease which impaired his faculties, Charles, who gave early proof of extraordinary talents, became the chief object of pride and hope to the family. His father resolved to train him up for public life, and to make him what he himself had always endeavoured to be, a leader in fashionable dissipation, and yet an orator and a statesman. He had lived in the days of Bolingbroke, and it would almost seem as if he intended to make that gifted but profligate adventurer the model of his favourite child. He began by treating the boy with extreme indulgence. His maxim was, "Let nothing be done to break his spirit;" and with this view he permitted no one either to contradict or to punish the boy. On the contrary, he encouraged him in the wildest whims and caprices. When about five years old, Charles was standing one day by his father as he wound up his watch, and said, "I have a great mind to break that watch." "No, Charles, that would be very foolish." "But indeed I must do it—I must." "Nay," replied the father, "if you have so violent an inclination I won't baulk it," and he gave the watch to the boy, who instantly dashed it on the floor.

Amid all this indulgence, however, his studies were not neglected; he showed surprising quickness in performing his tasks, and the same ready and retentive memory for which he was remarkable in after life. His father made him, from childhood, his companion and equal, encouraging him to converse freely at table, and to enter into all the questions discussed by public men who visited the family. Charles usually acquitted himself to the admiration of all, and was, no doubt, indebted to this early habit of thinking and speaking with freedom for that frankness and intrepidity, amounting often to rashness, which distinguished him as an orator. Lord Holland, in the meantime, was steadily arriving at the object he had in view. He wrought upon his son's pride; he inflamed him with that love of superiority which is usually the most powerful excitement of genius; he continually pointed him to public life as the great theatre of his labours and triumphs.

AT SCHOOL.

Under such influences, his progress at a private school of distinction, where he was sent from childhood, was very rapid; the severe discipline pursued having the effect at once to repress his irregularities and to turn his passion for superiority in the right direction. Here he laid the foundation of that intimate acquaintance with the classics for which he was distinguished beyond most men of his age.

Charles was next sent to Eton, where he joined associates who were less advanced than himself in classical literature. This made him a leader in their studies and amusements. In everything that called for eloquence, especially, whether in public meetings or private debates, or the contentions of the playground, he held an acknowledged pre-eminence. On such occasions he always manifested those kind and generous feelings for which he was distinguished throughout life: espousing the cause of the weaker party, and exerting all his powers of oratory on behalf of those who were injured or neglected through prejudice or partiality for others.

Never content with mediocrity, he endeavoured to surpass his companions in everything he undertook; and his habits of self-indulgence unfortunately taking a new direction, he now became a leader in all the dissipation of the school. To complete the mischief, his father took him, at the age of fourteen, on a trip to Spa, at that time the great centre of gambling for Europe; and, incredible as it may seem, initiated him into all the mysteries of the gaming table. At the end of three months Charles returned to Eton with that fatal passion which so nearly proved his ruin for life, and immediately introduced gambling among his companions to an extent never before heard of in a public school. Under his influence, one of the boys, it is said, contracted debts of honour to the amount of ten thousand pounds, which he felt bound to pay when he arrived at manhood.

AT COLLEGE; FOREIGN TRAVEL.

At the end of six years Charles was removed to Oxford, where he continued two years, still maintaining the highest rank as a scholar. He left the university at the age of seventeen, and entered at once upon manhood. The light restraints imposed during his education being now removed, he became sole master of his own actions; and the prodigal liberality of his father supplied him with unbounded means of indulgence. For two years he travelled on the Continent, making great progress in Italian and French literature, and plunging, at the same time, into all the extravagance and vice of the most corrupt capitals of Europe. His father had succeeded, even beyond his intentions, in making him "a leader in fashionable dissipation;" and he now began to fear that he had thus defeated his main design, that of training him up to be an "orator and a statesman." He recalled him from the Continent, and was compelled in doing so—as afterwards appeared from his banker's accounts—to pay one hundred thousand pounds of debt contracted in two years. To wean him from habits which he had himself engendered, Lord Holland now resorted to the extraordinary expedient of having his son returned as a member of Parliament for Midhurst, a borough under his control, in May 1768, being a year and eight months before he was eligible by law.

A PSYCHOLOGICAL PUZZLE.

The conduct of the elder Fox is one of the strangest of psychological puzzles. It is true that he was weakly fond of the boy he was so proud of; but he was a veteran man of the world, and one of the shrewdest of politicians. No man was more capable of appreciating the promise that made brilliant political success almost a certainty to Charles; and political success was the object of Lord Holland's idolatry. No man was more keenly alive to the material advantages of the great fortune that might be made in a successful political career. He must have seen that his son was likely enough, in any case, to fall into the snares with which society surrounded him; that he was almost predestined by his personal fascinations to be a roué, and that on the slightest provocation he would become a gambler. And yet he not merely threw the reins on the boy's neck, but deliberately initiated him into vice and dissipation. It was the more gratuitous and the more reprehensible that Charles's refined and literary tastes might have been an antidote to the indulgence of his passions. Odd as it appears to those who have formed their impressions of the man of fashion and the statesman, Charles Fox was the most studious of his set at college, and held up as an example by his tutors to his fellow-students. In after life his fits of devotion to study, with his intense and versatile powers of application, made him master of many branches of knowledge to which those who passed for authorities had devoted a lifetime. Had he been born in another family, and in other circumstances, it is conceivable that he might have become a student and a recluse, even a bookworm. Had his father encouraged him to follow his early bent, he would have spared his son many follies and regrets, and himself a vast amount of the money he had accumulated at the cost of the nation. Three more years of such a life as he led at Oxford would have fortified his character and moulded his tastes; would have preserved him from untold evil, and quadrupled his influence as a statesman. But everything which the poor fellow tried to do for himself was undone by the fatal caprice of his father. Lord Holland, then and repeatedly afterwards, dragged him away from his studies to take him as his companion abroad. He set him, as we can easily believe, the very worst of examples, and seems to have actually forced him into the temptations in which Paris and other continental cities abounded. It extenuates his paternal weakness, although it aggravated the mischief he did, that from first to last he never grudged the sums of money for which his son drew upon him with the most profuse and affectionate confidence.

IN PARLIAMENT.

Fox took his seat in Parliament in November, 1768. His deficiency in age was perhaps unknown; at any rate no one came forward to dispute his right. By education he was a Tory; he had distinguished himself when at Paris by some lively French verses reflecting severely on Lord Chatham; and in his feelings, habits, and associations, he was opposed to the cause of popular liberty. He now came out as a warm supporter of the Duke of Grafton, with whom his father was closely allied in politics, just after Junius's first attack on the administration of his Grace; and delivered his maiden speech on the 15th of April, 1769, in support of the flagrant outrage on the rights of the people, the seating of Colonel Lattrell, as a member of the House, in the place of John Wilkes. Horace Walpole speaks of him as distinguished for his "insolence" on this occasion, as well as the "infinite superiority of his parts."

When Lord North came in as minister in February 1770, Fox, through the influence of his father, was appointed a Junior Lord of the Admiralty, and three years after, one of the Lords of the Treasury. His time was now divided between politics and gambling, and he was equally devoted to both. In the House he showed great, though irregular, power as an orator; and at the gaming table he often lost from five to ten thousand pounds at a single sitting. Though he differed from Lord North on the Royal Marriage and Toleration Act, he supported his Lordship in all his political measures, and even went at times beyond him, declaring that, for his part, he "paid no regard whatever to the voice of the people;" urging the imprisonment of Alderman Oliver and the Lord Mayor of London for the steps they took to guard the liberty of the press; and inveighing against Sergeant Glynn's motion respecting the rights of juries in cases of libel, the very rights which he afterwards secured to them by an Act of Parliament.

AN ABRUPT DISMISSAL.

To these views, derived from his father, and confirmed by all his present associates, he might very possibly have adhered through life, except for a breach which now took place between him and Lord North; so much do political principles depend on party connections and private interests! His Lordship found Fox too warm and independent in his zeal; he sometimes broke the ranks and took his place as a leader; and in one instance, when Woodfall was brought to the bar of the House for making too free a use of his press, Fox proposed an amendment to the motion made by his Lordship, and actually carried it against him, under which Woodfall was committed to Newgate—a measure never contemplated by the Ministry, and only calculated to injure them by its harshness. Such a violation of party discipline could not be overlooked, and it was decided at once to dismiss him. A day or two after (February 28th, 1774), as he was seated on the Treasury Bench conversing with Lord North, the following note was handed to him by the messenger of the House:—

"Sir,—His Majesty has thought proper to order a new commission of the Treasury to be made, in which I do not perceive your name. (Signed) North."

The cool contempt of this epistle shows the low esteem in which he was held by the Ministry, who plainly regarded him as a reckless gambler, whose friendship or hatred, notwithstanding all his talents, could never be of the least importance to any party.

His father, after expending an enormous sum in paying his debts, died about this time, leaving him an ample fortune, including his splendid estate in the Isle of Thanet; but the whole was almost immediately gone, sacrificed to the imperious passion which had taken entire possession of his soul. Paris and London were equal witnesses to its power.

It is probable that nothing but a blow like this, showing him the contempt into which he had sunk, rousing all his pride and driving him into the arms of new associates, whose talents commanded his respect, and whose instructions moulded his political principles, could ever have saved Fox from the ruin in which he was involved. As it was, years passed away before he gained a complete mastery over this terrible infatuation; and it may here be stated by way of anticipation, that his friends at a much later period (1793), finding him involved from time to time in the most painful embarrassments from this cause, united in a subscription, with which they purchased him an annuity of £3000 a year, which could not be alienated; and after this testimony of their regard, he wholly abstained from gambling.

FORMING NEW PRINCIPLES.

The period at which Mr. Fox now stood was peculiarly favourable to the formation of new and more correct political principles. Hitherto he had none that could be called his own; he had probably never reflected an hour on the subject; he had simply carried out those high aristocratic ideas with which he was taught from childhood to look down upon the body of the people. But a change in the policy of Lord North now made America the great object of political interest. Within a few weeks, the Boston Port Bill, and its attendant measures, were brought forward, designed to starve a town of twenty thousand inhabitants, with the adjoining province, into submission. The charter of that province was violently set aside; a British governor was empowered to send persons three thousand miles across the Atlantic to be tried in England for supposed offences in America; and British troops were to be employed in carrying out these acts of violence and outrage.

Fox was naturally one of the most humane of men. With his abhorrence of every species of cruelty, oppression, and injustice, quickened by the resentment which he naturally entertained against Lord North, it could not require much argument from Burke, Dunning, Barré, and other leaders of the Opposition, into whose society he was now thrown, to make him enter with his whole soul into all their views of these violent oppressive acts. He came forward at once to resist, and was the first man in the House who took the ground of denying the right of Parliament to tax the Colonies without their consent. He accused Lord North of the most flagrant treachery to his adherents in New England, and his Lordship soon found that he had raised up a most formidable antagonist where he had least expected one.

Fox now entered into debate, not occasionally as before, when the whim struck him, but earnestly and systematically, on almost every question that came up; and his proficiency may be learned from a letter of Gibbon,—who was then a member of the House and a supporter of the Ministry,—in which, speaking of a debate on the subject of America in February, 1775, he says: "The principal men both days were Fox and Wedderburne, on opposite sides: the latter displayed his usual talents; the former, taking the vast compass of the question before us, discovered powers for regular debate which neither his friends hoped nor his enemies dreaded."

The sentiments of Fox respecting the treatment of America, though springing, perhaps, at first from humane feelings alone, or opposition to Lord North, involved, as their necessary result, an entire change of his political principles. He was now brought, for the first time, to look at public measures, not on the side of privilege or prerogative, but of the rights and interests of the people. From that moment, all the sympathies of his nature took a new direction, and he went on identifying himself more and more, to the end of life, with the popular part of the Constitution and the cause of free principles throughout the world. It was a happy circumstance for him, in coming out so strongly at the early age of twenty-five, that he enjoyed the friendship of some of the ablest men among the Whigs, on whom he could rely with confidence in forming his opinions and conducting his political inquiries.

A POWERFUL DEBATER.

The ambition of Fox was now directed to a single object, that of making himself a powerful debater. A debater, in the distinctive sense of the term, is described by a lively writer as one who goes out in all weathers—one who, instead of carrying with him to the House a set speech drawn up beforehand, has that knowledge of general principles, that acquaintance with each subject as it comes up, that ready use of all his faculties, which enables him to meet every question where he finds it, to grapple with his antagonist at a moment's warning, and to avail himself of every advantage which springs from a perfect command of all his powers and resources.

In addition to great native quickness and force of mind, long-continued practice is requisite to make a successful debater. Fox once remarked to a friend that he had literally gained his skill "at the expense of the House;" for he had sometimes tasked himself, during a whole session, to speak on every question that presented itself, whether it interested him or not, as a means of exercising and training his faculties.

He now found it necessary to be intimately acquainted with the history of the Constitution and the political relations of the country; and though he continued for some years to be a votary of pleasure, he had such wonderful activity of mind and force of memory, that he soon gained an amount of information on these topics such as few men in the House possessed, and was able to master every subject in debate with surprising facility and completeness. In all this he thought of but one thing—not language, not imagery, not even the best disposition and sequence of his ideas, but argument; how to put down his antagonist, how to make out his own case. His love of argument was perhaps the most striking trait in his character. Even in conversation he was not satisfied, like most men, to throw out a remark, and leave it to make its own way; he must prove it, and subject the remarks of others to the same test; so that discussion formed the staple of all his thoughts, and entered to a great extent into all his intercourse with others.

With such habits and feelings he rose, says Burke, "by slow degrees to be the most brilliant and accomplished debater the world ever saw." There was certainly nothing of envy or disparagement—though charged upon him with great bitterness by Dr. Parr—in Burke's selecting the term "debater" to express the distinctive character of Fox. The character is one which gives far more weight and authority to a speaker in Parliament, than the most fervid oratory when unattended by the qualities we have mentioned above.

Notwithstanding the irregularities of his private life, to which Fox still unfortunately clung, he gradually rose as a speaker in Parliament, until, at the end of Lord North's administration, he was the acknowledged leader of the Whig party in the House. In many respects he was peculiarly qualified for such a station. He had a fine genial spirit, characteristic of the family, which drew his political friends around him with all the warmth of a personal attachment. "He was a man," said Burke, soon after their separation from each other, "who was made to be loved." His feelings were generous, open, and manly; the gaming-table had not made him, as it does most men, callous or morose; he was remarkably unassuming in his manners, yet frank and ardent in urging his views; he was above everything like trick or duplicity, and was governed by the impulses of a humane and magnanimous disposition. These things, in connection with his tact and boldness, qualified him pre-eminently to be a leader of a Whig Opposition, while his rash turn of mind, resulting from the errors of his early training, would operate less to his injury in such a situation; and his very slight regard for political consistency would as yet have no opportunity to be developed.

AS SECRETARY OF STATE; RESIGNATION.

It was with these characteristics that, at the end of the long struggle which drove Lord North from power, Fox came into office as Secretary of State, under Lord Rockingham, in March, 1782. This administration was terminated in thirteen weeks by the death of his Lordship, and Fox confidently expected to be made Prime Minister. But he had now to experience the natural consequence of his reckless spirit and disregard of character. The King would not, for a moment, entertain the idea of placing at the head of affairs a man who, besides his notorious dissipation, had beggared himself by gambling, and was still the slave of that ruinous passion. Nor was King George alone in his feelings. Reflecting men of the Whig party, who were out of the circle of Fox's immediate influence, had long been scandalized by the profligacy of his life.

In 1779, Dr. Price, who went beyond him in his devotion to liberal principles, remarked with great severity on Fox's conduct, in a Fast Sermon, which was widely circulated in print. "Can you imagine," said he, "that a spendthrift in his own concerns will make an economist in managing the concerns of others?—that a wild gamester will take due care of the state of a kingdom?—Treachery, vanity, and corruption must be the effects of dissipation, voluptuousness, and impiety. These sap the foundations of virtue; they render men necessitous and supple, ready at any time to fly to a court in order to repair a shattered fortune, and procure supplies for prodigality."

In addition to this, Fox had made himself personally obnoxious to George III by another exhibition of rashness. He had treated the King with great indignity in his speeches on the American war, pointing directly to his supposed feelings, and determination to rule in a manner forbidden by the Constitution, and plainly implying that he was governed by passions unbecoming his station as a King and disgraceful to his character as a man. It is difficult to understand how Fox could allow himself to indulge in such language, whatever may have been his private convictions, if he hoped ever to be made Premier; and it was certainly to be expected, for these reasons, as well as those mentioned above, that the King would never place him at the head of the Government, while he could find any other man who was competent to fill the station. He accordingly made Lord Shelburne Prime Minister, early in July, 1782; and Fox instantly resigned.

COALITION WITH LORD NORTH.

This step led to another, which was the great misfortune of Fox's life. Parties were so evenly balanced at the opening of the next Parliament in December, 1782, that neither the Minister nor either of his opponents had the command of the House. According to an estimate made by Gibbon, Lord Shelburne had one hundred and forty adherents, Lord North one hundred and twenty, and Fox ninety, leaving a considerable number who were unattached. Early in February, 1783, a report crept abroad that a coalition was on the tapis between Fox and Lord North. The story was at first treated as an idle tale. A coalition of some kind was indeed expected, because the Government could not be administered without an amalgamation of parties; but that Fox could ever unite with Lord North, after their bitter animosities and the glaring contrast of their principles on almost every question in politics, seemed utterly incredible. There was nothing of a personal nature to prevent an arrangement between Lord Shelburne and Lord North; but Fox had for years assailed his opponent in such language as seemed for ever to forbid any intercourse between the men, or any union of their interests as politicians. He had denounced him as "the most infamous of mankind," as "the greatest criminal of the State, whose blood must expiate the calamities he had brought upon his country;" and as if with the design of making it impossible for himself to enter into such an alliance, he had, only eleven months before, said of Lord North and his whole Ministry in the House of Commons: "From the moment I should make any terms with one of them, I would rest satisfied to be called the most infamous of mankind. I could not for an instant think of a coalition with men, who in every public and private transaction as Ministers, have shown themselves void of every principle of honour and honesty : in the hands of such men I would not trust my honour even for a minute."

Still rumours of a coalition became more and more prevalent, until on February 17th, 1783, says Wilberforce, in relating the progress of events, "when I reached the House, I inquired, 'Are the intentions of Lord North and Fox sufficiently known to be condemned?' 'Yes,' said Henry Banks, 'and the more strongly the better.'" The debate was on Lord Shelburne's treaty of peace with America : and every eye was turned to the slightest movements of the ex-Minister and his old antagonist, until at a late hour of the evening, Lord North came down from the gallery where he had been sitting, and took his place beside Fox. His Lordship then rose and attacked the treaty with great dexterity and force, as bringing disgrace upon the country by the concessions it made. Fox followed in the same strain, adding, in reference to himself and Lord North, that all causes of difference between them had ceased with the American war. The coalition was now complete. The debate continued till nearly eight o'clock the next morning, when Lord Shelburne was defeated by a majority of sixteen votes, and was compelled soon after to resign.

Next came the Coalition Ministry. To this the King submitted with the utmost reluctance, after labouring in vain first to persuade Pitt to undertake the Government, and then to obtain, as a personal favour from Lord North, the exclusion of Fox. So strong were the feelings of His Majesty, that he hesitated and delayed for six weeks, until, driven by repeated addresses from the House, he was obliged to yield ; and this ill-fated combination came into power on the 2nd April, 1783, with the Duke of Portland as its head, and Fox and Lord North as principal Secretaries of State.

"The occurrence of this coalition," says Mr. Cooke, one of Mr. Fox's warmest admirers, "is greatly to be deplored, as an example to men who, without any of the power, may nevertheless feel inclined to imitate the errors of Fox. It is to be deplored as a blot on the character of a great man, as a precedent which strikes at the foundation of political morality, and as a weapon in the hands of those who would destroy all confidence in the honesty of public men."

The laxity of principle which it shows in Fox

may be traced to the errors of his early education. It was the result of the pernicious habit in which he was trained, of gratifying every desire without the least regard to consequences, and the still more pernicious maxims taught him by his father, that "brilliant talents would atone for every kind of delinquency, and that, in politics especially, anything would be pardoned to a man of great designs and splendid abilities." Certain it is that Fox could never understand why he was condemned so severely for his union with Lord North. As an opponent, he had spoken of him, indeed, in rash and bitter tones, but never with a malignant spirit, for nothing was further from his disposition ; and knowing the character of the man, we can credit the statement of Gibbon, who was intimate with both, "that in their political contests these great antagonists had never felt any personal animosity ; that their reconciliation was easy and sincere ; and that their friendship had never been clouded by the shadow of suspicious and jealousies."

Every one now feels that Mr. Fox uttered his real sentiments when he said, "It is not in my nature to bear malice or ill-will ; my friendships are perpetual ; my enmities are not so : amicitiæ sempiternæ inimiciæ placabiles." But he had thus far shown himself to the world only on the worst side of his character ; and it is not surprising that most men considered him (what in fact he appeared to be on the face of the transaction) as a reckless politician, bent on the possession of power at whatever sacrifice of principle or consistency it might cost him. Even the warmest Whigs regarded him, to a great extent, in the same light. "From the moment this coalition was formed," says Bishop Watson, "I lost all confidence in public men." "The gazettes," says Sir Samuel Romilly in a letter to a friend, "have proclaimed to you the scandalous alliance between Fox and Lord North. It is not Fox alone, but his whole party ; so much so that it is no exaggeration to say, that of all the public characters of this devoted country (Mr. Pitt only excepted), there is not a man who has, or deserves, the nation's confidence."

THE EAST INDIA BILL.

The great measure of the Coalition Ministry was Fox's East India Bill. Perilous as the subject was to a new administration lying under the jealousy of the people, and the hostility of the King, it could not be avoided ; and Fox met it with a fearless resolution which at least demands our respect. The whole nation called for strong measures, and Fox produced a measure stronger than any one had contemplated. He at once cut the knot which politicians had long endeavoured to untie. He annulled the charter of the East India Company, and after providing for the payment of their debts, he took all their concerns into the hands of the Government at home, placing the civil and military affairs of India under the control of a board of seven commissioners, and putting their commercial interests into the hands of a second board, to be managed for the benefit of the shareholders.

Never since the Revolution of 1688 had any measure of the Government produced such a ferment in this country. Lawyers exclaimed against the Bill as a violation of chartered rights; all the corporate bodies of the kingdom saw in it a precedent which might be fatal to themselves; the East India Company considered it as involving the ruin of their commercial interests; and politicians regarded it as a desperate effort of Fox, after forcing his way into office against the wishes of the King, to set himself above the King's reach, and by this vast accession of patronage, to establish his Ministry for life.

Fox had again to suffer the bitter consequences of his disregard of character. The objections set up were plausible, and some of the provisions of the Bill were certainly impolitic for one situated as he was. Yet Mr. Mill, in his "British India," speaks of the alarm excited as one "for which the ground was extremely scanty, and for which, notwithstanding the industry and art with which the advantage was improved by the opposite party, it is difficult (considering the usual apathy of the public on much more important occasions) entirely to account." As to the principal charge, Lord Campbell observes, in his "Lives of the Chancellors," "No one at the present day believes that the framers of the famous East Indian Bill had the intention imputed to them of creating a power independent of the Crown. And as to the other objections, it is obvious that any effectual scheme of Indian reform would of necessity encroach on the charter of the Company; that such encroachments must in any case be liable to abuse as precedents; and that if (as all agreed was necessary) the Government at home assumed the civil and military administration of India, a large increase of patronage must fall into the hands of Ministers which others could abuse as easily as Fox. But the real difficulty was that no one knew how far to trust him. His conduct had given boundless scope for jealousy and suspicion. He had put into the hands of his enemies the means of utterly ruining his character; and it is undoubtedly true, as stated by one writer, that he was at this period regarded by the great body of the nation as selfish, vicious, and destitute of virtue; by thousands he was looked upon as a man with the purposes of a Catiline and the manners of a Lovelace."

Under all these difficulties Fox placed his reliance on his majority in the House, and went forward with an unbroken spirit, trusting to time, and especially to the character of the men he should name as commissioners, for the removal of this widespread opposition. He introduced his Bill on the 18th November, 1783, in a speech explaining its import and design; and at the end of twelve days, after one of the hardest fought battles which ever took place in the House, he closed the debate with a speech of great ability, in reply to his numerous opponents, and especially to Dundas and Pitt.

A STRONG OPPOSITION; DISMISSAL OF THE MINISTRY.

The Bill passed the Commons by a vote of 217 to 103; but when it came up in the House of Lords, it met with a new and more powerful resistance. Lord Temple, a near relation of Pitt, had obtained a private audience of the King, and represented the subject in such a light that His Majesty commissioned him to say that "whoever voted for the East Indian Bill were not only not his friends, but that he should consider them as his enemies." At its first reading, Lord Thurlow denounced it in the strongest terms; and turning to the Prince of Wales, who was present as a peer with the view to support the Bill, he added, with a dark scowl, as he looked him directly in the face, "I wish to see the Crown great and respectable, but if the present Bill should pass, it will be no longer worthy of a man of honour to wear. The King may take the diadem from his own head, and put it on the head of Mr. Fox."

An instantaneous change took place among the peerage. The King's message through Lord Temple had been secretly but widely circulated among the Lords, especially those of the royal household, who had given their proxies to the Ministry. These proxies were instantly withdrawn. Even Lord Stormont, a member of the Cabinet, who at first supported the Bill, changed sides after two days; the Prince of Wales felt unable to give Fox his vote, and the Bill was rejected by a majority of ninety-five to seventy-six. The King hastened to town the moment he learned the decision of the Lords, and at twelve o'clock the next night a messenger conveyed to

Fox and Lord North His Majesty's orders that "they should deliver up the seals of their offices, and send them by the Under Secretaries, as a personal interview on the occasion would be disagreeable to him." The other Ministers received their dismissal the next day in a note signed "Temple."

IN OPPOSITION.

But the battle was not over. Fox had still an overwhelming majority in the House; and feeling that the interference of the King was an encroachment on the rights of the Commons, he resolved to carry his resistance to the utmost extremity. Accordingly, some days after, when Pitt came in as Minister, he voted him down by so large a majority, that a division was not even called for. Again and again he voted him down, demanding of him, in each instance, to resign in accordance with parliamentary usage, and bringing upon him at last a direct vote, "That after the expressed opinion of the House, the continuance of the present Minister in office is contrary to constitutional principles, and injurious to the interests of His Majesty and the people." Earl Temple was terrified, and threw up his office within a few days, but Pitt stood firm.

The contest continued for three months, during which Fox delayed the supplies from time to time, and distinctly intimated that he might stop them entirely, and prevent the passing of the Mutiny Bill if Pitt did not resign. But his impetuosity carried him too far. He was in this case, as in some others, his own worst enemy. The King's interference was certainly a breach of privilege, and, under other circumstances, the whole country would have rallied round Fox to resist it. But every one now saw that the real difficulty was his exclusion from office; and when he attempted to force his way back by threatening to suspend the operations of Government, the nation turned against him more strongly than ever. They ascribed all that he did to mortified pride or disappointed ambition; they gave him no credit for those better feelings which mingled with these passions, and which he seems to have considered—so easily do men deceive themselves—as the only motives that impelled him to the violent measures he pursued.

Addresses now poured in upon the King from every quarter, entreating him not to yield. At a public meeting in Westminster Hall, Fox, who was present with a view to explain his conduct, was put down by cries of "No Great Mogul!" "No Indian tyrant!" "No usurper!" "No turn-coat!" "No dictator!" The city of London, once strongly in his favour, now turned against him. His adherents gradually fell off, until, on a division at the end of eleven weeks, March 8th, 1784, his majority had sunk from fifty-four to a single vote. A shout of triumph now broke forth from the ministerial benches. The contest in the House was ended, and the question was carried at once to the whole country by a dissolution of Parliament.

"FOX'S MARTYRS;" THE ELECTION AT WESTMINSTER.

The election which followed in April 1784 went against the friends of Fox in every part of the kingdom; more than a hundred and sixty having lost their places and become "Fox's Martyrs," in the sportive language of the day. In Westminster, which Fox and Sir Cecil Wray had represented in the preceding Parliament, the struggle was the most violent ever known, Wray being now in opposition to his old associate.

At the end of eleven days Fox was in a minority of three hundred and eighteen, and his defeat seemed inevitable, when relief came from a quarter never before heard of in a political canvass. Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire, a woman of extraordinary beauty and the highest mental accomplishments, took the field in his behalf. She literally became his canvasser. She went from house to house soliciting votes, she sent her private carriage to bring mechanics and others of the lowest class to the polls; she appeared at the hustings herself, in company with Fox; and on one occasion, when a young butcher turned the laugh on her by offering his vote for a kiss, in the enthusiasm of the moment, she took him at his word and paid him on the spot.

With such an ally Fox's fortunes soon began to mend; and at the termination of forty days, when the polls were closed, he had a majority over Sir Cecil Wray of two hundred and thirty-five votes. This triumph was celebrated by a splendid procession of his friends, most of them bearing fox-tails. The Prince of Wales showed the lively interest he had taken in the contest, by joining the procession on horseback in his uniform of a colonel of the Tenth Dragoons.

But Fox was not allowed to enjoy the fruit of his victory. Sir Cecil Wray demanded a scrutiny or revision of the poll, involving enormous expense, and a delay perhaps of years in taking testimony as to disputed votes. All this time Fox was to be deprived of his seat—the object really aimed at in the whole transaction. The presiding officer lent himself to this design; he returned Lord Hood, the third candidate, as a member, and made a report to the House that he had granted a scrutiny in relation to Sir Cecil Wray and Fox. There was no precedent for a scrutiny in a case like this, where the poll had been continued down to the very day before the meeting of Parliament, and the presiding officer was required by his writ to return two members for Westminster on the 18th May, being the next day. If he could avoid this—if he was authorized (instead of doing the best he could) to reserve the question, and enter on a scrutiny after the session had commenced, it is obvious that the entire representation of the country would be in the hands of the returning officers. Any one of them, from party views or corrupt motives, might deprive a member of his seat as long as he saw fit, under the pretence, as in the present case, of satisfying his conscience by a protracted scrutiny.

THE WESTMINSTER SCRUTINY.

The case came up early in the session; and Fox, being returned by a friend for the borough of Kirkwall, in the Orkney Isles, was enabled to join in the debate. Under any other circumstances Pitt would never have allowed his passions to become interested in such an affair; even if he thought the scrutiny legal, he would have seen the necessity of putting an end at once to a precedent so obnoxious to abuse. But the conflict of the previous session seems to have poisoned his mind, and he showed none of that magnanimity which we should naturally expect in one who had achieved so splendid a victory at the recent elections. He assailed Fox in the language of taunt and ungenerous sarcasm, describing him as a man on whom a sentence of banishment had been passed by his country—as “driven by the impulse of patriotic indignation an exile from his native clime, to seek refuge on the stormy and desolate shores of Ultima Thule.”

Nothing could be more admirable than the firmness and elasticity of Fox's spirit under these depressing circumstances, stripped as he was of nearly all his former supporters in the House. He seemed, like the old Romans, to gather strength and courage from the difficulties that surrounded him. On the 8th June, 1784, he discussed the subject of the Westminster scrutiny in one of the clearest and most fervid pieces of reasoning ever delivered in the House of Commons. adding, at the same time, some admonitions for Pitt and his other opponents, which effectually secured him against uncivil treatment in all their subsequent contests. Although the vote went against him at that time by a majority of 117, the House and the country soon became satisfied that the whole proceeding was dishonourable and oppressive; and at the end of nine months, Pitt had the mortification to see his majority, so firm on every other subject, turning against him on this, and by a vote of 162 to 124, putting an end to the scrutiny and demanding an immediate return.

Fox was accordingly returned the next day. The moment he took his seat as member for Westminster, he moved that all the proceedings in regard to the scrutiny be expunged from the journals of the House. This motion was supported by Scott, afterwards Lord Eldon, who, on this occasion, for the only time in his life, came out in opposition to Pitt; but the majority were unwilling to join him in so direct a vote of censure, and the motion was lost. Fox, however, recovered two thousand pounds damages from the presiding officer, the High Bailiff of Westminster, and a law was soon after passed providing against any farther abuses of this kind.

Fox was shortly after this time appointed one of the managers of the impeachment against Warren Hastings in 1786, and had assigned to him the second charge, relating to the oppressive treatment of Cheyte Sing, Rajah of Benares. This duty he performed in a manner which awakened general admiration, and fully sustained the high character he had already gained as a parliamentary orator.

THE REGENCY QUESTION.

In the autumn of 1788, while travelling in Italy, Fox was unexpectedly presented with the prospect of being called again to the head of affairs. The King became suddenly deranged, and if the malady continued, the Prince of Wales would, of course, be regent, and Fox his Prime Minister. A messenger with this intelligence found him at Bologna, and urged his immediate return, as the session of Parliament was soon to commence. He started at once, and never quitted his chaise during the whole journey, travelling night and day, until he reached London on the 24th November. At this time no definite anticipations could be formed with respect to the King's recovery. Parliament had voted a fortnight's recess to allow of time for deciding on the proper steps to be taken, and the political world was full of intrigue and agitation.

It was the great object of the Prince and his future Ministers to come in untrammelled; to have his authority as Regent during his father's illness established on the same footing as if he had succeeded to the throne by the King's death.

The existing Ministry, on the other hand, who believed that the King might speedily recover, were desirous to impose such restrictions on the Regency as would prevent Fox and his friends from intrenching themselves permanently in power.

A Regency Bill was framed by the Ministers, making the Prince of Wales Regent, but committing the King's person to the care of the Queen, with the right of appointing the officers of the Royal Household. It provided that the Prince should have no power over the personal property of the King, and no authority either to create new peers, or to grant any pension, place, or reversion to be held after the King's recovery, except offices made permanent by law.

Nearly three months were spent in debating this subject, every possible delay being interposed by Pitt, who was now confident of the King's recovery. Accordingly, about February 19th, 1789, His Majesty was declared by the physicians to be restored to a sound state of mind ; and Fox's prospect of office became more remote than ever, the King and the people being equally embittered against him, as having again endeavoured to establish himself in power by the use of violent and illegal means.

THE RUSSIAN ARMAMENT ; THE RIGHTS OF JURIES.

Fox's next conflict was in connection with the Russian Armament ; and here he carried the whole country with him in opposition to the warlike designs of the Ministry. The Courts of London and Berlin had demanded of the Empress of Russia, not only to desist from her war with Turkey, but to restore the numerous and important conquests she had made. Unwilling to provoke the resentment of these powerful and self-created arbiters, Catherine consented to yield everything but a small station in the Black Sea, called Ockza Kow, with the dependent territory. Pitt, under a mistaken view of the importance of this fortress, peremptorily insisted on its surrender ; the Empress, taking offence at this treatment, as peremptorily refused ; and the British Ministry made the most active preparations for war.

When the subject came before Parliament early in 1791, Fox put forth all his strength against this armament. Reflecting men throughout the country condemned Pitt for interfering in the contests of other nations ; and as the discussion went on in Parliament, Ministers found their majority so much reduced, that they promptly and wisely gave up the point in dispute. Fox gained greatly in the public estimation by his conduct on this occasion. He appeared in his true character, that of a friend of peace ; and was justly considered as having saved the country probably from a long and bloody war, certainly from much unnecessary expense contemplated by the Ministry.

Fox likewise distinguished himself at this period by his efforts to defend the rights of juries. The law of libel, as laid down by Lord Mansfield in the case of Woodfall, restricted the jury to the question of fact. Was the accused guilty of publishing, and did he point his remarks at the Government ? They were not allowed to inquire into his motives, or the legality of what he said ; and the real issue was therefore in the hands of the judges, who, being appointed by the Crown, were peculiarly liable to be swayed by Court influences. This made the trial by jury in libel cases a mere nullity, and too often turned it into an instrument for crushing the liberty of the press.

Burke took up the subject at the time of Woodfall's trial, and prepared a Bill for giving juries the right to judge of the law as well as the fact ; but it was rejected by a large majority. This Bill, in all its leading features, Fox brought forward again in 1791, after the famous trial of the Dean of St. Asaph, in which Mr. Erskine made his masterly argument on the rights of juries. Pitt generously seconded Fox in this effort, but the Bill was thrown out in the House of Lords. It was passed, however, in 1792, notwithstanding the pertinacious opposition of the Law Lords Thurlow, Kenyon, and Bathurst ; and Fox had the satisfaction of thus performing one of the most important services ever rendered to the liberty of the press.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

The progress of our narrative has led us forward insensibly to the midst of the French Revolution. Some one, speaking of this convulsion, remarked to Burke that it had shaken the whole world. " Yes," replied he, " and it has shaken the heart of Mr. Fox out of its place." Certain it is that everything Fox did or said on this subject, whether right or wrong, sprang directly from his heart, from the warm impulse of his humane and confiding nature. In fact, the leading statesmen of that day were all of them governed, in the part they took, far more by temperament and previous habits of thought than by any deep-laid schemes of policy. Burke was naturally cautious. His great principle in government was prescription. With him abstract right was nothing, circumstances were everything ; so that his first inquiry in politics was, not what is true or proper in the nature of things, but what is practicable, what is expedient, what is wise and safe in the present posture of affairs. Hence, on the question of taxing America, he treated all discussions of the abstract right with utter contempt. "I do not enter into these metaphysical distinctions," said he ; "I hate the sound of them." Fox, on the contrary, instantly put the question on the ground of right ; all the sympathies of his nature were on the side of the colonies as injured and insulted. "There is not an American," said he, "but must reject and resist the principle and the right."

With such feelings and habits of thought, it might have been foreseen from the beginning that Burke and Fox would be at utter variance respecting the French Revolution, carried on, as it was, upon the principle of the inherent "rights of man." The difficulty was greater because each of them, to a certain extent, had the truth on his side.

The first great triumph of popular violence was the attack on the Bastille on the 14th of July, 1789 ; and Fox, in referring to it in the House, quoted very happily from Cowper's "Task"—which had been recently published—the beautiful lines respecting that fortress :—

"Ye horrid towers, th' abode of broken hearts,
Ye dungeons and ye cages of despair,
That monarchs have supplied from age to age
With music such as suits their sovereign ears :
The sighs and groans of miserable men !
There's not an English heart that would not leap
To hear that ye were fall'n at last."

So far as this event was concerned, Burke's sympathies were entirely with Fox. He said it was impossible not to admire the spirit with which the attack was dictated ; but the excesses which followed brought him out soon after as an opponent of the Revolution ; while Fox, as might be expected from one of his ardent feelings, still clung to the cause he had espoused. He lamented these excesses as truly as Burke, but his hopeful spirit led him to believe they would speedily pass away. He ascribed them to the feelings naturally created by the preceding despotism, and thus insensibly became the apologist of the revolutionary leaders, as Burke was of the court and nobility.

FOX'S VIEWS.

The false position into which Fox was thus drawn was the great misfortune of his subsequent life. He had no feelings in common with the philosophising assassins of France ; and from the moment he learned their true character, and saw the utter failure of their experiments, it is much to be regretted that he should in any way have been led to appear as their advocate. And yet it seemed impossible for one of his turn of mind to avoid it. When Austria and Russia invaded France in July 1792, for the avowed purpose of restoring the absolute power of the King, he felt, as the whole world now feels, that it was not only the worst possible policy, but a flagrant violation of national rights. He sympathised with the French. He rejoiced, and proclaimed his joy in the House of Commons, when they drove out the invaders and seized, in their turn, upon the Austrian Netherlands. So, too, on the questions in dispute between England and France, which soon after resulted in war, he condemned the course taken by his own Government as harsh and insulting. He thus far sided with the French, declaring that the English Ministry had provoked the war, and were justly chargeable with the calamities it produced. And when the French, elated by their success in the Netherlands, poured forth their armies on the surrounding nations, with the avowed design of carrying out the Revolution by fire and sword, Fox was even then led by his peculiar position to palliate what he had no wish to justify. He dwelt on the provocations they had received, and showed great ingenuity in proving that the spirit of conquest and treachery which characterised the Republic was only the spirit of the Bourbons transfused into the new Government—that they had taught the nation and trained it up for ages to be the plunderers of mankind.

UNPOPULARITY.

It is difficult to conceive at the present day how all this grated on the ears of an immense majority of our countrymen. The world has learned many lessons from the French Revolution, and one of the most important is that which Fox was continually inculcating,—that nations, however wrong they may be in their conduct, should be left to manage their internal concerns in their own way. But the doctrines of Burke had taken complete possession of the higher class of minds throughout the country. The French were a set of demons. They had murdered their King and cast off religion ; it was therefore the duty of surrounding nations to put them out of the pale of civilized society, to treat them as robbers and pirates ; and whatever violence might result from such treatment, was to be charged on the revolutionary spirit of the French.

That spirit was bad enough, and would very likely, under any circumstances, have produced war; but if Fox's advice had been followed, much of the enthusiasm with which the whole French nation rushed into the contest would have been prevented, and the fire of the Revolution would probably have burned itself out within its own borders, instead of involving all Europe in the conflagration. But the great body of our countrymen were unprepared for such views, and Fox was the last man from whom they could hear anything of the kind even with patience. His early mistakes as to the Revolution had made him one of the most unpopular men in the kingdom; and it must be admitted, that while he was right in the great object at which he aimed, the nature of the argument and the warmth of his feelings made him too often seem the advocate of the French, even in their worst excesses. It was hardly possible, indeed, to oppose the war without appearing to take part with the enemy. Even Wilberforce, when he made his motion against it in 1794, was very generally suspected of revolutionary principles. "When I first went to the terre," said he, "after moving my amendment, the King cut me." "Your friend Mr. Wilberforce," said Windham to Lady Spencer, "will be very happy any morning to hand your Ladyship to the guillotine."

The name of Windham naturally suggests another event connected with Fox's views of the French Revolution. Nearly all his friends deserted him and became his most strenuous opponents. Burke led the way. The Duke of Portland, Lord Loughborough, Windham, and a large number of the leading Whigs followed at a later period, leaving him with only a handful of supporters in the House to maintain the contest against Pitt. Any other man, in such circumstances, would have given up in despair, but Fox's spirit seemed always to rise just in proportion to the difficulties with which he had to contend.

SEPARATION FROM BURKE.

On the termination of not merely his political alliance with Burke, but of his friendship with that great orator, it is necessary that we should say a few words.

The difference of their opinions on continental affairs had been shown so early as in February 1790, during a discussion on the Army estimates. At this time, however, each spoke of the other in terms of kindness and regard. But it was not always thus. When on the 6th May, 1791, the Quebec Government Bill, or Bill for regulating the government of Upper and Lower Canada, came under discussion, Mr. Burke rose and was proceeding to deliver a violent diatribe against the French Revolution, when, after he had been several times ineffectually called to order, it was moved by Lord Sheffield, and seconded by Fox, "that dissertations on the French constitution, and narrations of transactions in France, are not regular nor orderly on the question; that the clauses of the Quebec Bill be read a second time." The remarks made by Fox in seconding the motion, though there seems to have been but little in them calculated to irritate, irritated Mr. Burke; and when he rose to reply, he did so under the influence of strong excitement, and complained bitterly that he had not been treated by Fox as one friend should be treated by another. He observed, towards the conclusion of his speech, that it certainly was indiscreet at his time of life to provoke enemies, or give his friends occasion to desert him; yet if his firm and steady adherence to the British constitution placed him in such a dilemma, he would risk all; and, as public duty and public prudence taught him, with his last breath exclaim, "Fly from the French constitution." Fox here whispered that there was no loss of friendship. "Yes, there is," Mr. Burke exclaimed, "I know the price of my conduct; I have done my duty at the price of my friend; our friendship is at an end." At the conclusion of Mr. Burke's speech, Fox rose, but it was some minutes before his tears allowed him to proceed. So soon as he could speak, he pressed upon Mr. Burke the claims of a friendship of five-and-twenty years' duration, but to no purpose. Mr. Burke remained relentless, and the breach was never made whole.

THE RIGHTS OF THE PEOPLE.

While he pleaded incessantly for peace with France, Fox maintained a desperate struggle for the rights of the English people during the memorable season of agitation and alarm from 1793 to 1797. His remedy for the disaffection which prevailed so extensively among the middle and lower classes, was that of Lord Chatham: "Remove their grievances; that will restore them to peace and tranquillity." "It may be asked," said he, "what would I propose to do in times of agitation like the present? I will answer openly. If there is a tendency in the Dissenters to discontent, because they conceive themselves to be unjustly suspected and calumniated, what would I do? I would instantly repeal the Test and Corporation Acts, and take from them, by such a step, all cause of complaint. If there are persons tinctured with a republican spirit, because they think that the representative government would be more perfect in a republic, I would endeavour to amend the representation of the Commons, and to show that the House, though not chosen by all, can have no other interest than to prove itself the representative of all. If there are men dissatisfied in Scotland, or Ireland, or elsewhere, by reason of disabilities and exemptions, of unjust prejudices, and of cruel restrictions, I would repeal the penal statutes, which are a disgrace to our law books. If I were to issue a proclamation" (the King had just issued one against seditious writings), "this should be my proclamation, 'If any man has a grievance let him bring it to the bar of the Commons' House of Parliament, with the firm persuasion of having it honestly investigated.' These are the subsidies that I would grant to government."

Such indeed were the subsidia, the support and strength in the hearts of his people, which the Sovereign needed. But George III. and his counsellors at that time looked only to restriction and force. A repeal of the Corporation and Tea Acts was not to be thought of, though strenuously urged by Fox, because Dr. Price and Dr. Priestley, who were leading Dissenters, had been warm friends of the French Revolution. The King would hear nothing of any relief for the Roman Catholics: his coronation oath required him to keep them in perpetual bondage. As to parliamentary reform, Fox himself at a later period saw no plan which he thought free from objections; and hence Moore and others of his friends have been led unjustly to represent him as a cold, if not even a hypocritical, advocate of this measure. But from a private letter it appears that his views at this time experienced a material change. "I think," said he, "we ought to go further toward agreeing with the democratic or popular party than at any former period."

Accordingly, in May 1797, he supported Mr. Grey's motion for reform in a speech of uncommon beauty and force. His great struggle for the rights of the people was, however, somewhat earlier, during the period which has been called, though with some exaggeration, the "Reign of Terror." Lord Loughborough and other Whigs who seceded to Pitt, had urged the Ministry, with the proverbial zeal of new converts, into the most violent measures for putting down political discussion. The Habeas Corpus Act was suspended; the Traitorous Correspondence Bill made it high treason to hold intercourse with the French, or supply them with any commodities; the Treasonable Practice Bill was designed to construe into treason a conspiracy to levy war even without an overt act amounting thereto; and the Seditious Meetings Bill forbade any assembly of more than fifty persons to be held for political purposes, without the licence of a magistrate. The two Bills last mentioned were so hostile to the spirit of a free government, that even Lord Thurlow opposed them in the most vehement manner. It was during the discussion of the Seditious Meetings Bill that Fox made his famous declaration that "if the Bill should pass into a law, contrary to the sense and opinion of a great majority of the nation, and if the law after it was passed should be executed according to the rigorous provisions of the Act, resistance would not be a question of duty but of prudence."

It was unfortunate for Fox that he was so often hurried into rash declarations of this kind. Threats are not usually the best mode of defending the cause of freedom. Another of his hasty expressions did him great injury about three years after. At a dinner of the Whig Club in 1798, he gave as a toast "the sovereignty of the people of Great Britain." Exactly what he meant by this it is difficult to say. He was a firm friend of the British constitution, with its three estates of King, Lords, and Commons. He always declared himself to be against a republic, and he could not therefore have wished that the functions of sovereignty should be taken from the existing head of the Government, and conferred on the body of the people or their representatives in Parliament. Whatever his meaning, it is certain that the King considered it as a personal insult, and ordered his name to be struck from the list of Privy Councillors, a step never taken in any other case during his long reign, except in that of Lord George Germaine, when convicted of dereliction of duty, if not of cowardice, at the battle of Minden.

IN RETIREMENT: PROPOSALS FOR PEACE.

Pitt's ascendancy in the House was now so complete that Fox had no motive to continue his attendance in Parliament. He therefore withdrew from public business for some years, devoting himself to literary pursuits and the society of his friends. At no time does his character appear in so amiable a point of view. He had gradually worn out his vices. His marriage with Mrs. Armstead, which was announced at a later period, exerted the happiest influence on his character. This was truly, as a friend remarked, the golden season of his life. He devoted much of his time to the study of the classics, and especially of the Greek tragedians. At this time also he commenced his work on the Revolution of 1688, which was published after his death.

From this retirement he was temporarily called forth by an occurrence which led to one of the noblest efforts of his eloquence. In December 1799, Bonaparte was elected First Consul of France for ten years, and the day after his induction into office, he indited a letter to George III. in his own hand, making proposals for peace. Pitt, however, even refused to treat with him on the subject. Upon the 3rd February, 1800, the question came before the House on a motion for approving the course taken by the Ministry, and Fox appeared again in his place. Pitt, who felt the difficulty of the situation, had prepared himself beforehand with the utmost care. In a speech of five hours long he went back to the origin of the war, brought up minutely all the atrocities of the Revolution, dwelt on the instability of the successive Governments which had marked its progress, commented with terrible severity on the character and crimes of Bonaparte during the preceding four years, and justified, on these grounds, his backwardness to recognize the new Government, or to rely on its offers of peace.

When he concluded, at four o'clock in the morning, Fox, who was always most powerful in reply, instantly rose and answered him with a speech of nearly the same length, meeting him on all the main topics with a force of argument, a dexterity in wresting Pitt's weapons out of his hands and turning them against him, with a keenness of retort, a graphic power of description, and an impetuous flow of eloquence, to which we find no parallel in any other of his published speeches.

Fox's ardent desires for peace, though disappointed at this time, were soon after gratified by the Treaty of Amiens, at the beginning of 1802. It proved, however, to be a mere truce. War was declared by England on the 18th May, 1803. To this declaration Fox was strenuously opposed, and made a speech against it which Lord Brougham refers to as one of his greatest efforts.

IN OFFICE AGAIN.

Pitt died in January, 1806; and Fox, at the end of twenty-two years, was called again into the service of his country as Secretary of Foreign Affairs, on the 5th February, 1806, through the instrumentality of Lord Grenville. His office was at that time the most important one under the Government, and he may be considered as virtually Minister.

One of his first official acts was that of moving a resolution for the early abolition of the slave trade, which he had from the first united with Wilberforce in opposing. This resolution was carried by a vote of 114 against 15, and was followed up the next session by effectual measures for putting an end to this guilty traffic.

He soon after entered on a negotiation for peace with France, which commenced in a somewhat singular manner. A Frenchman made his appearance at the Foreign Office, under the name of De la Grevillière, and requested a private interview with Fox. He went on to say that "it was necessary for the tranquillity of all crowned heads to put to death the ruler of France, and that a house had been hired at Passy for this purpose." On hearing these words Fox drove him at once from his presence, and despatched a communication to Talleyrand, informing him of the facts. "I am not ashamed to confess to you who know me," said he, "that my confusion was extreme at finding myself led into conversation with an avowed assassin. I instantly ordered him to leave me. Our laws do not allow me to detain him, but I shall take care to have him landed at a seaport as remote as possible from France."

A reply was sent from Bonaparte, saying, among other things, "I recognise here the principles, honour, and virtues of Mr. Fox. Thank him on my part." In connection with this reply, Talleyrand stated that the Emperor was ready to negotiate for a peace, "on the basis of the Treaty of Amiens." Communications were accordingly opened on the subject; but at this important crisis Fox's health began to fail him.

FOX'S DEATH.

He had been taken ill some months before, in consequence of exposure at the funeral of Lord Nelson, and his physicians now insisted that he should abstain for a time from all public duties. In July the disease was found to be dropsy of the chest, and after lingering for three months, he died at the house of the Duke of Devonshire, at Chiswick, on the 13th September, 1806. He was buried with the highest honours of the nation in Westminster Abbey, his grave being directly adjoining the grave of Lord Chatham, and close to that of his illustrious rival, William Pitt.

FOX AS AN ORATOR.

Fox was the most completely English of all the orators in our language. Lord Chatham was formed on the classic model—the express union of force, majesty, and grace. He stood raised above his audience, and launched the bolts of his eloquence, like the Apollo Belvidere, with the proud consciousness of irresistible might. Fox stood on the floor of the House like a Norfolkshire farmer in the midst of his fellows ; short, thick-set, with his broad shoulders and capacious chest, his bushy hair and eyebrows, and his dark countenance working with emotion, the very image of blunt honesty and strength.

His understanding was all English—plain, practical, of prodigious force, always directed to definite ends and objects, under the absolute control of sound common sense. He had that historical cast of mind by which our great jurists and statesmen have been so generally distinguished. Facts were the staple of his thoughts ; all the force of his intellect was exerted on the actual and the positive.

[His heart, too, was English. There is a depth and tenderness of feeling in our national character, which is all the greater in a strong mind, because custom requires it to be repressed. In private life no man was more guarded in this respect than Fox ; he was the last person to be concerned in getting up a scene. But when he stood before an audience, he poured out his feelings with all the simplicity of a child. "I have seen his countenance," says Mr. Godwin, "lighten up with more than mortal ardour and goodness ; I have been present when his voice was suffocated with tears." In all this, his profound understanding went out the whole length of his emotion, so that there was nothing strained or unnatural in his most vehement bursts of passion. "His feeling," says Coleridge, "was all intellect, and his intellect was all feeling." Never was there a finer summing up ; it shows us at a glance the whole secret of his power. To this he added the most perfect sincerity and artlessness of manner. His very faults seemed to heighten the beauty of his honesty. His broken sentences, the choking of his voice, his ungainly gestures, his sudden starts of passion, the absolute scream with which he delivered his vehement passages, all showed him to be deeply moved and in earnest, so that it may be doubted whether a more perfect delivery would not have weakened the impression he made.

The complete subordination of himself to the cause or party in which he was enlisted, made Fox always decorous in debate. Though a more frequent speaker while in Parliament than any other member, it is safe to say that he was never called to order for an unparliamentary expression. Gibbon himself bore the most unqualified testimony to Fox's moral elevation of character.

"No human being," he said, "was ever more free from any taint of malignity, vanity, or falsehood. It was his entire freedom from self-consciousness, which vanity will always betray, that gave Fox a large share of his influence in Parliament. He never seemed to be concerned about himself, or with anything but the division.

FOX'S CHARACTER.

Though Fox may never have known the highest joys of the Christian life, he was a sincere believer in the doctrines of Christianity, and never was heard to utter a word that betrayed either indifference to or want of confidence in them. "Though undoubtedly," says his earliest biographer, Mr. Fell, "there were and are men of great piety in the House of Commons, whose close attention to religious subjects has done them honour, I have not in the whole course of that attention to the Parliamentary procedure of the last thirty years which the preceding pages of this volume required, found any speeches or even allusions to a subject in every age so interesting to man, the hope of the virtuous, the comfort of the afflicted, and the terror of the vicious, so replete with genuine and unaffected religion as those of Mr. Fox."

While there is no doubt a great deal to admire and love in the character of Fox, there is no man of his own or perhaps of any age who presented in himself more to be accepted, and, at the same time, more to be avoided as an example. His habits of life would have ruined him before he had come to maturity if he had not contracted them innocently, and if they had not been afterwards controlled to some extent by intellectual endowments of the very highest order. Happily the number of parents, remarks one writer, who train children as Fox was trained is very limited, and unhappily the number born with such marvellous endowments is still more limited. He is therefore to be contemplated as a phenomenon rather than as a model, reminding one of the Pyramid of Cheops, so imposing in its dimensions, so unique in all its proportions, but fitly built in a wilderness, and not a model on which a school of architecture can ever be founded.

The life of Fox has this lesson for the young, that early habits of recklessness and vice can hardly fail to destroy the influence of the most splendid abilities and the most humane and generous dispositions. Though thirty-eight years in public life, he was in office only eighteen months.

LORD SHAFTESBURY has by his whole life amply vindicated and well-sustained the motto of the Ashley family—"LOVE AND SERVE," as will be seen by the following brief but thrilling narrative of his grand career and noble efforts to love God and serve his neighbour. He was a nobleman whose "life with deeds to crown it" is endeared in the hearts and memories, not only of those who knew him, but of all who have watched his career in his manifold endeavours to elevate and bless his fellow-man. He might have served either as a model of a practical saint, or of a high-minded patriot. He believed in the charity which would lead people by sympathy and kindness to help themselves, and in all directions he has made his power in this way felt, by classes and persons who most needed the friendly hand and the cheering voice, to bid them look upward and onward to a brighter and better state of things.

HIS BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

The Right Hon. Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, seventh Earl of Shaftesbury, Baron Ashley of Wimborne St. Giles, Dorset, Baron Cooper of Paulett, Somerset, and a Baronet, K.G., F.R.A.S., was born in Grosvenor Square on the 28th of April, 1801. He was the eldest son of the sixth earl. But he was not dependent for the honourable name by which he was known so much to his ancestry, as to his own world-wide reputation, for beneficent efforts, and self-sacrificing zeal, which never seemed to falter or fail when any needful effort called it forth. His childhood was mostly spent in the family home in Dorsetshire. At Harrow and Oxford, where he was educated, Lord Ashley, as he was then called, gave ample proof of possessing that ability and application, which for so long a period distinguished him. At Christ Church in 1822 he took a first class in Classics; graduated as M.A. in 1832, and was created D.C.L. in 1841. Bishop Short, of Adelaide, a fellow student with him, recalled at a meeting at which they met sixty years after, "watching Lord Ashley day after day walking up the great hall of that ancient house on his way to lectures, assiduous in his duties, diligent in his studies," and also how he thought that "if that was a specimen of the English aristocracy, we have in the House of Lords an institution which has no equal throughout the world."

WHAT HE WISHED TO BE.

If he had been able to choose for himself, he tells us how he would have shaped his course in the following words: "In early life I was passionately fond of science, so much so, that I was almost disposed to pursue science to the exclusion of everything else. It passed away, and I betook myself to literature, hoping that I should not only equal, but that I should rival many in mental accomplishments. Other things were before me, and other things passed away, because, do what I would, I was called to another career, and now I find myself, at the end of a long life, not a philosopher, not an author, but simply an old man, who has endeavoured to do his duty in that state of life to which it has pleased God to call me."

A MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT.

When he arrived at twenty-five he took his seat in the House of Commons as Member for Woodstock, and soon showed his capacity and ability for political affairs. In 1829 he was appointed to a Board of Control Commissionership under the administration of the Duke of Wellington. One of his earliest speeches was made upon a Bill to amend the Law for the Regulation of Pauper Lunatics. For years he gave special attention to the subject of lunacy legislation, although his efforts have not received proper recognition at the hands of the nation.

HIS MARRIAGE.

In the year 1830 Lord Ashley married Emily, daughter of the fifth Earl Cowper, whose mother afterwards became Lady Palmerston. In the following year a son was born, who now succeeds to the title; subsequently he had issue five more sons and four daughters. Lady Shaftesbury died in 1872. Her Majesty the Queen wrote a most kind and touching letter to the earl upon his sad loss, and referred to her ladyship in the most affectionate and warmest terms.

AS A SOCIAL REFORMER.

In 1830 he represented Dorchester, in 1831 the county of Dorset until 1851, when he succeeded to the earldom by the death of his father. Both as Lord Ashley and Lord Shaftesbury, however, he mainly continued a Conservative "unattached," his politics being formed upon social rather than party grounds, and having about them an elasticity which enabled him to act, as statesman and legislator, with entire independence. When he first entered Parliament, the country was passing through a great crisis. Poverty and destitution, owing to a number of causes, prevailed to an alarming extent. Riots and outrages were frequent. It was then that he took what is called "The Ten Hours' Movement" in hand. To understand this it is needful to say that, owing to the invention of machinery, thousands of children were sent down into Lancashire from the work-houses in London by the large-load. Their hardships none could conceive. "Language," said Lord Shaftesbury in one of his retrospective speeches, "would fail to describe their humble sufferings; but their lives were shortened, and they died off rapidly." His wife urged him to "go forward and to victory." although he felt unequal to the work, and at length he had the satisfaction, after enduring much opposition and hostility, to see it passed. Although he was appointed to Government positions, yet he showed that he possessed higher ambition than mere office, and determined not to let place or party prevent his following out the self-imposed task, of remedying the wrongs of the poor, whatever opposition and isolation it involved.

RELIGIOUS ZEAL.

He was early convinced that the religious destitution of the masses was scarcely less acute than their social and moral degradation, and it appears to have resulted in inducing him to support so many movements, with which his name has been so familiar, and which have resulted in so much good to the world. For many years previously he had enjoyed the fullest confidence of the Evangelical party of the Church of England. When the Queen ascended the throne, Lord Ashley, then in his thirty-seventh year, was a noted philanthropist, and often to be seen at Exeter Hall. A writer who was present in 1838 at one of his meetings thus describes

HIS PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

Lord Ashley possesses, perhaps, the palest, purest, stateliest exterior of any man you will see in a month's perambulation of Westminster; indeed, it would be difficult to imagine a more complete beau idéal of aristocracy in all its properties than the person of this elegant nobleman.

His lordship looks about six-and-twenty, but is some ten years older. He is above the medium size, about five feet eleven, with a slender and extremely graceful figure, which might almost pass for that of some classic statue attired in a fashionable English costume, and the similarity is not at all impaired by the rigidity of his lordship's muscles. His fine beard has also much of the "marble" about it; his curling dark hair in its thick masses resembles that of a sculptured bust, and his fine brow and features are distinctly, yet delicately cut, the nose, perhaps, a trifle too prominent to be handsome; he has light blue eyes, deeply set and near each other, with projecting white eyelids; his mouth is small, retiring and compressed. The whole countenance has the coldness as well as the grace of a chiselled one, and expresses precision, prudence, and determination in no common degree. To judge from the set form of lips, you would say, not only that he never acts from impulse, but that he seldom, if ever, felt an impulse in his life. All that Lord Ashley does, seems to be done from conviction and principle, and not even a muscle dares to move without an order from headquarters. Every separate lock of his hair appears to curl because it has a reason for so doing, and knows that to be the right course of conduct.

FACTORY WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

To advance the cause of factory women and children for a long period absorbed his attention. He was not content with knowing that the regulations were enforced, but he pressed the government through Lord John Russell to make further extensions; and in 1840 he succeeded in getting a committee appointed to inquire into the operation of the Act, which bore good fruit. He was the means, directly or indirectly, of getting placed upon the Statute Book almost every measure of social reform which became law at that time, and for a long period after. He then busied himself with seeing that the Act which was intended to stop boys climbing up chimneys to sweep was being enforced; and five years after, when he became Lord Shaftesbury, he brought forth a motion in the Upper House, complaining that the Act was being evaded. In 1841 he made a tour in Lancashire to see for himself how the Factory Act was working, and in 1842 he presented a report of the commission. His speech electrified the country, as he told them of the horrors the report revealed. How that little boys and girls of four or five years old were sent down into pits, and were put to dragging sledge-tubs by girdle and chains on all fours through roadways, often not more than 22 to 28 inches high, and full of mud and water, for fourteen or sixteen hours a day, half naked, and exposed to cold, darkness, and foul air. Girls and women had to labour in ways destructive of all self-respect and purity. Lord Ashley, as he then was, addressing the House of Commons, thus graphically summarised the report:—

"In South Staffordshire it is common to begin work at seven years old; in Shropshire some begin as early as six years of age; in Warwickshire the same; in Leicestershire nearly the same. In Derbyshire many begin at five, many between five and six, many at seven. In the West Riding of Yorkshire it is not uncommon for infants even of five years old to be sent to the pit. About Halifax and the neighbourhood children are sometimes brought to the pits at the age of six years, and are taken out of their beds at four o'clock. Bradford and Leeds the same; in Lancashire, from five to six. Near Oldham children are worked as low as four years old; and in the small collieries toward the hills some are so young they are brought to work in their bedgowns." Matters in Wales and Scotland he described as not a whit better; for though some localities may not have been quite so bad as others, the general custom of employing even infants of both sexes in the pits was pretty general. Thus "the ways are so low that only little boys can work in them," said Lord Ashley in describing the state of things at Oldham; and it was added that they worked "naked, and often in mud and water, dragging sledge-tubs by the girdle and chain." In the east of Scotland the coal-bearers of the pits were said almost always to have been girls and women; and while the elder ones carried loads varying from 84 lb. to 336 lb., one "little girl, only six years old," was found carrying half a cwt. "And it not unfrequently happens," it was added, "that the tugs break, and the load falls upon those females who are following, who are, of course, struck off the ladders into the depths below." The girls and lads thus employed ranged in age from seven to twenty-one years. The effects of this system and of the long hours during which the operatives were required to remain at their labour were everywhere discernible in the mining districts, the general results having been "stunted growth, crippled gait, irritation of the head, back, and feet, a variety of diseases, premature old age, and death."

Describing many years afterwards a visit to a factory, he said:—

"I can recollect, in the earlier periods of this movement, waiting at the factory-gates to see the children come out, and a set of sad, dejected, cadaverous creatures they were. Then one asked, 'Can any of them reach their homes alive?' In Bradford especially the proofs of long and cruel toil were most remarkable. The cripples and distorted forms might be numbered by hundreds, perhaps by thousands."

The result was that a law, forbidding women and girls and boys under fourteen working in mines and collieries, was carried, and has proved one of the greatest boons to the poor.

THE TEN HOURS MOVEMENT.

It may with truth be said that wherever there was a wrong which could be remedied, or suffering which might be averted, he was ready to do what he could to help to secure it. The possibility of cheering any home, brightening any life, purging any physical or moral evil out of the way, would find his hand quick to help, and his heart warm to feel. The humbler the calling, the meaner the lot, the more despised the position, the greater the need he felt for his help and sympathy. From year to year Lord Ashley sought to improve the measures, which had been passed to lessen the ills of the factory system, and in 1850 he could say that, "emerging from many struggles, it was reduced to good working order. One provision alone was wanting—to confine the labour of children of tender years within the hours of six and six. This was done in 1853 by Lord Palmerston, and since that day the Act has required neither impulse nor amendment." It also became a source of joy for his lordship to live to see the day, when those who had bitterly opposed him personally thanked him for his efforts; and as some slight recognition of what he had done on behalf of the factory operatives, they presented the Countess, who had so warmly supported him even when others considered the work hopeless, with a bust of her husband on the 6th August, 1859. Such was the enthusiasm of the people on that occasion, that 7,000 persons belonging to the Manchester district insisted upon kissing Lord Ashley's hand. A significant proof that they appreciated and recognised his self-denying efforts on their behalf.

That his labours were appreciated not only by the workpeople, but in the long run by the employers, was demonstrated by an incident which his lordship has related in the following words:—

"I remember perfectly well that when, after the attainment of the principal objects of the factory movement, I went round from mill to mill to see the several proprietors, and thanked them for their concessions, one of the greatest of them received me in his counting-house, took me by both hands, and said, 'I was long your most determined opponent, but you have carried the day; and now never part with a hair's-breadth of what you have gained. It will do no harm to us, and it will do great good to the people.' And such have ever been their sentiments and their action. The evils chiefly feared were 'foreign competition, loss of trade, reduced wages, and universal distress'; but these in time were answered by increased production, equal profits, higher wages, and universal prosperity."

AMONG THE THIEVES.

Nor must we forget that, during these years he was also mindful of other questions of importance. Baron Bunsen says in his diary for February, 1839 :—"Ashley took me to a meeting whose tendency and significance made that day one of the most important of my life. He, and Sandon, and others desire a lay union for extension of Church rights, in order to call upon all lay Churchmen of England to stand up for two points : one, that the people shall have a regular education, in parish and commercial schools ; the second, that the schools shall be under the clergy, directed by a diocesan board, consisting of clergy and gentry under the bishop. Bunsen goes on to add his testimony to Lord Ashley's work among the thieves. On one occasion, together with Jackson, the city missionary, he met 279 thieves, at their own wish, to consult with them as to the means they could employ to lead better lives. He gained the hearts of the poor and the unfortunate in an almost unexampled manner. Nor should his efforts in connection with the abolition of slavery be forgotten.

When charged, as he was, by some with seeking to set class against class, he repelled it with righteous indignation in the following manner, by asking :—"Can any man in his senses now hesitate to believe, that the permanent prosperity of the manufacturing body, in all its several aspects, physical, moral, and commercial, is essential, not only to the welfare, but absolutely to the existence of the British Empire ? Now, we fear not the increase of your political power nor envy your stupendous riches ; 'peace be within your walls and plenteousness within your palaces.' We ask but a slight relaxation of toil, a time to live and a time to die ; a time for those comforts that sweeten life ; and a time for those duties that adorn it : and, therefore, with a fervent prayer to Almighty God that it may please Him to turn the hearts of all who hear me to thoughts of justice and of mercy, I now fully commit the issue to the judgment and the humanity of Parliament."

AGRICULTURAL GANGS.

In 1863, Lord Shaftesbury moved in the Lords for an address to the Queen for an inquiry into the system of "organised labour," known by the name of "agricultural gangs." In reply to a taunt he said, "It was reserved, first, because it presented the greatest difficulties, and second, because it required all the sympathy and experience to be derived from proofs of success, furnished by factories, to obtain for it a favourable reception." The report presented such a revelation of the moral and social degradation which prevailed, that it virtually amounted to a system of slavery, and the Bill became law almost without opposition, and it has been further developed by the Education Acts. He always insisted upon the rights of the agricultural labourer, because he understood his needs. He said in 1868 :—

"Nevertheless, with all these deficiencies (of education) which the wisdom of Parliament will endeavour to supply, I cannot refrain from making, on behalf of the first-rate agricultural labourer, a larger claim than is usually admitted, to be considered a man of education ; that he is 'a skilled artizan' will anyone deny ? Look at him engaged with the plough, see the length and straightness of each furrow, its mathematical precision, the steadiness of his hand and eye, and his masterly calculation of distance and force. Observe a hedger on all the various branches of that part of labour, and admit the accuracy of judgment that is required for a calling so apparently humble ; no spinner could do what he does any more than he could do what is done by the spinner. His talk, too, may be of bullocks ; it may be also of sheep ; it may be of even parochial matter ; but then, it is talk upon his special vocation ; and oftentimes how sound and sensible it is. He has not, of course, the acquirements and acuteness of the urban operative ; his labour is passed in comparative solitude, and he returns to his home at night, in a remote cottage or a small village, without the resource of clubs, mechanics' institutes, and the friction of his fellow-men. Still, he may say, with the most scientific, that he is master of the profession to which he is called ; and everyone will rejoice to add to his honourable and useful career whatever is possible to comfort and adorn it."

OUR LUNATICS.

For more than fifty years Lord Shaftesbury faithfully and zealously laboured for the passing of amendments, and also for the consolidation of the laws on this subject, and a few months prior to his death he again consented to resume his work. When he first began, he found things in a frightful condition. The filth and wretchedness of the pauper lunatics in the workhouses was simply terrible. They were often housed in stables, and bedded on dirty straw. They were so closely confined that the most fearful distortions resulted. In some chest bones protruded, others had legs bent backward, and knee-joints fixed and immovable, etc. He succeeded in working a mighty change, but died ere he had time to complete the revision of such measures, which his ripened judgment and vast experience had so eminently fitted him to undertake.

CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

As a friend of the principles of civil and religious liberty, he has ever been in its front ranks. He has never faltered, nor been found wanting in the time of trial. Only recently, during the persecutions of the Jews in Russia, he delivered a powerful speech on their behalf in the Mansion House at a large meeting held. He was for years President of the Society for the Promotion of Christianity among the Jews, also President of the Bible Society, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Pastoral Aid Society, and other kindred associations. To slavery in every form and under every pretext he was ever strongly and vigorously opposed, while the generous character of his benevolence was instanced, by his having held for many years, gratuitously, the important office of a Commissioner of Lunatics. Throughout his long career he has used the influence which his position gave him for no single selfish purpose, but always for the benefit of others, and thereby has added lustre to high rank, and bequeathed to his countrymen and to the peers of England a lofty, pure, and undying example.

In March, 1884, we find him engaged in the congenial occupation of unveiling the statue to William Tyndale on the Thames Embankment. On that occasion he described Tyndale's greatest memorial as the English New Testament.

On some public questions Lord Shaftesbury held very decided views. He was strongly hostile to the opening of the national museums and galleries on Sundays. In the debate on the Public Worship Regulation Bill, he vehemently denounced Ritualism, and, with regard to the confessional, he affirmed that, if it were suffered to continue unchecked—and it could not be checked by any ordinary legislation—it would produce an entire change in the spiritual, moral, and political character of the English people, and would sink the Established Church in inevitable ruin. For some years he was a member of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and it is well known that during the premiership of Lord Palmerston he had considerable influence in the appointment of bishops. He took the chair for the Congregational, Baptist, Wesleyan, and other Missionary Societies, at their annual meetings in Exeter Hall; the Religious Tract Society, the London City Mission, the Sunday School Union, the Field Lane Refuges and Ragged Schools, the National Refuges for Homeless and Destitute Children, and a hundred other excellent organizations, were all indebted to him for active aid, sympathy, and advice. He seemed to be a connecting link between the highest and lowest classes in the State. While he enjoyed the esteem and friendship of his Sovereign, he was also the friend of those in the humblest stations.

RAGGED SCHOOLS.

Another noble movement with which Lord Shaftesbury's name is inseparably associated is that of Ragged Schools. Next to his labours in regard to factory life, this will link his name most closely with the poor, down to posterity. Indeed, he has been the life and soul of its success. The term "Ragged" is said to have been first applied to these schools by a warm admirer of his lordship, Charles Dickens, then editor of the Daily News. Lord Shaftesbury himself explored the plague-spots of London, and was astounded at the misery and destitution he discovered. At the annual meeting of the Ragged School Union, in 1883, his lordship gave this testimony:—

"For thirty-nine years I have been president of this grand institution, and I have not missed one anniversary, and then, after showing that such an agency needed to be enormously extended, his lordship, in taking a retrospect, showed what had been effected. 'Did we not, during the palmy days of the ragged schools, pick up from the streets some 300,000 boys and girls, all of whom, if they had not been taken up, would have been found ere long among the dangerous classes? We picked them up, we trained them, we taught them to fear God and man, we sent them into trades, into domestic service, and far off into the colonies. Have any of them broken the hearts of their teachers? Have any of them proved a disgrace to the tuition they received? None, I tell you. We have, by the blessing of God, turned out 300,000 children as good and industrious citizens, who, but for the intervention of these ragged schools, would have gone to join the dangerous classes, and would have been a curse to this great country.'"

The Ragged School Union acknowledged how much they were indebted to their president by presenting him with his portrait on his eightieth birthday, in 1881.

The slums of London forty years ago were dangerous and disgraceful. The police only dared venture to explore them in companies and with arms. In one rookery in Marylebone there were three hundred families found herding in one hundred and nineteen houses, young and old living like savages. Drury Lane was equally bad, and in Wild Court nearly one thousand persons actually existed in fourteen houses. Life there was too horrible to be described. Ratcliffe and Bluegate Fields were noted for all that was vile. As might be expected, juvenile crime increased at a rapid rate, and the cry arose for more schools or more prisons. It seemed difficult to tell where to begin upon this mass of degradation and vice, and when the first advertisement in connection with the Field Lane Ragged School appeared in The Times, many were prepared to smile over what looked like a Quixotic undertaking. But Lord Ashley was persevering and energetic, and again he set himself personally to examine into the condition of the classes he sought to benefit. The results of his investigations appeared in an article which he contributed to the Quarterly Review in 1846. He dealt fully with the question of the danger threatened to the State by the criminal classes, which were increasing at a fearful rate, and, referring to the younger portion of these classes, he described them as "bold and pert and dirty as London sparrows, but pale, feeble, and sadly inferior to them in plumpness of outline." Holborn, the Strand, Whitechapel, Spitalfields, Lambeth, and Westminster, all had swarms of these evil and precocious children. "The stranger dives into the recesses from which they seem to issue, and there he sees before and behind, on the right hand and on the left, every form and character of evil that can offend the sense and deaden the morals." In thousands of cases they came up and perished as vermin. The districts in which they were reared reeked with filth and abomination. The influence of their surroundings upon the young was so bad that 14,887 persons under twenty years of age were arrested in London during 1845.

SHOEBLACK BRIGADE.

This may be called a branch of the Ragged School movement, and may be properly added to the noble things in which his lordship took the lead. This movement, with the Reformatory and Refuge Union, has succeeded in helping thousands of poor children to turn from lives of vice and crime to one of honesty and usefulness. This Shoeblack Brigade had its origin at the time of the Great Exhibition in 1851. It began in a small way, but in thirty years it numbered at one time over three hundred members, who earned nearly £12,000 in twelve months. The movement was intended to be a remedial and auxiliary one; and in 1882 as many as 1,619 new members entered the brigade in London, while 1,584 left the ranks, 600 of them having been placed in suitable situations. Many of these boys, whom he has thus raised out of slouching street Arabs into bright, alert, intelligent, have risen to good positions in life, and others have been educated in training ships, to become gallant sailors of the Queen's navy, or in mercantile ships. Flower girls also owe to him the first public effort, to protect them from the temptations of their calling, and the hardship of their lives. To each—yea, to all such waifs and strays—the name of Shaftesbury has been for years a word of inspiration, love, and reverence.

"TINY'S PETITIONS."

A little girl named Tiny, an inmate of King Edward's Industrial School, Mile End, wrote his lordship a letter asking him if he would kindly give a bed to a new home just then being established, to which he sent the following answer:—

"February 11th, 1876.

"MY DEAR SMALL TINY. --I must thank you for your nice letter, and say that God willing, I will certainly call and see your new home, and you too, little woman. You ask me to give 'a bed' to the new home. To be sure I will. I will give two, if you wish it, and they shall be called 'Tiny's Petitions.'

"I am glad to see how well you write; I shall be more glad to hear from G—— and your other friends that you are a good girl, that you read your Bible, say your prayers, and love the blessed Lord Jesus Christ. May He ever be with you!—Your affectionate friend,

"SHAFTESBURY.

"To Tiny, at King Edward's School."

This little dot, to whom he thus so pleasantly wrote, has since that time grown to be a woman, and in 1884, when his lordship was giving the prizes away at the school, she was present as an old scholar, and was presented to him. Although his voice was weak at the time, he broke out in a tone which every one in the tent could hear, and said, "What, Tiny, is it you, dear? Tiny, I am so glad to see you!"

When celebrating his eightieth birthday, among other presents he received from a girls' home six nightshirts. While thanking them, he said that "a better fit or a more comfortable one he never had in the whole course of his life." It was therefore not surprising that one of the pleasantest of the May meetings was the anniversary of the schools, when from floor to ceiling Exeter Hall was filled with the children, and from which his lordship was never absent; and even in the last year of his life, when sickness kept him from almost all other meetings, he went pale-faced, with weak and faltering steps, to gaze upon them again.

LODGING HOUSES.

In a speech on the Public Health Bill in 1848, his lordship called attention, in the House of Lords, to the horrible state of our towns, and the condition of the dwellings of the people, and said that it lay at the root of two-thirds of the disorders which afflicted the country. He held that good drainage, ventilation, and healthy houses, with an ample supply of good water, would go far to extinguish epidemics and reduce fevers, and have a great influence upon the moral habits of the people. The Lodging-house Act, for the registration and inspection of common lodging-houses, was among the measures passed by the Legislature at his instigation. Charles Dickens described it as the best legislation that had ever proceeded from the English Parliament; and there is no doubt that it effected a complete revolution.

CHALLENGED TO A DUEL.

For a philanthropist to receive a challenge to a duel is a singular circumstance, yet this occurred to Lord Shaftesbury in 1853. It arose out of the Juvenile Mendicancy Bill. In the course of a speech in the House of Lords, his lordship cited the judgment of Lord Eldon in the case of William Pole Tynley Long Wellesley (Lord Mornington) to show that the proposed detention of children, whose parents were immoral, was nothing new in law. Lord Mornington resented it as an interference with his private affairs, and wrote to the earl that he "must apologize or fight." Lord Shaftesbury defended his quotation, and, so far as the challenge was concerned, referred Lord Mornington to the magistrate at Bow Street, or to his solicitors. Lord Mornington rejoined that this added to the original insult, and was "very absurdly impertinent." Nothing further came of the affair, but it was not a little amusing that, referring to a case before the Lords Justices in Chancery the same week, Lord Mornington wrote, "I have ever felt, as a peer of the realm, that I am more bound to respect the law than other men."

TEMPERANCE.

Although he never identified himself completely with the total abstinence movement, his sympathies were with its advocates, and he never failed to insist upon the terrible effects which drunkenness produced upon the working classes. He rendered invaluable help in the passing of the Habitual Drunkards Act. For some years he subscribed to the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union, and on one occasion took the chair, when Rev. C. H. Spurgeon delivered a lecture in aid of its funds. He also, at considerable inconvenience, took the chair at the opening of a society in his ancestral parish, Wimborne, where he said that of 90,000 lunatics in England and Wales, he believed that 70,000 came into that state directly or indirectly through drink.

Mr. Robert Sawyer, Chairman of the Church of England Temperance Society, gives the following interesting incident. He says:—"I was waiting at Salisbury station, and saw a tall man walking about. He wore a sort of pot hat, and I did not recognise him at first as Lord Shaftesbury. When I did so, I touched my hat, and reminded him that I had met him in Golden Lane among the costermongers. 'What are you doing here?' he asked. 'I am waiting for a train to take me to Dinton.' 'What are you going to do at Dinton?' 'I am to speak at a Temperance meeting.' 'I am glad to hear it,' said he, 'I hope that you will be of some use.' 'Well, I shall try, and very possibly I shall tell the people something which your lordship is reported to have said.' 'What is that?' I repeated the well-known words, 'The more I examine and travel over the surface of England, the more I see the absolute and indispensable necessity of Temperance Associations. I am satisfied that, unless they existed, we should be immersed in such an ocean of intoxication, violence, and sin, as would make this country uninhabitable.' 'Yes,' he said, 'I believe I did say so; you are quite welcome to repeat the words. Moreover, I will give you some more words which you may tell the people. There is no man who knows the evil of intemperance more than I do. I have been for many years the head of the Lunacy Commission. Intemperance produces lunacy. Intemperance and lunacy are both hereditary.'"

On the occasion of Mr. Gough being presented with a Bible in Exeter Hall, the gift of drunkards io had been reclaimed, Lord Shaftesbury, who d hoped to be present but was hindered, sent pocket-edition of the Psalms, with the following note :—

"DEAR MR. GOUGH,—It would give me much pleasure to see you and hear you again, but under the extreme pressure of business, both on you and on me, this is, I fear, impossible. May God be with you now and for ever, in all your labours and prayers for the advancement of Christ's kingdom.—Yours truly,

JUVENILE BEGGARS.

In 1853 he introduced his Juvenile Mendicancy Bill. But although spoken of in the warmest terms by Lord Brougham, the Duke of Argyll, Lord Grey, and others, the Bill met with many difficulties. A second Bill on the subject was introduced at the same time in the House of Commons by Mr. Adderley. In the end it was deemed advisable to withdraw both measures, and to press upon the Government the urgent necessity of dealing with the whole question. Lord Palmerston consequently introduced the measure. The chief effect of the new Act was, that the reformatories established by philanthropic efforts in various parts of the kingdom were more distinctly recognised by the Government, and received aid from the national funds.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR.

One of the ablest of Lord Ashley's Parliamentary addresses was delivered in 1843, in connection with his motion for an address to the Queen, praying for the instant and serious consideration of the best means for promoting the blessings of a moral and religious education among the working classes. He strongly attacked the oppression and corruption which prevailed, and exposed the doings of those who ground the faces of the poor. He demonstrated by statistics that there were 1,014,193 children capable of education, and yet under no kind of educational influence. In the county of Lancaster alone the annual expenditure for the punishment of crime was £604,965, while the annual vote for education in all England was £30,000. The evils of the truck system, the payment of wages in public-houses, and the bad state of workmen's dwellings, were forcibly shown. All these things made it impossible for the adult to practise that morality, of which he should have been an example to his children. His motion was agreed to, and it led the Government of the day to bestir themselves in the important question of education.

THEATRE SERVICES.

Lord Shaftesbury was the chief originator of the movement for holding religious services on Sundays in the London theatres. But in 1860 Lord Dungannon drew the attention of the House of Lords to the subject, and proposed a resolution to the effect that such services, being highly irregular and inconsistent with order, were calculated to injure rather than advance the progress of sound religious principles. The noble lord asserted the incompatibility between the associations of the theatre and those of religion, and declared that the movement was fraught with danger to the Church of England. Lord Shaftesbury, in reply, admitted he was its chief originator, and defended it in a speech of considerable ability, and the result was that the motion was ultimately withdrawn.

THE UNIVERSAL BENEFACTOR.

An attempt to enter fully into the details of his active career as a practical philanthropist would fail, owing to its comprehensiveness, and the unwearied assiduity which he displayed. He has always been at the head of almost every movement calculated to improve the religious, social, and physical condition of the working classes. Of him it may emphatically be affirmed, that he went about among the poor doing good. He was either the president of, or connected with, every society and association, which had for its object the amelioration of his fellow beings, which was founded on a broad basis; and the cause of humanity to the lower creation also has lost in him a powerful friend.

As an illustration of the wide-spreading character of his lordship's sympathy, it may be interesting to note, that in addition to the numerous religious societies to which Lord Shaftesbury gave his support, he was more or less actively identified with very many—more, in fact, than any other man—of the following charitable institutions. With some he has been associated for over half a century, and has aided with his purse, and by publicly advocating their claims. He was president of the following charities :—The Children's Aid and Refuge Society, Field Lane Ragged Schools, Flower Girls' Mission, Fox Court Ragged School, Hospital for Sick Children, Great Ormond Street; Hospital for Women, Soho Square; Indigent Blind Visiting Society, London Orphan Asylum, Ragged School Union, Reformatory and Refuge Union; Royal Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, Royal Orthopedic Hospital, Oxford Street; Society for Improving the Condition of the Labouring Classes, and the Surgical Aid Society. The charities of which he was the vice-president, are the Chelsea Hospital for Women, City of London Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, Finsbury Dispensary, Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress, General Domestic Servants' Benevolent Institution, the German Hospital, London Aged Christian Society, London Female Penitentiary, Metropolitan and National Nursing Association, Metropolitan Convalescent Institution, Middlesex Hospital, National Hospital for Heart Disease, Philanthropic Society, Redhill; Protestant Blind Pension Society, Royal Hospital for Women and Children, the Royal Maternity Charity, and the Royal Medical Benevolent College. Several charities also claimed Lord Shaftesbury either as patron or vice-patron. Among the former are the Christian Blind Relief Society, Governesses' Benevolent Institution, Infirmary for Consumption, Margaret Street, Cavendish Square; and the "One Tun" Ragged School and Mission; and among the latter are the British Orphan Asylum, Cabdrivers' Benevolent Association, Charing Cross Hospital, and the London Society for Teaching the Blind to Read.

THE NOBLE COSTER.

So far back as 1843, in a speech Lord Shaftesbury made known his views in very plain terms in the House of Commons; he said, "We owe the poor of our land a weighty debt. We call them improvident and immoral, and many of them are so; but that improvidence and immorality are the results, in a great measure, of our neglect, and not a little of our example. We owe them, too, the debt of kinder language and more frequent intercourse." What he taught he practised himself, and it is not too much to say, that he had by this consistency, acquired world-wide fame as a philanthropist, and his name is inextricably interwoven with many of the most humane movements of two generations. Pre-eminently the friend of the poor, the degraded, and the outcast, his generous sympathies and his ceaseless efforts, on behalf of the classes in whom he took so deep an interest, have given him a high place in the illustrious roll of benevolent Englishmen. It is interesting and singular to note, that one of the most steadfast and powerful friends which the humbler classes have ever had, as well as one of the most trusted, did not belong to their own order of the commonalty, but to the privileged order of the aristocracy.

Besides chimney sweeps, "sandwich" men, dung-cart men, water-carriers and flower girls, costermongers came in for a share of his sympathy. Indeed, he seemed to have a special weakness for them. It was a red-letter day in his history when he was admitted into the Worshipful Company of Costermongers, and presented with a donkey as a token of his membership; nor was he ashamed to call himself a coster. His donkey was frequently "on view" at his residence in Grosvenor Square; and in 1883, at the Annual Costers' Donkey and Pony Show, he referred to the great change which had come over them—from being "a nuisance and a danger to society," they were "orderly, honest, and well-conducted," showing the regenerating power of the Gospel, and that it was time all the costers of London were impressed by such a good example as they presented.

THE MODEL LANDLORD.

It is very gratifying to be able also to add, that he was mindful of those with whom he had to do at home. As a landlord, he was just and yet generous, and fully alive to his great responsibilities. The village of Wimborne St. Giles, near his family seat of St. Giles, was transformed under his care into a model village. He built new labourers' cottages, each containing a front parlour and kitchen on the ground floor, with three bedrooms above, absolutely unconnected with each other. Every cottage has its apricot tree, its pump, its separate sanitary arrangements, its pigsty, and its quarter-acre allotment—the labourer paying for all these things only 52s. per annum. The tenants were never behind with their rents, but the earl was content with a small percentage on his original outlay. The woods round Wimborne St. Giles are very large and not overstocked with game, for the late landlord held strongly to the principle, that it was unfair to preserve too much. Almshouses and other advantages are provided for those who are beyond work. Lord Shaftesbury spent some period every year upon the estate, notwithstanding his numerous public undertakings. But, amid all these other engagements, he never forgot that charity which begins at home.

ARTISANS' DWELLINGS.

On the 3rd of August, 1872, he laid the first stone of the new buildings on the Shaftesbury Park Estate, just outside London, which had been acquired by the Artisans', Labourers', and General Dwellings Company, for the purpose of lying out as a workman's city. The company was formed in 1867—in consequence of the destruction of houses by railroads, and for other public improvements—for the purpose of enabling workmen to erect dwellings combining fitness and economy with the latest sanitary appliances, and to become themselves the owners of these dwellings, in the course of a stated number of years, by the payment of a small additional rent. The houses were to be of three kinds, and were to be for the accommodation, not only of artisans, but of clerks, and each house was to form a distinct and separate tenancy. This estate, situate in Battersea, near Clapham Junction station, was opened in July, 1874. It contained 1,200 houses, capable of accommodating about 8,000 persons. In addition to the houses, the township included several special features, such as schools, an ornamental garden, a lecture-hall, co-operative stores and general stores, but there is to be NO PUBLICHOUSE OR PAWNSHOP within its precincts. At the inauguration, Lord Shaftesbury, Mr. Disraeli, Lord Granville, and other gentlemen made speeches, the Prime Minister expressing his warm sympathy with Lord Shaftesbury's endeavours to improve the condition of the working classes.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY.

It was in the year 1846, shortly after the good effects of the Factory Acts were beginning to be felt, that Lord Ashley became a vice-president of this society. Five years later, in 1851, he became its president, and his attendance at the annual meetings was after this one of the events of the year, and he was very rarely absent from the chair. His speeches at these meetings were always brief and effective. In 1881 he commented touchingly upon the fact, that he had then filled the chair for the thirty-second time, and in May 1884 he made his last long speech as chairman of the annual meeting. It contained much that was characteristic and interesting, as will be seen from the following extract :—

"I find that this day we celebrate the eightieth anniversary of the Bible Society, and I believe I have had the honour and the deep satisfaction to hold the office of president for nearly one-half of that long period. What have I seen grow up in that time? Why, here is our friend Dr. Gibson, who quoted some coxcomb—a very able man, I dare say he was, but that does not prevent him being a coxcomb—who talked of the Bible being nearly effete, and Bible Christianity being extinct. It may be so in the class where he moves. I do not answer much for those literary men. I know little of them, but I tell him this, that it is by no means effete or extinct in the great masses of the population.

"Let us set one literary man against another. We have heard of one literary gentleman who said the Bible was effete. Let us set against him a man, I am quite sure equal in literary power and intellectual ability—Lord Macaulay. I was in the House of Commons with Lord Macaulay, and I heard him use these very words :—'He who speaks or authorises a syllable against Christianity, is guilty of high treason against the civilisation of mankind.' These two literary men may pair off. But all these fellows, I speak of them with contempt; I do, indeed, because here they are spending the time that God has given them, the intellect that He has bestowed upon them, and instead of using it for the advancement of His honour, they are doing everything they can for the destruction of the temporal and eternal happiness of the whole human race. Therefore I must speak of them with contempt. I cannot speak of them with respect. They have no objection to a God or some Supreme Being, provided He is after their own taste, will follow their desires, and be guided by them."

THE LONDON CITY MISSION.

So satisfied was Lord Shaftesbury with the good work done by this society and its devoted missionaries, that he was never tired of bearing his testimony, and rendering it every support. He was in the habit of calling the Scripture readers and city missionaries the "spiritual police" of London. At a May meeting once held in Exeter Hall, he thus very vividly contrasted old and new London, as he touched upon the work being done by the society :—

"He showed what the society had done in undertaking work which the churches had neglected, and expressed his belief that results were yet to be achieved far greater than those at which they had arrived. With satisfaction he referred to the fact that, whereas when he was young, religion was regarded with coldness, rebuke, and contempt in the highest circles, it was now the reverse, and real respect was felt for the religious man who had the courage to express his opinion. He also referred to the influence which religion had exercised over the minds of the democracy, to whom especially the City Mission had been instrumental in conveying it. It had been a most remarkable organization for a system of aggressive Christianity, and its aggressiveness had been the strength of the movement. In commending the good sense and the devotedness of the missionaries, his lordship affirmed that he had always had from them true guidance and correct information, had never been misled by them, or made to believe by any brilliant accounts that this or that would succeed when there was not good ground for believing it; and, on the other hand, he had never been allowed to despair. These men went out day by day taking God's Word in all its simplicity, not charged, as many were, with Hebrew and Greek and Latin, and the higher criticisms, and 'all that dreadful nonsense'; they went with nothing but a deep, living knowledge of the Word of God, and yet see what achievements He had wrought thereby."

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

He was president of this institution from its commencement, and over and over again occupied the chair at its meetings, lectures, etc. When Exeter Hall was reopened, after being purchased in 1881, he occupied the chair, and was supported by Archbishop Tait and Lord Cairns. As was usual with him on such occasions, he was particularly happy in his phrases, and described the association as "thankful for the past, ambitious for the future," and, in returning thanks for his reception, "he expressed his joy that the Hall was preserved for its original purpose. He was reminded of the saying of that good though mistaken man, Macaulay, who had hoped that the brayings of Exeter Hall would come to an end ere long. He thought that some of those brayings, like those of Balaam's ass, to his mind spoke the lesson of truth and soberness." A proposal to change the name of the association by the omission of the word Christian, was successfully resisted by Lord Shaftesbury, who was well supported in speaking strongly against it.

SUNDAY.

So satisfied was his lordship of the blessedness and benefits which were associated with the Lord's day, that in every way, in season and out of season, by voice and effort, he did his best to secure its observance. He firmly and steadfastly opposed all encroachments upon its sanctity, no matter in however specious a guise they might be presented, and he was the patron of many societies formed to withstand the agitation of the Secularists. The abolition of Sunday labour in the Post Office was one of his most cherished projects.

In November, 1847, he took the chair at a meeting of inhabitants of London and Westminster, at Freemasons' Tavern, for the purpose of memorialising Government on the subject of the rumoured intention of increase of duty on the Sabbath in the General Post Office.

In 1850 he brought forward and carried a resolution for an address, praying for the Sunday delivery of letters to be stopped. For three weeks the Sunday post was stopped throughout the kingdom, and, said one writer, "Lord Ashley was the most unpopular man in the kingdom." An inquiry was moved for, and the resolution and the order of the Postmaster-General under it were rescinded. But he was little daunted by this opposition. In 1854 he passed a Sunday Closing of Public Houses Act, but this was repealed in the following year by the Sale of Beer Act. Then in 1856, in company with Archbishop Sumner, he headed a deputation of working men to Lord Palmerston, in opposition to the agitation for the Sunday opening of the British Museum, Crystal Palace, and similar places of amusement, and to protest against the Sunday bands in parks.

In July, 1859, again, the Duke of Marlborough and Lord Shaftesbury introduced a deputation to Earl Granville, then President of the Council, to present a very full and argumentative memorial in opposition to the movement by the Sunday League, reviewing the history of the agitation and recording the heads of the arguments against it. In conjunction with the Lord's Day Observance Society, and the Working Men's Lord's Day Rest Association, in both of which admirable organisations he took the greatest interest during the whole of his life, he spared no pains to guard the Sabbath. He spoke upon the question constantly, he appealed to the people through the press, and he was unremitting in his efforts to promote wholesome legislation.

Speaking at the annual meeting of the Working Men's Lord's Day Rest Association in 1878, he expressed views which deserve the careful consideration of all lovers of right and liberty. He said: "Your political liberties are more secure under the Charter of the Sabbath, than they can be under all the charters which were ever given by any of our kings, including that of Runnymede itself. That Charter is greater than any other that God has ever given to man. It is as great as the sanctity of His own Book."

He strenuously opposed year by year the efforts of the so-called Sunday Society, in their attempts to get the National Gallery and British Museum opened on Sundays; and to show that he did so in the interest of the working classes, he carried a resolution in Parliament, that such places should be opened on week-day evenings to the public, at least three times a week, between the hours of seven and ten in the evening.

THE CONVENTICLE ACT.

By this Act it was made illegal for more than twenty persons to meet together for reading the Bible and prayer, unless the place of meeting was licensed. Up to 1855 this law was still in force. To the honour and credit of Lord Shaftesbury it ought to be known, that his Religious Worship Bill of that year was directed to remove this from the Statute Book. Bishop Wilberforce and others so opposed it, that at first it was referred to a select committee, in the hope that it might be shelved altogether; but single-handed he triumphed, and this blot was removed from the Statute Book of our realm. Again, when an attempt was made to prevent any minister of the Established Church preaching in a parish where there were more than 2,000 parishioners, without having the Rector's sanction, Lord Shaftesbury brought in a Bill to amend the law. He saw, to use his own words, "the Church of England must be the Church of the people; if it is not the Church of the people, it will cease to be the Established Church."

THE REFORMER.

It is not possible within our limited space to record the innumerable measures to which Lord Ashley put his hand. Very early in his career he came to the front as a philanthropist; and whenever he found evils which needed removal, or wrongs to be redressed, he set to work irrespective of party politics to get them altered. Strictly, therefore, speaking, he was not a party politician. Although in his early years he was a member of more than one Tory Government, yet his disagreement with his professed party was more owing to the fact that it was impossible for him to subordinate what seemed to him the public good, to the demands of a political party. He supported the Repeal of the Corn Laws, and resigned his seat in 1845 because he could not vote according to his new convictions. He was asked to stand for Bath, and defeated Mr. Roebuck, although the Jews had subscribed £2,000 towards his expenses. He sat for that borough up to the time of his succession to the earldom, on the death of his father in 1851.

When asked to take office by Lord Derby in 1866, he replied, "There are still 1,600,000 operatives excluded from the benefits of the Factory Acts; until they are brought under the protection of the law I cannot take office. The people first, place afterwards. When Garibaldi was in England, Lord Shaftesbury was with him constantly; and never left him except when 'Garibaldi would go to the opera,' as his lordship remarked. With common sympathies on some subjects with Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone, he never heartily trusted either; and to the end of his life he was to all intents and purposes "a non-party man," so far as politics were concerned.

In Committee on the Ballot Act he moved and carried an amendment, by which the hours of polling were to be extended to eight o'clock in the evening, and the public-houses were to be closed during the election. Mr. Gladstone's Government refused to accept the amendments; and they sent the Bill back to the Lords with these alterations struck out. For a few days a collision seemed imminent, but it was averted by the concession of the Peers. Thirteen years have passed since that Act was passed. One of Lord Shaftesbury's proposals has been adopted, and the other, the closing of public-houses during elections, is felt by most persons to be desirable. Lord Shaftesbury has always laid the greatest stress on the moral responsibility of political power. In 1877, ten years after the Tory Reform Act, he said in public that he should always have been in favour of universal suffrage, if he could be sure of the "self-control" of the voters.

FOREIGN POLITICS.

It was impossible for such a large, warm-hearted man as Lord Shaftesbury to confine his efforts to his own country. Hence we find him taking an interest in the liberation of Italy, from the tyranny of the petty governments which divided its classic soil; and he entertained the Neapolitan exiles at his own town-house. During the Polish insurrection of 1861-3 he denounced Russia, and stirred up English sympathy, and thrilled the audience at a meeting held in London (March 1863) by saying:—

"Is there a man in England who has a heart for what is great, true, or noble, who does not indeed feel the deepest and most unalterable sympathy with the people, the patriots of Poland? I will not call this, as I have somewhere seen it called, a rebellion of the Polish people, because a rebellion seems to pre-suppose that the party who would put it down has something of right on its side. This is a great and glorious insurrection of a wronged and abused people, driven to despair by cruelties unprecedented in history, by a refinement of cruelty unparalleled in the antecedent periods of war. Where, I ask you, if you ransack the records of past ages, will you find anything like that vile and ever-accursed conscription conceived by the Emperor of Russia, and carried out against a gallant and defenceless people? I look upon it as equal in cruelty to anything perpetrated by Nadir Shah, and equal in refinement to the worst deeds of the Emperor Tiberius."

BULGARIAN ATROCITIES.

The same sympathy which led his lordship to sympathize with Poland, led him also to take an active part in denouncing the Bulgarian atrocities of 1876, and in a speech in St. James's Hall, the noble earl delivered a short but powerful speech, in which he denounced the Turkish Government in vehement language, while disclaiming on his own part any desire to embarrass the Government (Lord Beaconsfield's), and highly praising the strongly-worded dispatch which the present Lord Derby, then Foreign Secretary, had just before sent to Constantinople. When, twelve months later, England was divided into two camps on what had by that time become a sanguinary Russo-Turkish war, and party spirit on both sides was manifesting a bitterness hardly paralleled even in the last year or two, Lord Shaftesbury no longer appeared in the front. His object was not to forward the interests of English politicians, but to deliver from a foreign yoke, the most fanatical religion on earth, nations and peoples who, with all their faults, he believed capable of being raised to a higher level of European civilisation and influence.

INDIAN CASTE.

It has been the usual policy of the British Government in India to ignore the missionaries, to exclude the Bible from Government schools, to discourage native converts, and to subsidise the Hindoo and Mohammedan religious systems. Lord Shaftesbury fought against this fatal policy with all his might. He headed a memorial to the Queen, drawing attention to the evils of the course Lord Canning and the Government were taking, and advocating the introduction of the Bible in the schools, and the giving up of the subsidies to heathen worship. In January, 1858, Lord Shaftesbury, at a crowded meeting in Exeter Hall, pleaded that, instead of harping on that "odious word neutrality in religion, the Government should manfully acknowledge Christianity." Instead of doing this the Christians were, he declared, trampled on in India to please Brahmins. "They have prejudices in favour of Vishnu; we have prejudices, if I may call them so, in favour of Christ." He urged that caste should be ignored in the following glowing terms:—"Caste must be put down. Do you doubt how it can be done? Look upon the surface of India. There you will see some 20,000,000 of men amongst the most miserable, the most degraded, the most trampled upon, the most disparaged, the most hated people, who are of no caste, or outcasts, it may be; turn to them, and from them you will find acceptance, favour, and gratitude."

AMERICAN SLAVERY.

His sympathy with down-trodden people of all lands was naturally accompanied by detestation of slavery. He never lost an opportunity of expatiating upon the great and good qualities of the negro. "They had," he wrote, in a preface to an edition of "Uncle Tom," "warmth of heart, great development of the social, and, where they are permitted of it, domestic affections; cheerfulness and elasticity of temperament, with wonderful power of mental and bodily endurance." He then brought the slur of slavery nearer home, by adding:—

"It is not for England to vaunt herself in this matter, and censure her American brethren. We share the sin of slavery with the United States. We compelled them, while they were under British rule, to receive the foul system into their provinces; and they only carried into effect what we, in our wickedness and folly, had forced upon them."

He pursued the same course during the American Civil War. In a letter to the Times at the very commencement of it, his lordship pointed out that the triumph of the South meant the consolidation of slavery, and for that he was not prepared on any terms.

WELL-DESERVED HONOURS.

In celebration of his eightieth birthday, in June 1884, there was a crowded gathering in the Guildhall of the City of London in his honour. A portrait, subscribed for by the pence of the poor, was unveiled and presented to him "in grateful remembrance of his lifelong efforts on behalf of suffering humanity." This was supplemented with other offerings from the children in the schools, the flower-girls, the costermongers, and others; and from many of the colonies letters and messages and gifts were received, from men occupying high positions of usefulness, whom he had befriended in their early days of poverty. He was afterwards presented with the freedom of the City. The City Chamberlain, in enumerating the claims of the newest freeman, referred to his labours in connexion with the Climbing Boys Act, the Factory and the Hours Acts, the Mines and Colliery Regulation Acts, the establishment of ragged schools, training ships, refuges for boys and girls, and other philanthropic institutions, and we may add, never was such an honour conferred upon one more worthy to receive it. The Lord Mayor intimated, that when the biography of his Lordship came to be written, he hoped it would be stated he died a citizen of London.

Lord Shaftesbury was also presented with the freedom of the City of Glasgow on the 28th of August, 1871. On the same day he laid the foundation-stone of a new Convalescent Home for Glasgow at Lenzie Junction. The Home, which was erected at a cost of £5,000, has accommodation for sixty-two convalescent patients. In addressing a meeting of the working classes of Glasgow on the 31st, his lordship reviewed the campaign in connection with the Factory Acts, maintaining that the Ten Hours Act was the greatest boon that was ever conferred, not only upon the operatives, but upon the proprietors and capitalists of the country. An address was presented to the speaker by the factory-workers, expressive of their gratitude for his exertions in their cause. At a later period, Lord Shaftesbury was also presented with the freedom of the City of Edinburgh, in recognition of his long-continued philanthropic efforts.

THE CLOSING SCENE.

Though Lord Shaftesbury lived to the very advanced age of upwards of eighty-four, and went through an enormous amount of work, his constitution was not a strong one. He suffered from gout, which in a suppressed form occasionally affected important internal organs. During the summer of 1884 he had an attack of diarrhoea, by which his strength was considerably reduced. This malady in a chronic form, but greatly modified by treatment, continued until a few months ago. Towards the close of the summer the distribution of a legacy amounting to £50,000 devolved upon his lordship. The desire to fulfil this duty conscientiously imposed much anxiety and fatigue. Still, Lord Shaftesbury could not be induced to leave town until he had completed the undertaking. He went, by the advice of his physician, Dr. Quain, to Folkestone, where at first he seemed to recover some strength. An unfortunate exposure to east wind resulted in inflammation of the left lung. The acute malady yielded to the treatment of Dr. Bowles of Folkestone, but the disease in a more chronic form crept into the upper part of the lung, and to this malady Lord Shaftesbury succumbed, happily without material suffering.

His last moments were of the most peaceful character. During the morning his lordship dictated two letters to his daughters. Three members of his family—Lady Templemore, the Hon. Edith Ashley, and the Hon. Cecil Ashley—were in constant attendance upon him, and he conversed with them in an affectionate and cheerful manner. Up to the last he retained consciousness, and conversed with the utmost sensibility. He expected death, and his gentleness with his children in the last hour was very touching. A friend who saw him a few days before he died, writes, "Lord Shaftesbury said, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that He has been my Friend for long years.'" In this calm and sure confidence he gradually sank, and it seemed as if in falling asleep his own wishes were fulfilled: "I trust that I shall go down to the grave, and rise again, with the line written upon my heart, 'Jesus Christ and Him crucified.'" Thus closed, on the 1st day of October, 1885, the long life of Lord Shaftesbury.

HIS FUNERAL.

Seldom has Westminster Abbey witnessed so imposing a sight as when the body of his lordship was conveyed within its sacred walls to receive those last tokens of honour, of service, and of love which he deserved. Great and noble, well-to-do, and the very poorest stood side by side to own their respect to his memory. Beautiful flowers decked the simple coffin; flower-wreathed banners, bearing appropriate inscriptions, were also to be seen in the procession. Handel's Dead March and Chopin's Funeral March pealed from the organ; now and then could be heard the sweet voices of the choristers. Deputations from all kinds of benevolent societies swelled the crowd. The service was most impressive, and a solemn hush gave proof of the deep and earnest homage which prevailed in all hearts. The whole congregation finally joined in singing Charles Wesley's triumphant hymn:—

"Let all the saints terrestrial sing
With those to glory gone!
For all the servants of our King
In earth and heaven are one!"

At the close of the service, quietly the congregation dispersed, and then the remains were taken to St. Giles, near Wimborne, to the family vault, to await the Divine summons to awake.

THE LESSONS OF HIS LIFE.

It is impossible to do more than refer to a few leading traits which deserve consideration, but the most obvious which his life suggests is this:—Do what you can to do good with the power you possess and the position you occupy. Lord Shaftesbury seems to have been governed largely by the spirit of Him "who went about doing good." To accomplish this, like his Master, he made great sacrifices and endured many reproaches. He went in search of those who needed help. Literally, he went out into the highways and hedges, and compelled the poor, the maimed, the halt, and the blind to come in, to the enjoyment of blessings and privileges to which they had hitherto been strangers. None were too low for the reach of his hand, nor too far gone in sin to be beyond the possibility of redemption. So long as there was life there was hope, seemed to be the prevailing spirit which governed his actions and prompted his efforts. Would that this generous spirit towards the fallen moved others!

Another lesson is that of the vast responsibility which rests upon those who have position, time, money, and influence for helping to make our land what it ought to be. If one Lord Shaftesbury has been able to set in motion, and keep in activity, so many instrumentalities for purifying and elevating the masses, what might be done if a noble band of noblemen would only lead the way? If, instead of devoting time, money, and effort to train horses for the racecourse, they would seek to train men, women, and children in virtue, honesty, and godliness, they would command an influence, and secure an amount of respect, which would bring joy and gladness into many a home, and also furnish themselves with material for reflection which would bear the test of the closest scrutiny and the plaudits of an enlightened conscience. To whom ought those who are down look up for an example worthy of imitation if not to those who claim to be the best blood of the nation?

From its beginning to its close, his life had been marked with deeds rich in goodness and benevolence. Although he was permitted to attain the ripe old age of eighty-four, he still retained in full vigour the faculties which he had devoted so freely and without stint to secure the welfare of his fellow creatures. His ancestors' names are somewhat famous in the councils and literature of the nation, but he excels them all, in the loftiness of his purpose, and the pure and unsullied brilliancy of his deeds of moral heroism. "Do noble things and not dream them" seems ever to have been the guiding spirit of his life. Some, indeed, of his ancestors were noted for ambition, intrigue, and energy, and in a measure he has inherited their spirit; but how different the nobler purposes to which he has devoted it. From quite a mere youth to the age of fifty, the name of Ashley was associated in the minds of all true men and women, with everything where weak, defenceless, and down-trodden beings needed help, and even when his name was changed to that of Shaftesbury, it remained identified with the same noble mission. There seemed to be no limit to his sympathy, or bounds to his far-reaching devotion, to all who were "desolate and oppressed," save boundless misery itself. To "comfort and help the weak-hearted, and to raise up them that fall," was the one aim of his life. He agreed with one who said, "'Tis not enough to help the feeble up, but to support them after," and thousands could be found in all parts of the world at this moment, who would gladly testify that they had received their first impetus onward towards a happier and better life, by the lessons of self-respect and self-reliance which they learnt at his feet. He was not content by merely giving them money to get rid of them, but grasped them by the hand to help to rise up to their feet, so that they might learn to walk alone. To accomplish this, he sacrificed every worldly interest, and turned aside from every alluring path, in which he might have attained a proud position in our country's history. He was thus all the more free to pursue those great movements of a moral, social, and religious character, with which his name has been so prominently associated. Party politics were never allowed to interfere with his determined purpose, or to hinder his entire devotion to practical reform.

HIS BEST LEGACY.

It is to be regretted, that there are so few comparatively of the same type, to be found among the members of the House of Lords, and the most precious legacy Lord Shaftesbury leaves them behind, is the lesson, that his order (and, indeed, every other order also) may derive, of the immense, yea, incalculable benefit which they have the power to bestow, upon large masses of their fellow men, if they would only follow in his steps. Practical sympathy like his would earn lasting gratitude. To have the blessing of those who are "ready to perish," will be far more satisfactory at the last than the plaudits of the racecourse, or the passing popularity of the fleeting crowd in a public assembly. It would also, at the same time, help to weld together the rich and the poor, in a bond which no schemes of political arrangement could either give or take away, and in this way secure the true welfare of our beloved country. Such, evidently, was the life-work of the true nobleman,

LORD SHAFTESBURY.

OLIVER CROMWELL,

LORD PROTECTOR OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF ENGLAND.

"God hath given it (the victory) to our handful; let us endeavour to keep it. I had rather have a plain, russet-coated captain, that knows what he fights for, and loves what he knows, than that which you call 'a gentleman,' and is nothing else. I honour a gentleman that is so indeed!"—Letter of Cromwell, Sept., 1648.

HISTORIC CALUMNIES.

IN the year of the "glorious Restoration," 1660, —the Treaty of Dover to wit, that made England a pensioned vassal of France, and the arrival of the Dutch fleet in the Medway to burn the English ships, and divers "glories" that were to distinguish the reign of the merry monarch who so merrily betrayed the country he came to govern,—there was enacted a notable scene close under the walls of the Abbey Church of Westminster. Anxious to vindicate their own position, and to prove to all men the heinousness of the "great rebellion," and the utter wickedness and depravity of the men who had stood up for the rights of the English people against the mild and tolerant rule of Strafford and Laud, and their simple-minded and straightforward master Charles I., the high authorities caused to be dug up "above a hundred buried corpses," and "flung them in a heap in St. Margaret's churchyard." In this ghoul-like process were included the corpse of Admiral Blake, the famous soldier and sea-captain, who, after maintaining the honour of England in distant seas, had come to the coast of his island home to die; and, worse than all, there were the poor remains of Oliver Cromwell's old mother, who had passed away, at the age of ninety-four, a few years since; and presently the high authorities caused the bodies of the late Protector and of Ireton and Bradshaw to be tumbled out of their graves for the satisfaction of this sorry posthumous vengeance, to be hanged on the gallows at Tyburn; quite unconscious that, by that notable proceeding, they were gibbetting themselves to all posterity in the minds of all fair and thoughtful men. Then it was also that a certain James Heath, the son of King Charles the Second's cutler,—Carrion Heath, as he has been called, from his propensity for collecting garbage of lies and calumny,—hastened to come out with a little brown-leather-covered book, entitled, "Flagellum: or, The Life and Death of O. Cromwell, the Late Usurper;" which notable work has been pronounced by a great writer on that period, "the chief fountain of all the foolish lies that have been circulated about Oliver since."

For a long time the tone of the minor writers and pamphleteers was, as might be expected, that of vituperation, in all its moods and tenses, against Cromwell; and even those writers who claimed to be historians, could see nothing in the great soldier and statesman but a jumble of opposing qualities: "An amazing conjuncture of enthusiasm, hypocrisy, and ambition," writes Smollett; "the strangest compound of villany and virtue, baseness and magnanimity, absurdity and good sense, to be met with in the annals of mankind," with much more incoherent nonsense of the same kind; and although some small books, notably the "Passages concerning his late Highness's last sickness," by an officer of Oliver's household, ventured to put the matter in another light, it was not until recently that the character and career of one of the greatest of English worthies has been set with anything like impartiality and justice before the eyes of the nation whose destinies he had swayed with such vigour and genius. To this end two writers have mainly contributed,—John Forster and Thomas Carlyle. They have dived below the surface of malicious pamphleteering by partisan scandalmongers, and have done justice to Cromwell,—such justice as the great Protector himself would have desired. For did he not say to young Lely, when that ingenious limner, afterwards famous for his effigies of the notable "beauties" of Charles the Second's Court, came to take his portrait, "Paint me as I am; if you leave out the blotches and wrinkles, I will not pay you a shilling"?

And in the light thrown upon his life by recent investigations, and most of all by those letters and speeches edited by Mr. Carlyle, in which the Protector speaks and writes for himself, we have at length the opportunity of seeing the great central figure of the most important period of English history "as he was."

BIRTH, FAMILY, AND EDUCATION.

Oliver Cromwell, afterwards Protector of the English Commonwealth, was born on the 25th of April, 1599, at Huntingdon. His father, Robert Cromwell, was a younger son of Sir Henry Cromwell, of Hinchinbrooke; and the child was named after his uncle, Sir Oliver Cromwell, Sir Henry's eldest son. His mother, Elizabeth Stewart, the daughter of an opulent squire of Ely, in Cambridgeshire, was descended from a certain Walter Stewart, who, in the reign of Henry IV., accompanied to England that Prince James who was imprisoned in Windsor Tower, and wrote impassioned verses to Lady Jan Beaufort. Walter Stewart remained in England when his master at length returned to the north; for the young retainer had made a good marriage, and thus, as Carlyle observes, Oliver Cromwell could lay claim to a "fractional portion" of cousinship to the man on whose fortunes he was destined to have so tremendous an influence. The Cromwells were an ancient and influential family, and numbered among their ancestors that Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex, once secretary to Wolsey, and afterwards minister to Henry VIII., who, like many others, paid with his head for the fleeting and dangerous favours of the royal tiger.

A country gentleman of moderate estate, well known and active at quarter sessions, and once for a short time a Member of Parliament, Robert Cromwell was a person of consideration. The tradition that speaks of him as a brewer is utterly untrustworthy, and appears to have been one of those somewhat flunkeyish devices by which small spirits endeavour to lower the position of a successful opponent. Thus Wolsey and Harrison were both stigmatised by courtiers as "butcher's sons;" Thomas Cromwell as "son of a Putney blacksmith;" and so on. There is no evidence that Robert Cromwell ever took to brewing; though his famous son, in after years, helped to brew a very notable draught, to be "commended to the lips" of Strafford and others.

He was educated at the public school at Huntingdon, whence he proceeded to Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. At the age of eighteen he was summoned home from the University by the death of his father, which occurred in June 1617; and thus, his elder brother Robert being dead, he became the sole surviving son among a bevy of six daughters in the house of his widowed mother. He was thus head of the household; which will account for his returning no more to Cambridge. He then went to London for a short time to read law, though he was not entered on the books of any of the Societies. Many tales utterly without evidence, have been told of his boyhood; such as that of a meeting with Prince Charles, who is said to have accompanied his father James on a hunting progress, in which the King visited Hinchinbrooke; of a quarrel between the two lads, and a beating administered to the heir-apparent by his future successor. Carlyle appropriately cails for Christian burial for these idle tales, classing them with the "facts" of "Carrión Heath."

CROMWELL'S MARRIAGE; COMMENCEMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY TROUBLES IN ENGLAND.

On the 22nd of August, 1620, as shown in the register of St. Giles's, Cripplegate, Oliver Cromwell, being then just over twenty-one years of age, was married to Elizabeth Bourchier. He then returned to Huntingdon, where, in his father's old house, with his wife and mother, he lived for some years, during which time a numerous family began to grow up around his board; but the earliest born children of his household died young. During this time he probably occupied himself in the avocations of a farming country gentleman. He thought deeply on religious matters, as was not unnatural in the seventeenth century,—an age when "the English squire clearly appears to have believed in God, not as a figure of speech, but as a fact, very awful to the heart of the English squire; when he wore his Bible doctrine round him as our squire wears his shot-belt—went abroad with it, nothing doubting." His convictions led him to pronounced Puritanism of the Calvinistic sort. And thus matters went on; and he must have won the reputation of a trustworthy man, fit to be employed on matters of moment; for in 1628 he was returned to Parliament as member for the borough of Huntingdon.

This was the third Parliament called by Charles I. since his accession in 1625; and various weighty reasons stamp it as important in the history of England. Throughout the whole of the inglorious reign of James, the question of the rights of the people as against the prerogative of the King had been in debate; and more than once there had been a near prospect of open rupture between the King and his Parliament. But the Scottish Solomon was not cast in an heroic or even in a manly mould. When he had declared that the King's wrath was as the roaring of a lion, he invariably ran away. Contempt for his timidity was largely mingled with the dislike excited by his lofty pretensions of "divine right," his claim for irresponsible rule, with passive obedience and non-resistance as the only attitudes to be maintained by his subjects. But matters were greatly altered when Charles, supported by his evil genius Buckingham, came to the throne. With all the obstinacy of his father, he had far more intellect than the heavy professor of "kingcraft," who had been so egregiously duped and deceived in what were to have been his master-strokes. The prologue to the tragedy had been spoken in the time of James I.; under Charles the play was to begin in earnest.

Two Parliaments had already been dismissed in anger by the King; and the most determined members of the opposition had been cast into prison as a warning to the rest. The most illegal means had been resorted to in order to fill the exhausted treasury,—forced loans, benevolences or supposed free-will contributions extorted by threats and intimidation, soldiers quartered to a ruinous extent in the houses of private citizens, old feudal rights revived, and stretched to the utmost extent. These things, coupled with disastrous failure and disgrace in foreign wars, had caused the third Parliament of Charles to meet in no complying mood. Buckingham was looked upon as the root of all the evil; and, in spite of the angry intervention of the King, was censured by name and without stint. Grim Felton, with that Sheffield whittle he bought on Tower Hill, and with which he rode down to Portsmouth, sternly resolved to avenge his own wrongs and the nation's, saved the Commons any further trouble about that unprincipled adventurer. The Parliament, after obtaining the King's reluctant consent to the Petition of Rights, adjourned, to meet again in the January following; and once more Oliver Cromwell, the Member for Huntingdon, came up to town, and appeared in his place.

During the recess, the King had again resorted, without stint or measure, to all the illegal acts against which the Petition of Rights had been levelled. Tonnage and poundage had again been levied; and the penalty of imprisonment was inflicted on those who refused to pay; and sycophancy to the King in matters of religion, the tuning of the pulpits to sing the praises of Divine right and passive obedience, and the nearest possible approximation to Popery in matters of ceremonial, had greatly angered the Puritan party, who, with rage in their hearts, saw the Mainwarings and Montagues and Neiles, who went farthest in the ceremonial and church millinery direction, rewarded with good things in the Church for their pains. A committee on religion was accordingly called for; and here we have a notable fragment preserved of a speech delivered on the occasion by the Member for Huntingdon, Mr. Oliver Cromwell: "He had heard by relation from one Dr. Beardi," he said, "that Dr. Alabaster had preached flat Popery at St. Paul's Cross (the open-air stone pulpit, with a roof or canopy over it, whose foundations have recently been discovered at the south side of the present cathedral); and that the Bishop of Winchester (Dr. Neile) had commanded him, as his diocesan, he should preach nothing to the contrary. Mainwaring, so justly censured in this House for his sermons, was by the same Bishop's means preferred to a rich living. If these are the steps to church preferment, what are we to expect?"—an outspoken, vigorous remonstrance, going straight to the point, as, indeed, it was this man's custom at all times to do.

DESOTISM IN ENGLAND, 1629-1640.

Then came that memorable day on which the Commons, harassed beyond endurance by repeated orders from the King to adjourn whenever they set about considering the state of public affairs, fairly took the bit between their teeth, locked their door even against Black Rod coming with a message from His Majesty; and while Speaker Finch, trembling and weeping and vainly refusing to put the question to the House, is forcibly held down in his chair by Denzil Holles and Valentine,—his presence being necessary to the validity of their proceedings,—the Commons pass their three famous resolutions condemning tonnage and poundage as illegal, and equally condemning papistical practices in the Church and Arminianism; and then the King dissolves the Parliament by proclamation, clapping the chief members in prison, according to his wont; and for eleven years there is absolute government by "right divine" in England.

So Oliver Cromwell, late Member for Huntingdon town, goes back to his native place, there being no Parliament left in which he or any other honourable member can sit; indeed, a Royal Proclamation has appeared forbidding men to speak of anything of the kind: "Meddle with no State matters," was one of "the twelve good rules the royal martyr drew,"—a mighty convenient rule for tyrants and despots to impress upon their subjects, and much in favour with them accordingly.

And now those two men, so different from each other in intellect, in capacity to govern, and even in outward appearance, but alike only in their devotion to the cause of absolute government and divine right, come forth to play their prominent part in the sad drama of tyranny and misgovernment that is being enacted in England. The first of these men is Archbishop Laud, puny of intellect and a Zacheus in stature, a busy, prying, restlessly zealous partisan of the fussy kind,—Justice Shallow in a surplice and bands,—tuning the pulpits, persecuting the Puritans, with the help of the Star Chamber and High Commission Court, even to pillorying and the cutting off of ears and slitting of noses, with fine and imprisonment unlimited to follow; as witness the well-known cases of Prynne the barrister, and Burton, and hundreds more, irritating men at last beyond endurance, and helping greatly to gather the storm destined to overwhelm him with thousands of better men. The second was Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, "the great apostate," who had once used his great powers of mind and his noble eloquence on the side of popular liberty, and had been the trusted friend of Pym, Holles, Hampden, Eliot, and the other chiefs of the popular party; but who now, won over by the cajolements of the Court, hated his former associates with all the rancour of a deserter, and in his "thorough" devised a scheme of government wherein royal despotism was to be upheld and supported by military force.

And presently, while the Star Chamber and the Court of High Commission and the Northern Counties' Court are harassing men to the verge of rebellion, over-riding the judgments of the regular tribunals, and playing havoc with the laws and liberties of the land, comes Attorney-General Ray, with his ingenious scheme for replenishing the King's coffers by extending the Writ of Shipmoney from the maritime to the inland counties, and making what had been an exceptional expedient in war-time a means of perennial supply in a period of profound peace. And then, in 1635, did John Hampden, the cousin of Oliver Cromwell, and a member of each of the five Parliaments of Charles's reign, stand forth, and boldly and emphatically refuse to pay two sums of thirty-one shillings and sixpence and twenty shillings respectively, at which he had been assessed; preferring the certain loss and the probable danger involved in a suit at law, to the violation of the principle of right he considered involved in the question of this illegal impost.

Meanwhile Oliver Cromwell was quietly looking after his own concerns. Part of his estate at Huntingdon he sold during those eventful years; he removed to St. Ives, some miles off, where he bought an estate, and pursued the tolerably even tenour of his way, farming, sowing, and reaping, and breeding cattle and sheep; while in public matters, Strafford was establishing the "thorough," and the country was drifting slowly but none the less certainly towards the Great Rebellion. From St. Ives he afterwards removed to Ely, on inheriting some property there from Sir Thomas Stewart, his maternal grandfather.

There are extant letters written by his hand at this period, wherein, in the strong, vigorous language of seventeenth century puritanism, he speaks of his conversion, his sinfulness, and the mercies vouchsafed to him. Upon these expressions several of his earlier biographers, and notably a clergyman named Noble, have chosen to found a theory that Oliver must at one time have led a very dissolute life. Just the same conjecture has been made, on similar grounds, concerning John Bunyan; but there is no tittle of evidence that the future Protector of England was guilty of profligacy or evil living at this or any other portion of his career.

SCOTLAND IN REBELLION; THE "SHORT PARLIAMENT."

In the north, meanwhile, events were happening which gave the English people an invaluable chance for a struggle for the recovery of their liberties. Long years before, King James I. had attempted to set up a shadowy imitation of an Episcopal Church, and to that end had nominated certain bishops, who were contemptuously dubbed Tulchan Bishops by the North Britons; a tulchan being a kind of dummy, in imitation of a calf, constructed to deceive bereaved cows by a false appearance, and induce them to yield their milk to the pail. At the instigation of zealous but indiscreet Laud, it was resolved that to the tulchan imitation should succeed the reality of episcopacy in Scotland. Uniformity of worship with that of the Church of England was to be enforced, and the liturgy, or Prayer-book service, introduced everywhere.

It is well known what an explosion ensued: Clarendon has left us a graphic account of what took place "on the Sunday morning appointed for the work" of reading the liturgy in the cathedral church of St. Giles's, Edinburgh. He tells us of that "shower of stones and sticks and cudgels" that came flying at the dean's head when that high functionary began reading the words which the fiery zeal of the Scots confounded with "the Popish mass." The country was quickly in a blaze; men were everywhere signing the Solemn League and Covenant; pledging themselves to venture life and property in defence of the freedom of their faith. The remonstrances of the King and his advisers were vain: and the year 1639 saw Charles marching northward, with forces raised with great difficulty,—for the exchequer was badly furnished, in spite of the extraordinary means taken for its replenishment,—to put down the Scottish rebellion with the strong hand, and awe the rebels into submission.

But in this design he failed lamentably. The leading men among those who had signed the Covenant had organised regiments to oppose the King; and so formidable did they appear in numbers and determination, that the Pacification of Dunse was hastily patched up, and the King retreated southward; the main question being left for a time in abeyance. The Scots disbanded their army; but with admirable foresight kept the leaders about them, mostly tough, doughty men, who had fought in the great German Thirty Years' War, at that time raging on the Continent.

And thus it came about, that early in 1640 the King, chafing under these reverses, and finding that the scheme of despotism had failed, was fain to call a Parliament after an interval of eleven years; and thus Oliver Cromwell, now Member for Cambridge, and his cousin Oliver St. John, the lawyer who had defended Hampden in the ship-money trial, and that most famous cousin of his, John Hampden himself, with a number of other zealous and earnest men, were once more summoned to Westminster. This was what is known in our history as the "Short Parliament;" for the session was not more than three weeks old, when the King, perceiving probably in the members a disposition to inquire into abuses and grievances rather than confine themselves to the voting of supplies, the reason for which they had been summoned, suddenly dismissed this his fourth Parliament. Even Clarendon professes himself at a loss to conceive how the members had given offence. Oliver St. John, with a grave smile on his dark face, declared that "things must be worse before they would be better." He knew there was no chance for a free Parliament in England so long as Charles had a card in his hand to play in the game of despotism.

CROMWELL IN THE LONG PARLIAMENT; HIS DEFENCE OF THE RUSTICS.

Things became worse very speedily. A new army was with great difficulty assembled; for the Pacification of Dunse had not been kept, each party accusing the other of misinterpreting its articles; and again Charles marched northward to fight the Scots. But his troops were mutinous and disaffected, and evidently more inclined to take part against episcopacy than to uphold it. The Scots had crossed the border and advanced confidently into Northumberland; and at Newburn the King's troops ran away almost without striking a blow; and then it became evident that Charles had risked his last stake as a despotic ruler, and failed, and that the time to which Oliver St. John and his colleagues looked forward had come.

In November of that same memorable year, 1640, met the celebrated Long Parliament, destined to experience, during an existence, with long intervals, extending over nineteen years, the most opposite fortunes, including the height of power and triumph, and the depths of humiliation and weakness. This Parliament met with a stern consciousness of its own strength, and a thorough determination to make use of its power to the fullest extent; plainly understanding that it owed its existence to the necessities and by no means to the favour of the monarch, who would far rather have seen the members in the Gatehouse than in the Hall of Assembly, but to whom rule without a Parliament had for the time become impossible. Accordingly the Long Parliament at once sets to work vigorously and without delay. Strafford and Laud are arrested and impeached; the Courts of Star Chamber and of High Commission, and the equally infamous Northern Court, vanish before its prompt, indignant action. Then there is justice, with compensation and redress, for the Puritan prisoners, who, with cropped ears and slit noses, and backs scarred with the hangman's whip, have been languishing in prison, even as far off as distant Jersey, for years. Cromwell, who had been again returned to Parliament, presented a petition in favour of one of the worst used, and one of the most difficult of the Puritan captives, young Lilburn, who had been Prynne's amanuensis, and had been whipped like a felon at the cart's tail from Westminster to the Fleet Prison at the foot of Ludgate Hill, enduring his two hundred stripes with a constancy never exceeded even by Prynne himself. We have another picture of him in those days, from the pen of Sir Philip Warwick, the Member for Radnor, a frank, honest gentleman enough, somewhat inclined to be satirical at the expense of the plain, massive-looking farmer from the Fens, who has never a hand to his hat, whose words are not even ready and flowing, and are spoken with a harsh, rugged vehemence,—and who yet, by some unaccountable power of earnestness within himself, gets the House to listen to him:—

"The first time I ever took notice of Mr. Cromwell," Sir Philip says, "was in the very beginning of the Parliament held in November 1640, when I vainly thought myself a courtly young gentleman; for we courtiers valued ourselves much upon our good clothes. I came into the House one morning well clad, and perceived a gentleman speaking whom I knew not, very ordinarily apparelled, for it was a plain cloth suit, which seemed to have been made by an ill country tailor: his linen was plain, and not very clean, and I remember a speck or two of blood upon his little band, which was not much larger than his collar. His hat was without a hatband; his stature was of a good size; his sword stuck close to his side; his countenance swollen and reddish, his voice sharp and untunable, and his eloquence full of fervour. For the subject-matter," continues the courtly Sir Philip, "would not bear much of reason, it being on behalf of a servant of Mr. Prynne's, who had dispersed libels;" and he concludes, with the amusing simplicity of a man who cannot conceive any greatness disassociated from the external glories of fine clothes and gold lace: "I sincerely profess it lessened much my reverence unto that great Council,—for this gentleman was very much hearkened unto." He was destined to be very much more "hearkened unto" in the days, then rapidly approaching, when the iron "pot," or helmet, was to become a more general headgear than the beaver with its gold band.

About the same time he also appears as a Member of a Committee of the House to hear and investigate the case of some poor rustics, whose rights in some waste lands—enclosed and sold to two noblemen, the Earl of Manchester and his son—had been disregarded with a right royal injustice, who accordingly made an outcry against the great oppression carried upon them with a very high hand, and supported by power. It is in the "Life" of Clarendon that the scene occurs; and the writer seems rather to have wondered at the insolence of the appellants, "who were a very rude kind of people," in making any complaint at all, and still more at the vehemence and heat with which Mr. Cromwell supported their cause. "Cromwell knew this Soke of Somersham, near St. Ives (the land to which the proceedings referred), very well; knew these poor rustics, and what treatment they had got; and wished, not in the imperturbablest manner, it would seem, to see justice done them,"—a praiseworthy object certainly, though we can fancy the outspoken manner of Cromwell must have considerably startled not only courtly Hyde, who was present as a sort of moderator, but the majority of the Committee.

ATTEMPTED ARREST OF THE FIVE MEMBERS; BEGINNING OF THE CIVIL WAR.

After the execution of the great Earl of Strafford, and the prompt abolition of the most flagrant abuses, had in some measure appeased the angry mood of the nation, a strong current of public opinion began to flow in an opposite direction, in favour of the King—a current checked for a time, but not turned aside permanently, by the horrible Irish massacre. When the Long Parliament first met, an overwhelming majority in the Commons had been for checking the prerogative and limiting the power of the King in every direction. But now that majority had dwindled down to very small proportions; for many who had at first swelled its ranks were of opinion that the King had now done enough to re-establish confidence, and ought to be trusted. And thus, when the presentation of a Grand Remonstrance was decided on, the debate was so hot, that there might have been brawling, if not bloodshed, among the members themselves. But for the admirable temper and conciliatory exertions of John Hampden, Cromwell on this occasion is reported to have been one of the warmest upholders of the Remonstrance,—which is more than probable,—and to have said, that had the Remonstrance not passed, he would have sold off everything and gone to New England—which rests entirely on tradition.

But the King was badly advised; that body-guard he had got round him contained too many dissolute, broken-down Templars and roystering blades to be safe councillors, or even desirable tools in the hands of a King chafed by opposition and humiliated by forced concessions after a long period of despotic power. Nor was grim Colonel Lunsford, their leader, a desirable representative of kingly authority and dignity, "slashing the apprentices with his sword in Westminster Hall." And so it came about that Charles, returning from his ill-omened journey to Scotland, became possessed with the idea that if he could suddenly swoop down upon five heads of the hydra of opposition in the Commons, and one in the Lords, namely, Pym, Hampden, Holles, Hazlerig, and Strode, and Lord Kimbolton, it would be a comparatively easy matter to deal with the rest. Accordingly he came down to Westminster on the 5th of January, 1642, with his swaggering guard behind him, entered the Commons House, intending to carry away captive the men in question on a charge of high treason, found that "the birds were flown," for they had received warning of His Majesty's approach, and quitted the House amid angry and ominous cries of "Privilege." The members had gone into the city, where they were received with open arms by the authorities, and whence the King demanded their surrender in vain. On the 11th of January they were to be brought back in triumph to their places in Parliament, escorted by the jubilant city trainbands. On the 10th, the day before that ceremony, the King quitted the palace of Whitehall, which he never saw again till that fatal 30th of January, 1649, when he was brought there to die.

Even then there was a hope that the matter of dispute between the King and his Parliament might be settled without recourse to the sword; but the point on which all negotiation failed was the command of the militia. This the King would by no means consent to give out of his own hands; and the Parliament, after that fatal 5th of January, would not trust Charles with a military force; and during the next months both sides were busy preparing for the great armed struggle that was to begin when the King raised his standard at Nottingham, in the month of August, 1642.

OLIVER CROMWELL.

CROMWELL'S MILITARY CAREER BEGUN.

And now a new chapter opens in the life of Cromwell; the time was coming in which he should mount step by step to the Presidential throne of England by virtue of the genius and worth that render the man of pre-eminent mind indispensable in days of peril and distress. Confident that the quarrel between King and Parliament would have to be decided by war, Cromwell exerted himself strenuously, on behalf of the Parliament, to prepare for the inevitable. He lent £300 for the services of the Commonwealth; Hampden's subscription at the same time being £1,000. He organized a body of volunteers, and collected arms, and sent them down into Cambridge for the defence of that county; himself taking the management of the preparations in the county of Cambridge, and, among other notable actions, seizing the magazine of Cambridge Castle, and preventing the college plate being carried off; and when the army is organized under Robert Lord Essex for the Parliament service, Captain Oliver Cromwell is entered as captain of Troop Sixty-seven of the cavalry force. "How a staid, most pacific, solid farmer of three-and-forty decided on girding himself with warlike iron, and fighting, he and his, against principalities and powers," says the editor of the "Cromwell Letters and Speeches," "let readers who have formed any notion of this man conceive for themselves. He and his, advisedly; for his eldest son Oliver was now grown up, and held the commission of ensign in the Eighth Cavalry Troop."

And then was fought that indecisive fight of Edgehill, at which Oliver was present, and which gave him the occasion for the shrewd remark that this great struggle would never be won with indifferent or careless soldiers, and that the stimulus of religious zeal on the part of the Parliament troops, must be put in action to oppose the eager readiness of the King's troops: "Loyalty must be met by a principle as strong," he said emphatically to his cousin Hampden; "and what can that be but religion?" and he therewith proceeded to act upon the truth his sagacity had recognised, by enlisting in the cause the fiery zeal of the most respectable and steady of the Nonconformist sects, the Independents, drilling and exercising his stalwart company of troopers, who formed the nucleus of that splendid band of warriors, invincible in their fierce enthusiasm and the deep conviction of their cause, who became famous throughout the three Kingdoms under the honoured name of Oliver's Ironsides.

The energetic Captain, soon to become Colonel |

Cromwell, among his other duties, had to keep a watchful eye on the doings of disaffected persons, and to hinder anything that could tend to the disadvantage of the Parliament and its cause. Very characteristic is his letter to Mr. Robert Barnard, once his fellow justice in Huntingdon, who had been engaged in such suspicious transactions as to draw upon himself a domiciliary visit of some of Oliver's soldiers to see what he was about. Whereupon Mr. Robert Barnard grumbles; and his former colleague addresses to him the following very outspoken and characteristic letter, the original of which, in Cromwell's handwriting, is still in existence:

"To my assured friend, Robert Barnard, Esq.: Present these, 23rd January, 1642.

"MR. BARNARD,—It's most true, my Lieutenant, with some other soldiers of my troops, were at your house. I dealt freely to inquire after you; the reason was, I had heard you reported active against the proceedings of Parliament, and for those that disturb the peace of this country and the kingdom; with those of this country who have had meetings not a few, to intents and purposes too full of suspect.

"It's true, sir, I know you have been wary in your carriages: be not too confident thereof. Subtlety may deceive you; integrity never will. With my heart I shall desire that your judgment may alter, and your practice. I come only to hinder men from increasing the rent—from doing hurt, but not to hurt any man; nor shall I you: I hope you will give me no cause. If you do, I must be pardoned what my relation to the public calls for. If your good parts be disposed that way, know me for,

"Your Servant,

"OLIVER CROMWELL.

"Be assured fair words from me shall neither deceive you of your houses nor of your liberty."

HIS EXERTIONS IN THE COMMON CAUSE; THE IRONSIDES.

Presently we see him doing notable service to his side by seizing and sending off post-haste to London the high-sheriff of Hertfordshire, Thomas Conisby, Esquire, who, with many followers, had been executing a pretended King's Writ, or, in other words, levying contributions, one market day in the good town of St. Albans. A sudden rush of Cromwell's dragoons effected the capture of the sheriff, who was forthwith sent to give an account of himself and his doings to the Parliament at Westminster; by whom he was treated to several years of imprisonment in the Tower.

Other important services quickly followed, such as the taking of Lowestoft, the relief of Croyland, the skirmish at Grantham, and the taking of Stamford. But the event that first drew general attention upon him as a skilful and wary leader was his victory at Gainsborough fight, July 1643, in which General Cavendish, cousin to the Marquis of Exeter, was killed; for, as Colonel Cromwell laconically puts it, "one officer cut him on the head; and, as he lay, my Captain-Lieutenant Berry thrust him in the short ribs, of which he died, about two hours after, in Gainsborough."

His energy and promptitude are characteristically shown in a short note to the Cambridge Commissioners, enclosing a desponding communication he had received from his friend Lord Willoughby, full of bad news. Cromwell just claps Lord Willoughby's letter into one of his own, couched in the following terms, and despatches the two without delay:—

"GENTLEMEN,—You see by this enclosed how sadly your affairs stand. It's no longer disputing, but out instantly all you can! Raise all your bands; send them to Huntingdon; get up what volunteers you can; hasten your horses.

"Send these letters to Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex without delay. I beseech you, spare not, but be expeditious and industrious. Almost all our foot have quitted Stamford, there is nothing to interrupt an enemy but our horse that is considerable. You must act lively; do it without distraction. Neglect no means.

"I am,

"Your faithful Servant,

"OLIVER CROMWELL."

His energy and spirit are untiring in these days of trouble. The men are discouraged now and then by the slowness of the Association and Commissioners, being left without pay, and sometimes in sore straits for clothing, and sometimes even for food; and meanwhile time is being lost, and the opposite party are strengthening themselves; bold Prince Rupert, or Prince Robber, as he is already called, having already begun to practise, with great effect, the art of swooping down suddenly, when least expected, and retiring as suddenly, laden with plunder, leaving fire and desolation behind him. Just now, too, the Parliament has to lament the loss of their best man, the patriot Hampden, mortally wounded in the skirmish at Chalgrove Field. The following remonstrance from a letter of Colonel Cromwell will show to what straits he was sometimes reduced. He concludes an energetic appeal with the following very sensible and unanswerable words: "The money I brought down with me is so poor a pittance, when it comes to be distributed amongst all my troops, that, considering their necessity,—it will not half clothe them, they were so far behind,—if we have not more money speedily, they will be exceedingly discouraged, I am sorry you put me to it, to write thus often. It makes it seem a needless importunity in me, whereas in truth it is a constant neglect of those that should provide for us. Gentlemen, make them able to live and subsist that are willing to spend their blood for you. I say no more."

Meanwhile, by weeding out the bad soldiers and enlisting the best men procurable, he was organising that capital body of cavalry, those thousand Ironsides who soon did such splendid service. Strict discipline, as became men engaged in a great cause, is maintained among them. "Not a man of Colonel Cromwell's soldiers swears," say the newspapers, "but he pays his twelve-pence; and all drinking, plundering, impiety, and disorder are sternly prohibited."

At the beginning of 1644, Lieutenant-General Cromwell seems to see his way more clearly. We find him administering an official reproof to Major-General Crawford, who has sent away a zealous Lieutenant-Colonel with whom he differs on religious matters. "Surely," writes Cromwell, in grave wonder, "you are not well advised thus to turn off one so faithful to the cause as this man is. Give me leave to tell you, I cannot be of your judgment, if a man notorious for wickedness, for oaths, for drinking hath as great a share in your affections as one who fears an oath . . . that this doth commend your election of men to serve as fit instruments in this work. Ay, but this man is an Anabaptist. Are you sure of that? Admit he be, shall that render him incapable to serve the public? . . . Sir, the State, in choosing men to serve it, takes no notice of their opinions; if they be willing faithfully to serve it, that satisfies. I advised you formerly to bear with men of different minds from yourself; if you had done it when I advised you to it, I think you would not have had so many stumbling-blocks in your way."

CROMWELL'S RISING FORTUNES; MARSTON MOOR; CAVALIERS AND ROUNDHEADS.

So much energy and thoroughness, combined with a military genius and a faculty for organisation that developed itself more and more every day, could not fail to gain for their possessor a foremost place at a time when each side was compelled to put forth all its strength to avoid destruction at the hands of its opponent. The great fortunes of Cromwell date from Gainsborough fight; for here the immense importance of the man himself, and of the men he brought with him to the contest, became clearly manifest. We find him immediately afterwards made Governor of the island of Ely, and recognised as one of the leaders in the struggle, which has become one for life or death; for it is clearly seen by all that the hopes of compromise are fallacious, and that half-measures at such a crisis mean ruin. It is two years since the sword was drawn; and now the scabbard is thrown away.

How tremendous the strength of steady discipline, combined with stern enthusiasm, and led on by consummate skill may become, was manifest in the eyes of the whole nation in the next battle fought, in June 1644, and known as the field of Marston Moor. The honours of that memorable day, which saw the best of the cavalier forces, with Rupert's fiery cavalry, scattered like chaff before the tremendous onslaught of Oliver's Ironsides, were with General Cromwell. It was well understood that rout and ruin, instead of victory, might have been the fate of the Parliament on that memorable day but for the saviour of St. Ives, whom the exigencies of the times had converted into a leader of men; and from this time the action of Cromwell becomes even more vigorous, and he has a larger stage upon which to display his powers. Accordingly he is found exhorting, reproving, admonishing, with more vigour than ever. If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare him for the battle? He is determined that his trumpet, at least, shall continue to sound the alarm with a strain that shall be unmistakeable, and that it shall echo through the length and breadth of the land. He spares not to complain, and that right bitterly, of Lord Manchester himself, when he considers that nobleman is betraying "the Cause" by want of spirit and thoroughness. With him "the Cause" is everything; and he declares that the man who would not, in battle, fire off his pistol at the King as at any other opponent, if need be, is no man for him. Accordingly, after he has besieged and reduced Farringdon, we find him, as Lieutenant-General of the army, invested with new authority, and firmly fixed in the hearts of his followers, who would die rather than disobey him; while the contempt, half real, half assumed, with which the cavaliers had regarded their opponents, was fast changing to a half incredulous wonder at the astonishing prowess and success of the "canting psalm-singers." It was too much the fashion of those who risked their lives in defence of the King, to look upon license, profanity, and looseness of life and manners as a kind of declaration of loyalty, and as signs of a fine cavalier spirit. The fact that profane swearing, had been constituted by the Puritans an offence against the law, punishable by fine and other penalties, was enough to make the royalists use oaths in abundance in their ordinary conversation. The plain, sad-coloured garments and grave demeanour, sometimes exaggerated into sourness, that characterised the Parliamentarians, was another source of perennial ridicule to their opponents.

"They'll not allow such pride, it brings
No favours in hats, nor no such thing;
They'll convert all ribbons to Bible-strings, sang the cavaliers. And the fact that various Puritan preachers had inveighed their sermons against the "unloveliness of love-locks," was enough to make them wear their hair in long curls, flowing over their shoulders, the rather as it formed a contrast to the close-cut fashion adopted by their opponents, whom they stigmatised as "crop-eared, canting hypocrites and knaves." But though the visages of many of the Parliament partisans might be sour and harsh, though their psalmody might be occasionally nasal, and their affectation of Scriptural names and Bible phraseology was a source of continual ridicule to their opponents, there was no denying their terrible earnestness; and the late victories had inspired them with a conviction that they were invincible in fighting the battle of the Lord; and thenceforth they marched to the combat with a certain fierce joy, as to assured triumph, all the more to be prized because on each field many of them would be privileged to seal their testimony with their blood.
Which nobody can deny."

Even the excesses they committed in their fanaticism were tinged with an idea, oft mistaken and exaggerated, but none the less real, of religious duty and obligation. When the troopers stabled their horses in the grand old cathedrals; when they hacked and defaced with their swords the carving and ornaments with which the piety of former centuries had decorated the churches; when they threw down from their niches the statues of saints, they considered themselves as performing the judgment of heaven upon the land, in casting down the implements of idolatry.

NASEBY; RUIN AND DEATH OF THE KING.

The discomfiture at Marston Moor was hardly greater than the calamity brought upon the royalist cause in the next campaign by the

OLIVER CROMWELL.

Battle of Naseby. Here it was decisively proved that the sudden and fiery charges of Rupert's cavalry were powerless against the steady and confident valour of their opponents; and here again we find Cromwell present, contributing largely to the triumph of his party on that memorable day. And Charles lost more than the battle on that occasion; for there fell into the hands of the victors that memorable cabinet of letters, which proved but too clearly that the King had been cultivating the Machiavelian kind of diplomacy from the beginning of the contest, endeavouring to effect a compromise with his opponents by promises he never intended to keep, and negotiating with various parties at once, in the hope of destroying one by the other. The publication of the royal letters had a terrible effect in increasing the number of those who felt that with Charles I. no peace was possible, if the liberties of the country, or even a remnant of them, were to be maintained.

Among the next triumphs of Cromwell were the taking of Winchester, and the reduction of Basing House, the most important stronghold possessed by a subject; and now the burden and heat of the day in the combat against the King being over, considerable grants of land were awarded to him by the Parliament in return for his services, which had included not only his personal exertions during those years of peril and anxiety, but assistance to the cause in arms and money to the very utmost of his means.

The King, finding his cause desperate, now put himself into the hands of the Scotch Presbyterians who had marched a large army into England; and his ruin was complete from the unhappy day on which he fled to their camp at Newark. The miserable story of the £100,000 of pay due from the Parliament to the Scots, of the negotiation for a part of that sum paid down, the rest within a given period of the delivery of the King into the hands of the Parliament, when the price was paid, and of the withdrawal of the Scottish forces northward, fills the next sad page in the history of the civil war. And then came the mournful period during which the disrowned King, a prisoner in the hands of his enemies, by his dignity and patience, won back the hearts of many who had been his most determined enemies during the days of his prosperity and tyranny. Then, too, came the time when a large and influential portion of the Parliament became alive to the fact that the army was becoming too powerful for it. Hence the "self-denying ordinance" and the subsequent strife between the Parliament and the army; and, by the natural instinct that makes men turn to the strong when their lives and fortunes are at stake, the army rallied round Oliver Cromwell, when it refused to disband at the behest of the Parliament. In the struggle that ensued, the army was victorious; and the Parliament, with the Presbyterian element driven out of it by "Pride's purge," became a shadow of its former self. Then comes the most impressive scene of all the great drama,—the trial and execution of the King; and in this proceeding, Oliver Cromwell took a prominent part. His name appears third among the signatures to the death-warrant of Charles; and of the responsibility attached to the death of the King, a great share falls to him. To justify the action is impossible. Charles's refusal to plead, on the ground that the High Court of Justice was incompetent to try him, was perfectly logical and justifiable; more logical than President Bradshaw's petulant rebuke, "Sir, you are not permitted to issue out in these discourings. This Court is satisfied of its authority. No Court will bear to hear its authority questioned in that manner." But although those fifty-nine men who signed the death-warrant of the King committed a great crime, yet there were some points in which their procedure contrasted favourably, nay, heroically, with the usages of former times. The fate of Arthur of Bretagne, of Edward II., Richard II., and Henry VI., would have been that of Charles, had he lived in earlier days, and fallen into the hands of his enemies. He would have been relegated to some strong and secure prison, from whence shortly afterwards would have gone forth the tidings of his death; and men would have spoken mysteriously and in whispers of the suddenness of the King's demise. But here was presented by the men of 1648, to the eyes of astonished Europe, the spectacle of a King, solemnly and openly, in the face of the nation, arraigned and brought to the bar for unfaithfulness to his trust. These things were not done in a corner. No more impressive protest was ever entered against the doctrine of divine right, and the irresponsibility of kings. It was a tremendous and impressive lesson to tyrants throughout the world, and as such was not without its effect. "What did Cromwell ever do for England?" asked Dr. Johnson in Scotland, "with his Jacobitical tendencies sharpened into aggressiveness by opposition." "Ecod, Doctor," replied the shrewd old Scottish laird his interlocutor, "he gard kings ken they had a lith in their necks;" and, in homely phrase, this expresses a truth. And, indeed, these things cannot be judged by ordinary rules. When men have been engaged for years in a mortal struggle for their lives and liberties; when at every stage valuable lives have been sacrificed, until at last blood and treasure have been poured out like water; when each successive triumph and defeat has alike embittered the struggle, and made both sides more determined to fight it out to the end, ordinary rules and laws are at length put aside, and there is no further distinction or respect of persons. As Schiller observes in his William Tell: "Der alte Urstand der Natur kehrt wieder, Wo Mensch dem Menschen gegenüber steht:" the condition in which man recognises in his opponent an enemy and nothing else, when he would as soon discharge his pistol at the king as at a common man, and would with equal readiness condemn the king who fell into his power.

THE COMMONWEALTH; CROMWELL LORD-LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND.

Immediately after the execution of the King came that Council of State, to be followed, on the 19th of May, by the emphatic Act of Parliament, which decreed "That the people of England, and of all the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, are, and shall be, and are hereby constituted, made, established, and confirmed to be a Commonwealth or Free State, by the supreme authority of this nation, the Representatives of the People in Parliament, and by such as they shall appoint and constitute Officers and Ministers under them for the good of the People; and that without any King or House of Lords." Cromwell appears to have been the first President of the Council of State, temporarily chosen until the election of Bradshaw. An order still exists, signed by him as "Præses pro tempore." But there was soon more active work for him. Lawlessness appears in various directions; and, worse than all, there is disaffection in the army. For a certain part of the force has to march to Ireland, which is in a state of open rebellion, and will not acknowledge the authority of the new state; and Oliver Cromwell has been appointed to the high office of Lord-Lieutenant. In other directions also there are ugly symptoms of disaffection. The sects, freed from Church control, are breaking out into strange extravagances. In Surrey, the "Diggers" have begun to delve assiduously in the waste lands, asserting that, by virtue of the penalty of Adam, it is man's destiny to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow, and, consequently, that all ranks are to be levelled, and property in land to cease; for the "levellers" openly declare their intention of pulling down park palings on the first opportunity—a state of things that has to be met with prompt repression of the most energetic kind, even to the stern trial by court-martial and subsequent shooting of several of the most refractory soldiers. In the West, too, the Clubmen, mostly ignorant peasants, stirred up to attempt a revolt without any very definite idea of their object, are put down by judiciously mingled conciliation and force.

And so, the standard of the new King, Charles II., being unfurled in Ireland by the Marquess of Ormond, Oliver Cromwell, a very different personage now from the Captain Cromwell who was drilling men and collecting arms in the midland counties just seven years since, sets forth for Ireland by way of Bristol, to fight the battle of the Commonwealth. The newspapers of the day, as chronicled in "Cromwelliana," describe quaintly enough the manner of his setting forth, under date of July 10th, 1649, in the following record:—"This evening, about five of the clock, the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland began his journey, by the way of Windsor, and so to Bristol. He went forth in that state and equipage as the like hath hardly been seen; himself in a coach with six gallant Flanders naves, whitish grey; divers coaches accompanying him, and very many great officers of the army; his life-guard, consisting of eighty gallant men, the meanest whereof a commander or esquire, in stately habit, with trumpets sounding almost to the shaking of Charing Cross had it been now standing." (This ancient monument, by the way, had lately fallen beneath the iconoclastic zeal of the Parliamentary soldiers, who detected some latent essence of Popery in this and many similar monuments, and ruthlessly destroyed them; the statue of the late King at Charing Cross being likewise pulled down, and sold to a city cutler to be broken up; but by him buried, to be reproduced, to the great profit of the holder, at the Restoration.) "Of his life-guard many are colonels; and, believe me, it's such a guard as is hardly to be paralleled in the world. And now have at you, my Lord of Ormond! You will have men of gallantry to encounter, whom to overcome will be honour sufficient, and to be beaten by them will be no great blemish to your reputation. If you say 'Caesar or nothing,' they say, 'A Republic or nothing!' The Lord-Lieutenant's colours are white."

CROMWELL IN IRELAND; DROGHEDA AND WEXFORD.

Those white colours were soon to be stained of an awful red, whose crimson hue should live for many generations in the memory of the Irish nation. It seems difficult at first to reconcile the idea of a merciful man with the terrible scenes of slaughter enacted at Tredagh, or Drogheda, and at Wexford and elsewhere, during this memorable campaign. The rebels were put to the sword like the Amalekites of old; of the defenders of Tredagh not thirty were left.

The grim Commander of the Commonwealth army appears in a darker aspect than we have yet seen him assume, in this campaign in Ireland. The name of Oliver Cromwell is still a tradition of terror and hatred among the peasantry of part of Ireland; and "Cromwell's curse" still passes among them for the deepest of maledictions. The severities practised upon those that resisted his army were terrible. But first he summoned the garrisons that stood out against him to surrender, plainly putting the alternative before them—safety and protection if they yielded, death to the last man if they continued to resist. They refused to capitulate, and he was as good as his word. How completely the work of destruction was done at Drogheda appears very clearly from Oliver's despatch to President Bradshaw, written for the information of the Council of State:—"It hath pleased God to bless our endeavours at Tredah," he says. "After haltery, we stormed it. The enemy were about 3,000 strong in the town. They made a stout resistance; and near 1,000 of our men being entered, the enemy forced them out again. But God giving a new courage to our men, they attempted again, and entered, beating the enemy from their defences. The enemy had made three entrenchments both to the right and left, where we entered; all which they were forced to quit. Being thus entered, we refused them quarter; having the day before summoned the town. I believe we put to the sword the whole number of the defendants. I do not think thirty of the whole number escaped with their lives. Those that did are in safe custody for the Bar-badoes. Since that time, the enemy quitted to us Trim and Dundalk. In Trim they were in such haste that they left their guns behind them."

There is in this very outspoken letter no kind of attempt at concealment; and he who runs may read in it the policy Cromwell had determined to pursue in the civil war. He had evidently made up his mind that the short and sharp method was the only one that would be effectual; and, indeed, when we view the circumstances of the case, we are strongly inclined to think that his view was not unreasonable. In Ireland, all the different sects and parties, from Romanists to Presbyterians, had been united, by the indefatigable energy and activity of Ormond, against the government of the Commonwealth. Dublin and Derry were the only two towns that held out for the Parliament; and the enemy had concentrated their strength in Drogheda and Wexford, having put into this garrison (Tredah) almost all their prime soldiers, being about 3,000 horse and foot, under the command of their best officers; Sir Arthur Ashton being made Governor. "To break the neck of the rebellion at once, by blows fiercely and relentlessly struck, and, above all, to impress the people with the idea that what he promised he would perform," seemed to Cromwell the one feasible method of terminating the struggle promptly and successfully; and in the same letter from which we have quoted, he goes on to say how one lieutenant who got away to the enemy, was declared to have reported himself as the only man of all the garrison who escaped. "The enemy upon this were filled with much terror," adds Cromwell; "and truly I believe this bitterness will save much effusion of blood, through the goodness of God." That he was right in his belief subsequent events and the speedy termination of the war very quickly proved. "The execrable policy of that regicide," says Carte, a writer bitterly hostile to him, "had the effect he proposed." The hasty evacuation of Dundalk and Trim by their garrisons was the first indication of this.

In his letter to the commander at Wexford, before proceeding to the storm of the city, he offers fair terms: to the soldiers and noncommissioned officers of the garrison quarter for life, and leave to go home, they undertaking not to bear arms more against the Parliament; to the commissioned officers, quarter as prisoners; to the inhabitants, protection and security from plunder and ill-usage.

By the end of May, the Lord-Lieutenant is back in London; hastily summoned home by the Government, for affairs in Scotland look threatening. A triumphal greeting awaited him; Fairfax, with the chief officers and many members of the Parliament, going as far as Hounslow Heath to meet him, and so bring him to Whitehall amid much noise and shouting. "What a crowd hath come out to see your Lordship's triumph!" cries a flatterer, willing to please the great man. "Yes," replies his Lordship with a grim smile; "but if it were to see me hanged, how many more would there be?"—wherein especially many in Ireland at that moment would declare he had spoken truly.

OLIVER CROMWELL.

THE SCOTTISH CAMPAIGN; WORCESTER; EXPULSION OF THE RUMP PARLIAMENT.

That trouble in the direction of Scotland has been growing formidable, and Oliver's strong hand is required to put it down. The Scottish Covenanters, anxious, as they say, "that God's divine law of the Bible should be put in practice in these nations," or in other words, that the Presbyterian form of religion shall be the one recognised in the Three Kingdoms, had made advances to Charles, the eldest son of the late King, whom they proclaimed as Charles the Second, and thus set up the standard of revolt against the Parliament. "Given a divine law of the Bible on one hand, and a Stuart King, Charles the First or Charles the Second on the other, alas! did History ever present a more irreducible case of equations in this world?"—as was wittily observed by a French writer, the Presbyterians compelled Charles Stuart to sign the covenant "voluntarily;" and thus it was necessary to send an army into the north. Fairfax refused to go, and gave up his commission; whereupon Cromwell, now General-in-chief, marched away to the north.

The story is well known of that famous Battle of Dunbar, on the 3rd of September, 1650; how the Scottish General, Leslie, encamped in a good position on the hill-side, came down to fight Oliver in the plain, urged by the ministers of the Kirk, who rebuked him for trusting in the arm of flesh, and adjured him to go forth and fight his adversary in the strength of the Lord; how upon seeing the foe moving upon the heights, and evidently preparing to come down, grim Oliver exclaimed gleefully, "The Lord hath delivered them into my hands!" So says Bishop Burnet; but many of the garrulous Bishop's assertions rest only upon hearsay. What is certain, is that Leslie did come down, and was very completely beaten, with a loss of ten thousand prisoners; the rout was frightful, and the cause of the Covenant was lost. For Edinburgh quickly surrendered, though the Castle held out for a time. At Edinburgh Cromwell had a long illness, which put the Government at home into much anxiety; but by June 1651, he is on his feet again, and soon afterwards he is marching rapidly southwards, and for a notable cause. For a Scots army has gone southward into England, in the hope of raising the country in favour of Charles; and Cromwell is in hot pursuit of them. Towards the end of August the royal standard is raised at Worcester; and on the 3rd September, the anniversary of the Battle of Dunbar, was fought the last battle of the Civil War, ending in a victory for Cromwell, which he was accustomed to call his "crowning mercy." The Scots fought desperately on this occasion, and the victory was not gained without a hard and fierce struggle of five or six hours. "My Lord General did exceedingly hazard himself," says a contemporary account, "riding up and down in the midst of the fire, riding himself in person to the enemy's foot to offer them quarter, whereto they returned no answer but shot." But it was all in vain. The steady discipline of Oliver's well-trained troops carried the day, and the Scots were driven in desperate rout through the streets of Worcester; and King Charles, after hiding as best he may, with the help of the good Penderells and others, at last gets away to France.

And now what might long have been expected came to pass. The foundations of law and order had been deeply shaken in England by the events of the last twelve years; factions had been fighting against factions, and every form of fanaticism and religious extravagance was fighting for supremacy amongst Millenarians, Maggletonians, Brownists, Fifth Monarchy men, and a score of others. The one man who could dominate the conflicting masses was Cromwell; and he came forward and boldly took the supreme power into his own hands.

On that memorable 20th of April, 1653, he came into the House of Commons, "clad in plain black clothes and grey worsted stockings, and sat down, as he used to do, in an ordinary place." But he has come to do no ordinary thing; and after a time, suddenly rising, he commences an impressive harangue, in which he sets forth to the bewildered members of the Rump Parliament the various misdeeds of which they have been guilty: "of their injustice, delays of justice, self-interest, and other faults;" and then calls in certain armed men, and in a few minutes the Speaker, Lenthall, has been made to come down from his seat, and the mace is carried away, and the members of the Rump Parliament have all departed; Cromwell afterwards impressively asserting that "not a dog was heard to bark at their departure." A lawless and high-handed proceeding certainly, and one which even the strongest advocates of Cromwell have only faintly attempted to justify.

CROMWELL PROTECTOR; HIS RULE AND POWER; HIS DEATH.

A few months more, and the sequel to this high-handed proceeding becomes manifest to all men; for Oliver Cromwell receives the title of Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England.

Scotland, and Ireland, and begins to rule with such an amount of power as no English king until his time has possessed. A solemn instrument of Government, containing forty-two Articles, is drawn up for the safe-guarding of the State; and the ceremony of his installation being performed with a grave dignity and pomp worthy of the accession of a great monarch. "His Highness was in a rich but plain suit," says the contemporary account, "black velvet, with cloak of the same; about his hat a broad band of gold." (So now the objection to him made by his critics at his first appearance in Parliament is removed, for Oliver has a hat-band.) Carlyle has left an impressive picture of Cromwell, as he supposes him to have appeared on this day. "Does the reader see him? A rather likely figure I think. Stands some five feet ten or more; a man of strong, solid stature, and dignified, now partly military carriage; the expression of him valour and devout intelligence, energy and delicacy, on a basis of simplicity. Fifty-four years old, gone April last, ruddy, fair complexion, bronzed by toil and age; light-brown hair and moustache are getting streaked with grey. A figure of sufficient impressiveness, not lovely to the man milliner species, nor pretending to be so. Massive stature, big, massive head, of somewhat leonine aspect . . . on the whole, a right noble lion-face and hero-face; to me royal enough."

And now for the first time since the death of the lion-hearted Queen Elizabeth, the nation, and Europe, too, felt that there was indeed a king, a true ruling spirit upon the English throne. The march of events, far more than any personal ambition, had raised Oliver Cromwell to the position of arbiter of the destinies of the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. In times of great national peril and confusion, it is natural that nations, like individuals, should rally round the one man who shows himself equal to the occasion, who hopes when others despond, who works and labours to relieve disaster while others are lamenting it. What high ground the great Protector took in the matter of national morality, how far he was from being a leveller, or one who wishes to obliterate legitimate social distinctions, will appear from his own words addressed to his second Parliament: "I did hint to you my thoughts about the reformation of manners. And those abuses that are in this nation through disorder, are a thing which should be much in your hearts. It is that which, I am confident, is a description and character of the interest you have been engaged against, the badge and character of coun-tenancing profaneness, disorder, and wickedness in all places, and whatsoever is most of kin to these, and most agrees with what is Popery, and the profane nobility and gentry of this nation. In my conscience, it was a shame to be a Christian within these fifteen, sixteen, or seventeen years, in this nation, whether in Cesar's house or elsewhere! It was a shame, it was a reproach to a man; and the badge of 'Puritan' was put upon it. We would keep up nobility and gentry; and the way to keep them up is: Not to suffer them to be patronisers or countenancers of debauchery and disorders! And you will hereby be as labourers in that work of 'keeping them up.'Make it a shame to see men bold in sin and profaneness, and God will bless you. You will be a blessing to the nation; and by this will be more repairers of breaches than by anything in the world. Truly, these things do respect the souls of men, and the spirits, which are the men. The mind is the man. If that be kept pure, a man signifies somewhat; if not, I would very fain see what difference there is betwixt him and a beast. He hath only some activity to do some more mischief." And this is the man whom Smollett describes as "ridiculous in his reveries," and "despicable in his discourse;" this man who with such sagacity hits the nail on the head, and with such manly, outspoken frankness declares that the only true way of keeping up nobility and gentry is to insist that with the grand old name of gentleman shall be associated purity of life and truthfulness and self-respect!—"Make it a shame to see men bold in sin and profaneness, and God will bless you." Here was a man in whom was the root of the matter, whatever his faults may have been.

It was a marvellous government this of the Lord Protector, and one that soon set men talking and wondering at home and abroad. Its energy was marvellous; and equally remarkable was the originality and force with which it acted, and its utter disregard of prescription or antique rule where these were found standing in the way of right and justice. Thus the brother of the Portuguese Ambassador, Don Pantaleon Saa, having had a dispute with an English merchant in the Exchange in London, treacherously assassinated his opponent, and then took refuge at the Embassy; the houses of ambassadors being considered, by a polite fiction, as belonging to the territory the Embassy represented. But the grim Protector had no idea of any place as a sanctuary for any one who had murdered an Englishman; the homicide was seized, carried off to prison, and in due time brought to trial, and made to suffer death in due course of law.

Never had the name of England stood so high among foreign nations as at this period; never had the nation possessed such influence abroad as it now wielded. The pride of France, Spain, and Holland was humbled. The naval victories of Blake threw the names of such great captains as De Ruyter and Van Tromp into the shade.

Wherever there was a report of wrong suffered by Protestant at the hand of Papist, or by Christian at the hand of infidel, the strong arm of the "Defender of the Faith" who ruled at Whitehall was stretched forth to exact vengeance. Two notable instances of this may be given: the cases of the Mediterranean pirates and of the Waldenses. The Government on the North African seaboard had been in the habit of sending forth piratical vessels, which attacked merchant ships, plundered them, and carried the crews and passengers away into slavery, large ransoms being exacted for the liberation of the captives. Algiers and Tunis were the chief offenders in this matter; and to Algiers and Tunis a fleet of English men-of-war was promptly despatched through the Straits of Gibraltar. The Dey of Algiers submitted when summoned, set his captives free, and gave security for future good behaviour; the Dey of Tunis, who resisted, had his walls promptly battered down by English cannon, until he too saw, that for him the better part of valour was discretion, and consented to give up every Christian captive in his hands. In the Alpine valleys of Savoy dwelt a harmless, simple community of Protestants, the Waldenses, whose reasonable wish to worship God after the manner of their fathers, had roused up fierce persecution against them from the Duke of Savoy.

The action of Cromwell in this matter was prompt and decisive. He despatched a fleet to the Gulf of Genoa, and there and then exacted a promise from the Duke that the persecution of the Waldenses should cease forthwith. Moreover, he placed the community under the special protection of England, so that the promise was not likely to be broken in his time. In the northern parts of Ireland he settled a colony of Scottish Presbyterians, and in the remoter regions of Scotland he bestowed land on many of his English followers; in each case with the best results for the tranquillity of the country.

It was no enviable position that of Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, under the conditions on which Oliver Cromwell held that dignity. He was indeed despotic, for all men seemed to vie with each other in submitting to him. He was more arbitrary than Charles I. had been in the days of the Star Chamber and the Court of High Commission, and his word and his will were supreme throughout England. "The people had undergone that worst and most sad recoil from a virtuous and quick-witted enthusiasm to the debasing sense of failure, depression, and indifference," says Mr. Forster in his history of the Commonwealth. "Even this last, however, had more hope in it than another sense to which they were now and then roused to give way. This was when they admired their tyrant. . . . He flung some foreign victory among them as a rattle or a toy, and the whimpering ceased, and they recollected what a great man the Lord Protector was, and sent up an ill-sung song of praise." This is a somewhat strong view of the case. The period through which the English nation was passing was the one frequently following a time of strife and anarchy, when the strong hand is needed to keep down all jarring elements and opposing factions; when the community recognises the paramount necessity of kingship, in the hands of a really powerful and kingly man. What changes might have been made had the great Protector lived out the allotted threescore and ten years of man's life, can only be matter of conjecture; but, as Napoleon justly said, "one grows old quickly on battle-fields." The enormous responsibilities and cares of empire, increased by continually-recurring plots among the discontented, broke down that strong frame and that iron will; domestic trouble, in the loss of his favourite daughter, Lady Claypole (his eldest son, Oliver, had fallen in the Civil War long before), hastened the end; and at Whitehall, in 1658, on the 3rd of September, "his great day," as he was accustomed to call it, the anniversary of his victories of Dunbar and Worcester, the great Protector died. "Truly God is good, indeed He is!" was the expression most frequently on his lips during the last hours of his life. "This saying, 'God is good,' he frequently used all along," says Harvey, the attendant who has left us the record of Oliver's last days, "and would speak it with much cheerfulness and fervour of spirit in the midst of his pains. Again he said, 'I would be willing to live, to be further serviceable to God and His people; but my work is done. Yet God will be with His people.'" H. W. D.

THE POET AND HIS NATIVE LAND.

IT has been said that "Lowland Scotland, as a distinct nationality, came in with two warriors, and went out with two bards. It came in with William Wallace and Robert Bruce, and went out with Robert Burns and Walter Scott.

ROBERT BURNS.

The first two made the history, the last two told the story and sung the song."

We have here to trace the career of one of these illustrious personages—Robert Burns, the national poet of Scotland. In him we have a truly representative Scotchman; he was "Scotland condensed in a personality, the representative of what is noblest and also of much that is erring in the race." Emphatically a poet of the people, his life is doubly interesting from the broad ground of sympathies and the deep reality and naturalness of his sentiments.

His life, in so far as it was "by passion driven," may furnish a warning, but it may also serve as a great encouragement. To the young and aspiring it is another illustration of the fact that immortal fame does not belong to any particular rank in life, but may as likely as not be met with when following the plough or bestriding the pony of an exciseman.

BIRTH, PARENTAGE, AND EARLY YEARS.

Robert Burns was born on the 25th of January, 1759, in a humble cottage on the banks of the Doon, about two miles to the south of the town of Ayr. There was something romantic in an accident which befell him before he had concluded his first week's experience of the world. The frail abode in which he first saw the light, and which had been erected by the hands of his father, gave way at midnight, and the infant and his mother had to be conveyed through a storm to the shelter of a neighbouring cottage.

The father of the poet, William Burness—such was the original spelling of the name—was the son of a farmer in Kincardineshire, whence he removed at the age of nineteen, in consequence of the poverty of his family. Though a mere peasant, he was far superior to the class by whom he was surrounded. By nature he possessed strong sense and keen powers of observation, and these talents had been improved by such an education as a Scottish parish school could then afford. Deeply religious, and of unblemished integrity, he inspired his children with reverence and affection; and in his portrait of the priest-like father of the "Cotter's Saturday Night" his son has pronounced an imperishable eulogy on his worth. Unfortunately he possessed a headlong, ungovernable irascibility, and to this many of the distresses which befell him on his way through life are no doubt to be attributed.

Of the mother we know little. In one of Burns's letters he describes her as "a very sagacious woman, without forwardness or awkwardness of manner;" but he can find no higher praise for her in his family picture than—

"The mither wi' her needle an' her sheers, Gars auld cless look amais't as weel's the new."

She seems to have been in the habit of repeating fragments of old Scottish songs and ballads to her children, and no doubt this did something towards the cultivation of the poetic instinct in her afterwards famous son. It is to his father, however, that he was most indebted for the formation of his character.

When the poet was a little over six years old, his father removed to the farm of Mount Oliphant, in the parish of Ayr, on which he was placed by the kindness of a Mr. Ferguson, to whom he had acted as gardener. The change, however, was not for the better: Mr. Ferguson died, and his affairs fell into the hands of a factor who treated Burness with great harshness.

On being driven from Mount Oliphant, Burness went with his family, about 1772, to Lochlea, in the parish of Tarbolton, and for a time he succeeded better in the world. His sons were placed under the care of a teacher called Murdoch, who was engaged to instruct the children of the farmers at Lochlea. Murdoch has given a very interesting account of Robert Burns and his brother about this time. "Gilbert," he says, "always appeared to me to possess a more lively imagination, and to be far more the wit than Robert. I attempted to teach them a little Church music. Here they were left far behind by all the rest of the school. Robert's ear, in particular, was remarkably dull, and his voice untunable. It was long before I could get them to distinguish one tune from another. Robert's countenance was generally grave, and expressive of a serious, contemplative, and thoughtful mind, Gilbert's face said, 'Mirth, with thee I mean to live; and certainly, if any person who knew the boys had been asked which of them was the most likely to court the Muses, he would never have guessed that Robert had a propensity of that kind.'

Of himself at this period Burns says: "I was by no means a favourite with anybody. I was a good deal noted for a retentive memory, a stubborn sturdy something in my disposition, and an enthusiastic idiot piety. I say idiot piety, because I was then but a child. Though it cost the schoolmaster some thrashings, I made an excellent English scholar; and by the time I was ten or eleven years of age I was a critic in substantives, verbs, and participles.

"In my infant and boyish days, too, I owed much to an old woman who resided in the family, remarkable for her ignorance, credulity, and superstition. She had, I suppose, the largest collection in the country of tales and songs concerning devils, ghosts, fairies, brownies, witches, warlocks, spunkies, kelpies, elf-candles, dead-lights, wraiths, apparitions, cantraps, giants, enchanted towers, dragons, and other trumpery. This cultivated the latent seeds of poetry; but had so strong an effect on my imagination, that to this hour, in my nocturnal rambles, I sometimes keep a sharp look-out in suspicious places; and though nobody can be more sceptical than I am in such matters, yet it often takes an effort of philosophy to shake off these idle terrors.

"The earliest composition that I recollect taking pleasure in was The Vision of Mirzah, and a hymn of Addison's, beginning, How are Thy servants blest, O Lord! I particularly remember one half-stanza which was music to my boyish ears—

'For though on dreadful whirls we hung
High on the broken wave—'

I met with these pieces in Mason's English Collection, one of my school-books.

"The first two books I ever read in private, and which gave me more pleasure than any two books I ever read since, were The Life of Hannibal, and The History of Sir William Wallace. Hannibal gave my young ideas such a turn, that I used to strut in raptures up and down after the recruiting drum and bagpipe, and wish myself tall enough to be a soldier; while the story of Wallace poured a Scottish prejudice into my veins, which will boil along there till the flood-gates of life shut in eternal rest."

Murdoch was now appointed master of the Grammar School of Ayr, and the two brothers were sent to him "week about," and in the winter evenings their father instructed them in arithmetic and such other knowledge as he possessed. Much of their time, however, was spent in farm labour.

The exertions of both father and sons soon failed to support them, and a very dismal description of their situation and prospects has been given by Gilbert Burns. Their privations and poverty no doubt had a material influence on the future character of the poet.

THE DAWN OF POETRY.

Burns made his first attempt at verse-writing before he had reached his sixteenth year. It was inspired by his partner in the labours of the harvest, a bewitching creature a year younger than himself, "a bonnie, sweet, sonsie lass," whose charms he celebrated in the little ballad, "O once I loved a bonnie lass."

"Among her other love-inspiring qualities," says Burns, for we must give the incident in his own words, "she sang sweetly; and it was her favourite reel to which I attempted giving an embodied vehicle in rhyme.

"I was not so presumptuous as to imagine that I could make verses like printed ones, composed by men who had Greek and Latin; but my girl sang a song which was said to be composed by a country laird's son, on one of his father's maids with whom he was in love; and I saw no reason why I might not rhyme as well as he; for, excepting that he could shear sheep and cast peals, his father living in the moorlands, he had no more scholarship than myself. Thus with me began love and poetry."

MENTAL IMPROVEMENT: AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL AND OTHER NOTES.

During the residence of his father at Lochlea, Burns made a great advance in mental improvement.

At the beginning of this period, he was, according to his own account, perhaps the most ungainly, awkward boy in the parish—no solitaire was less acquainted with the ways of the world. What he knew of ancient story was gained from Salmon and Guthrie's Geographical Grammars; and the ideas he had formed of modern manners, of literature, and criticism, he got from the Spectator. These, with Pope's Works, some plays of Shakspeare, Tull and Dickson on Agriculture, the Pantheon, Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, Stackhouse's History of the Bible, Justice's British Gardener's Directory, Bayle's Lectures, Allan Ramsay's Works, Taylor's Scripture Doctrine of Original Sin, A Select Collection of English Songs, and Hervey's Meditations, had formed the whole of his reading. The collection of songs was his rade mecum. He pored over them driving his cart, or walking to labour, song by song, verse by verse; carefully noting the true, tender, or sublime from affectation and fustian. "I am convinced," he says, "I owe to this practice much of my critic craft, such as it is."

In his seventeenth year he began to attend a country dancing school, and his doing so was in direct opposition to the wishes of his father. "My father," says Burns, "was subject to strong passions; from this instance of disobedience he took a sort of dislike to me, which I believe was one cause of the dissipation which marked my succeeding years. I say dissipation, comparatively with the strictness and sobriety and regularity of Presbyterian country life; for though the will-o'-the-wisp meteors of thoughtless whim were almost the sole lights of my path, yet early engrained piety and virtue kept me for several years afterwards within the line of innocence.

"The great misfortune of my life," he continues, "was to want an aim. I had felt early some stirrings of ambition, but they were the blind gropings of Homer's Cyclops round the walls of his cave. I saw my father's situation entailed on me perpetual labour. The only two openings by which I could enter the temple of Fortune was the gate of niggardly economy, or the path of little chicaning bargain-making. The first is so contracted an aperture, I could never squeeze myself into it; the last I always hated—there was contamination in the very entrance! Thus abandoned of aim or view in life, with a strong appetite for sociability, as well from native hilarity as from a pride of observation and remark; a constitutional melancholy or hypochondriasm that made me fly solitude; add to these incentives to social life my reputation for bookish knowledge, a certain wild logical talent, and a strength of thought something like the rudiments of good sense; and it will not seem surprising that I was generally a welcome guest where I visited, or any great wonder that, always where two or three met together, there was I among them. But far beyond all other impulses of my heart, was un penchant à l'adorable moitié du genre humain.

"My heart was completely tinder, and was eternally lighted up by some goddess or other; and as in every other warfare in this world, my fortune was various. Sometimes I was received with favour, and sometimes I was mortified with a repulse. At the plough, scythe, or reap hook, I feared no competitor, and thus I set absolute want at defiance; and as I never cared further for my labours than while I was in actual exercise, I spent the evenings in the way after my own heart.

"A country lad seldom carries on a love adventure without an assisting confidant. I possessed a curiosity, zeal, and intrepid dexterity that recommended me as a proper second on these occasions; and I dare say I felt as much pleasure in being in the secret of half the loves of the parish of Tarbolton, as ever did statesman in knowing the intrigues of half the courts of Europe."

The account of the poet's early habits given by his brother will be read with interest. "The seven years," he says, "we lived in Tarbolton parish, extending from the seventeenth to the twenty-fourth of my brother's age, were not marked by much literary improvement; but during this time the foundation was laid of certain habits in my brother's character which afterwards became but too prominent, and which malice and envy have taken delight to enlarge on. Though, when young, he was bashful and awkward in his intercourse with women, yet when he approached manhood his attachment to their society became very strong, and he was constantly the victim of some fair enslaver. The symptoms of his passion were often such as nearly to equal those of the celebrated Sappho. I never indeed knew that he 'fainted, sank, and died away,' but the agitations of his mind and body exceeded anything of the kind I ever knew in real life.

"He had always a particular jealousy of people who were richer than himself, or who had more consequence in life. His love, therefore, rarely settled on persons of this description. When he selected any one out of the sovereignty of his good pleasure to whom he should pay his particular attention, she was instantly invested with a sufficient stock of charms, out of the plentiful stores of his own imagination; and there was often a great dissimilitude between his fair captivator, as she appeared to others, and as she seemed when invested with the attributes he gave her."

Part of his nineteenth year was spent in learning mensuration and surveying at Kirkoswald, where smuggling, with its attendant demoralizing effects, prevailed. The temptations of Kirkoswald proved irresistible. On his first going there the poet was a great reader—eating at mealtimes with a spoon in one hand and a book in the other, and carrying a few small volumes about in his pocket, to study at leisure moments. But he soon began to find enjoyment in the convivial society of the smuggling population, the excitement of wine led him still farther astray, and at last his studies were thrown overboard, and everything had to give place to a young girl with whom he fell desperately in love.

THE POET'S EXPERIENCES.

Love and trifling were his chief occupations till he reached his twenty-third year. At that period, he observes, "Poesy was still a darling walk for my mind, but it was only indulged in according to the humour of the hour. I had usually half a dozen or more pieces on hand; I took up one or other as it suited the momentary turn of the mind, and dismissed the work as it bordered on fatigue. My passions, once lighted up, raged like so many devils, till they found vent in rhyme; and then the conning over my verses, like a spell, soothed all into quiet."

He had written his first verses of note, "Behind yon hill where Stinchar (afterwards Lugar) flows," when in 1781 he went to Irvine to learn the trade of a flax dresser, his motive being to acquire the means of marrying. "It was," he says, "an unlucky affair. As we were giving a welcome carousal to the New Year, the shop took fire, and burned to ashes; and I was left like a true poet without a sixpence." To crown his distresses, the girl whom he this time adored, and who had pledged her soul to meet him in the field of matrimony, jilted him under peculiar circumstances of mortification.

At Irvine the poet contracted some acquaintances of a freer manner of thinking and living than he had been accustomed to, whose society prepared him for overleaping the bounds of rigid virtue which had hitherto restrained him. He himself says that a friendship formed there with a person whose superior knowledge of the world gave him great influence over his mind, did him much harm, inasmuch as that individual "spoke of illicit love with the levity of a sailor, which hitherto I had regarded with horror."

It is but justice, however, to say that this person is reported to have exclaimed, in reference to this statement, "Illicit love! levity of a sailor! the poet had nothing to learn that way when I saw him first."

In Robert's twenty-fifth year his father died, full of sorrows and apprehensions for his gifted son. Of this event he thus feelingly speaks: "On the 13th of February I lost the best of fathers. Though, to be sure, we have had long warning of the impending stroke, still the feelings of nature claim their part; and I cannot recollect the tender endearments and parental lessons of the best of friends and the ablest of instructors without feeling what the calmer dictates of reason would perhaps condemn." His beautiful epitaph on—

"The tender father and the gen'rous friend,
The pitying heart that felt for human woe,
The dauntless heart that feared no human pride,
The friend of man, to vice alone a foe," is well known, and forms a pathetic proof of his filial love.

Shortly before his father's death, Burns and his brother took the farm of Mossiel, near Mauchline, as an asylum for their parents in the wreck of their affairs. The poet now resolved to be wise. He read farming books; he calculated profits; he attended markets, and everything might have gone well, but unfortunately, the first year from buying bad seed, and the second from a late harvest, they lost half their crops. This overset all Burns's wisdom, and all his good intentions vanished.

"I now began," he says, in an autobiographical fragment written shortly after this date, "to be known in the neighbourhood as a maker of rhymes. The first of my poetic offspring that saw light was a burlesque lamentation of a quarrel between two reverend Calvinists; both of these were dramatis personæ in my Holy Fair. I had a notion myself that the piece had some merit; but to prevent the worst, I gave a copy of it to a friend who was fond of such things, and told him that I could not guess who was the author of it, but that I thought it pretty clever. With a certain description of the clergy as well as the laity it met with a roar of applause.

"Holy Willie's Prayer next made its appearance, and alarmed the Kirk session so much, that they held several meetings to look over their spiritual artillery, if haply any of it might be pointed against profane rhymers. Unluckily for me, my wandering led me on another side, within point-blank shot of their heaviest metal. This is the unfortunate incident which gave rise to my printed poem, The Lament."

It would not be desirable, even if it were possible, to trace all Burns's love affairs, or to identify every pretty girl whom he celebrated in his verses. His heart was as susceptible as his imagination, and his fair idols succeeded each other with a rapidity which shows that constancy formed no part of his nature.

In 1785 he loved and was beloved by Jean Armour, the daughter of a master mason at Mauchline, a young girl of much goodness of heart and great personal charms. When their intercourse could no longer be concealed from the world, he declined to make her the atonement which the similarity of their station and the usage of the country justified her in expecting. To avoid the responsibility cast upon him, he resolved to leave Scotland for the West Indies.

One of his friends remonstrated. He consented to see Jean Armour, and in the end conceded to her tears and affliction what ought to have proceeded from love and duty. He gave her a written acknowledgment of marriage, which under such circumstances is binding in Scotland.

On learning what had taken place, the father's indignation that his daughter should be married to so wild and worthless a fellow as Burns knew no bounds. He compelled his daughter to give up the poet, and to destroy the document which vouched their marriage. In September, 1786, Jean Armour became the mother of twin children, and about the same time Burns took measures for securing a passage to Jamaica.

We gain a curious insight into the fickle temperament of the poet, when we discover that almost at the very time when he was half-distracted by Jean Armour's desertion of him, and whilst he was penning his Lament over her conduct, there occurred the well-known episode of Mary Campbell. This simple and true-hearted girl was the object of by far the deepest passion Burns ever experienced.

On the second Tuesday of May, 1786, the two met by the banks of the river Ayr, to spend one day of parting love. They stood one on either side of a little brook, laved their hands in the stream, and holding a Bible between them, vowed eternal fidelity to each other. They parted, and never met again. In October of the same year, Mary came from Argyllshire as far as Greenock, in the hope of meeting Burns; but she was there seized with fever, and died.

Mary Campbell might have been constancy itself, but not so Robert Burns. In the very month following their secret betrothal, June, 1786, we find him writing to one of his friends about "poor, ill-advised, ungrateful Armour," declaring that, "to confess a truth between you and me, I do still love her to distraction after all, though I won't tell her so if I were to see her."

"Chambers," says Professor Shairp, "even suggests that there was still a third love interwoven at this very time, in the complicated web of Burns's fickle affections. Burns, though he wrote several poems about Highland Mary, which afterwards appeared, never mentioned her name to any of his family. Even if there were no more in the story than what has been here given, no wonder that a heart like Burns's, which, for all its unsteadfastness, never lost its sensibility, nor even a sense of conscience, should have been visited by remorse.

THE POET IN PRINT.

Not having sufficient funds to pay his passage to the West Indies, he thought the money might be raised by the publication of some of his poems. His friends warmly encouraged the idea, and a number of subscribers being obtained he sent his favourite pieces to press. In one of his letters, written on the 12th Dec. 1786, he says,

"You will have heard that I am going to commence poet in print; and to-morrow my works go to press. I expect it will be a volume of about two hundred pages—it is just the last foolish action I intend to do; and then turn a wise man as fast as possible."

This event in the poet's career is of such importance, that we may well quote what he says himself. "Before leaving my native land for ever," he tells us, "I resolved to publish my poems. I weighed my productions as impartially as was in my power; I thought they had merit; and it was a delicious idea that I should be called a clever fellow, even though it should never reach my ears—a poor negro-driver, or perhaps a victim to that inhospitable clime, and gone to the world of spirits! I can truly say that, povre inconnu as I then was, I had pretty nearly as high an idea of my works as I have at this moment, when the public has decided in their favour. . . .

"It ever was my opinion, that the mistakes and blunders, both in a rational and religious point of view, of which we see thousands daily guilty, are owing to their ignorance of themselves. To know myself had been all along my constant study. I weighed myself alone; I balanced myself with others; I watched every means of information to see how much ground I occupied as a man and as a poet; I studied assiduously nature's design in my formation—where the lights and shades in my character were intended. I was pretty confident my poems would meet with some applause; but at the worst, the roar of the Atlantic would deafen the voice of censure, and the novelty of West Indian scenes make me forget neglect.

"I threw off about six hundred copies, of which I got subscriptions for about three hundred and fifty. My vanity was highly gratified by the reception I met with from the public; and besides, I pocketed, all expenses deducted, nearly twenty pounds. This sum came very seasonably, as I was thinking of indenting myself, for want of money, to procure a passage. As soon as I was master of nine guineas, the price of wafting me to the torrid zone, I took a steamer passage in the first ship that was to sail from the Clyde. for 'Hungry ruin had me in the wind.'

"I had been for some days skulking from covert to covert, under all the terrors of a jail, as some ill-advised people had uncoupled the merciless pack of the law at my heels. I had taken the last farewell of my friends; my chest was on the way to Greenock; I had composed the last song I should ever measure in Caledonia, The gloomy night is gathering fast, when a letter from Dr. Blackwood to a friend of mine overthrew all my schemes, by opening up new prospects to my poetic ambition."

The publication of his poems, which took place at Kilmarnock, was attended by most gratifying results. They were received, it is said, with rapture, and according to Heron, "Old and young, high and low, grave and gay, learned and ignorant, were alike delighted, agitated, transported. I was at that time," he adds, "resident in Galloway, contiguous to Ayrshire, and I can well remember how even ploughboys and maidservants would have gladly bestowed the wages they earned the most hardly, and which they wanted to purchase necessary clothing, if they might but procure the Works of Burns."

It may be convenient if we add here that this volume contains some of his most justly celebrated poems, the results of his scanty leisure at Lochlea and Mossiel: amongst others, The Two Dogs; The Author's Prayer; The Address to the Deil, The Vision and the Dream; Halloween; The Cotter's Saturday Night; the lines To a Mouse, and To a Daisy; Scotch Drink; Man was made to Mourn; The Epistle to Davie, and some of his most popular songs.

A VISIT TO EDINBURGH.

Amongst those to whom the merits of Burns were at once discovered were Professor Dugald Stewart and Dr. Blair, together with Mrs. Dunlop, of Dunlop, who was ever afterwards his steadfast friend. Dr. Blacklock also pronounced a warm eulogium on his work, and earnestly recommended that a second edition should be immediately printed in the capital of the country.

Visions of future fame dawned on the imagination of the poet, and a sudden revolution seemed to have occurred in his fortunes. He hastened at once to Edinburgh, where he arrived early in December, without even a letter of introduction or an acquaintance in that city, cheering his spirits on the journey by repeating a verse of an old ballad—

"As I came in by Glenap,
I met an aged woman,
And she bade me cheer up my heart,
For the best of my days was coming."

Within a month of the poet's arrival in town he had been welcomed at the tables of all the celebrities—Lord Monboddo, Robertson the historian, Dugald Stewart, Dr. Hugh Blair, Dr.

Adam Fergusson, the "Man of Feeling," Mr. Fraser Tytler, and many others.

How he bore himself during that winter as the chief lion of Edinburgh society we have the best of all evidence, both in the reports of those who met him and in his own letters. On the whole, his native good sense carried him creditably through the ordeal. If he showed for the most part due respect to others, he was still more bent on maintaining his respect for himself; indeed, this latter feeling was exhibited even in an exaggerated degree. As Mr. Lockhart has put it, he showed "in the whole strain of his bearing, his belief that in the society of the most eminent men of his nation he was where he was entitled to be, hardly deigning to flatter them by exhibiting a symptom of being flattered." His wonderful powers of conversation made a deep impression on all into whose society he was thrown, filling them with a greater sense of his genius than even his finest poems.

Sir Walter Scott bears testimony to the dignified simplicity and almost exaggerated independence of the poet.

"As for Burns," he says, "Virgilium vidi tantum. I was a lad of fifteen when he came to Edinburgh. I saw him one day at the late venerable Professor Adam Fergusson's. Of course we youngsters sat silent, looked and listened. The only thing I remember which was remarkable in Burns's manner, was the effect produced upon him by a print of Bunbury's, representing a soldier lying dead on the snow, his dog sitting in misery on one side,—on the other, his widow, with a child in her arms.

"Burns seemed much affected by the print: he actually shed tears. He asked whose the lines were, and it chanced that nobody but myself remembered that they occur in a half-forgotten poem of Langhorne's, called by the unpromising title of 'The Justice of Peace.' I whispered my information to a friend present, who mentioned it to Burns, who rewarded me with a look and a word, which, though of mere civility, I then received with very great pleasure. His person was strong and robust; his manner rustic, not clownish; a sort of dignified plainness and simplicity. His countenance was more massive than it looks in any of the portraits. I would have taken the poet, had I not known who he was, for a very sagacious country farmer of the old Scotch school,—the douce gude-man who held his own plough. There was a strong expression of sense and shrewdness in all his lineaments; the eye alone, I think, indicated the poetical character and temperament. It was large and of a dark cast, which glowed (I say literally glowed) when he spoke with feeling or interest. I never saw such another eye in a human head, though I have seen the most distinguished men of my time."

It is much to the credit of Burns, that, amidst all this popularity with the great, he never abated a jot of his intimacy and friendship towards the men of his own rank with whom he had associated in his days of obscurity. These were tradesmen, farmers, and peasants. The thought of them, their sentiments and habits, if it had been possible, their very persons, he would have taken with him without disguise or apology into the highest circles of rank or of literature.

He went from those meetings with professors and duchesses to share a bed in a garret with a writer's apprentice—they paid together 3s. a week for the room. It was in the house of Mr. Carfrae, Baxter's Close, Lawnmarket, "first scale stair on the left hand in going down, first door on the stair."

"Some of the friendships," says Professor Nichol, "contracted during this period—as for Lord Glencairn and Mrs. Dunlop—are among the most pleasing and permanent in literature; for genuine kindness was never wasted on one who, whatever his faults, has never been accused of ingratitude. But in the bard's city life there was an unnatural element. He stooped to beg for neither smiles nor favour, but the gnarled country oak is cut up into cabinets in artificial prose and verse. In the letters to Mr. Graham, the prologue to Mrs. Wood, and the epistles to Clarinda—a lady of a somewhat voluptuous style of beauty, who had been deserted by her husband, and with whom Burns was greatly fascinated—and of whom we shall hear again—he is dancing minuets with hobnailed shoes."

A SECOND EDITION; RETURNING HOME; A SECOND VISIT TO EDINBURGH.

When, in 1787, the second edition of his Poems appeared, the proceeds of their sale realized for their author about £500. The volume was published by subscription, "for the sole benefit of the author," and the subscriptions were so numerous that the list of them covered thirty-eight pages.

On the strength of this sum Burns gave himself two long rambles full of poetic material—one through the border towns into England, as far as Newcastle, returning by Dumfries to Mauchline, and another a grand tour through the East Highlands as far as Inverness, returning by Edinburgh, and so home to Ayrshire.

On returning home, after his first visit to Edinburgh, Burns came in among his own people unheralded, and was in the midst of them before they knew. It was a quiet meeting; for the Mossiel family had the true Scottish reticence or reserve; but their feelings were strong, though their words might not be "mony feck." It was indeed as strange a reverse as was ever made by the fickle wheel of fortune. "He had left them," to quote the words of Lockhart, "comparatively unknown, his tenderest feelings torn and wounded by the behaviour of the Amours, and so miserably poor that he had been for some weeks obliged to skulk from the sheriff's officers to avoid the payment of a paltry debt. He returned, his poetical fame established, the whole country ringing with his praise, from a capital in which he was known to have formed the wonder and delight of the polite and the learned, if not rich, yet with more money already than any of his kindred had ever hoped to see him possess, and with prospects of future patronage and permanent elevation in the scale of society, which might have dazzled steadier eyes than those of maternal and fraternal affection. The prophet had at last honour in his own country, but the haughty spirit that had preserved its balance in Edinburgh was not likely to lose it at Mauchline."

In the close of 1787, Burns spent a second winter in Edinburgh. He remained there till the 24th of March, 1788, when he left it, never to return again for more than a day's visit. There was a marked contrast between the first and second winters in Edinburgh.

Allan Cunningham says, "On his first appearance the doors of the nobility opened spontaneously, 'on golden hinges turning,' and he ate spices' meats and drank rare wines, interchanging nods and smiles with high dukes and mighty earls. A colder reception awaited his second coming. The doors of lords and ladies opened with a tardy courtesy; he was received with a cold and measured stateliness, was seldom requested to stop, seldom to repeat his visit; and one of his companions used to relate with what indignant feeling the poet recounted his fruitless calls and his uncordial receptions in the good town of Edinburgh. . . . He went to Edinburgh strong in the belief that genius such as his would raise him in society; he returned not without a sourness of spirit and a bitterness of feeling."

MARRIED LIFE BEGUN.

On his return home he took a new farm at Ellisland on the Nith, in Dumfriesshire, and here he took up his abode in June, 1788. Previous to this event, however, he legalised his union with Jean Armour, by joining with her in a public declaration of their marriage.

The reasons which influenced Burns to marry Jean Armour, and not another, are given by him in a letter to Mrs. Dunlop, one of his most trusted correspondents, to whom he spoke out his real heart in a more natural way than was customary with him in letter-writing:—

"You are right that a bachelor state would have ensured me more friends; but, from a cause you will easily guess, conscious peace in the enjoyment of my own mind, and unmistrusting confidence in approaching my God, would seldom have been of the number. I found a once much-loved and still much-loved female, literally and truly cast out to the mercy of the naked elements; but I enabled her to purchase a shelter: there is no sporting with a fellow-creature's happiness or misery. The most placid good-nature and sweetness of disposition; a warm heart, gratefully devoted with all its powers to love me; vigorous health and sprightly cheerfulness, set off to the best advantage by a more than commonly handsome figure: these, I think, in a woman may make a good wife, though she should never have read a page but the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, nor have danced in a brighter assembly than a penny pay wedding."

Jean Armour has been described as an Ayrshire lass, of humble origin, very sagacious, with bright eyes and an intelligent look, but not what one would call beautiful. She had good manners and easy address. Like her husband, she was sincerely religious, but of a more equable temper. She was quick to perceive character, and had a memory stored with old traditions, songs, and ballads, which she told or sang to amuse her children.

Of what may be called the poet's marriage settlement, Allan Cunningham gives the following details:—

"His marriage reconciled the poet to his wife's kindred: there was no wedding portion. Armour was a respectable man, but not opulent. He gave his daughter some small store of plonishing; and, exerting his skill as a mason, wrought his already eminent son-in-law a handsome punch-bowl in Inverary marble, which Burns lived to fill often, to the great pleasure both of himself and his friends. . . . Mrs. Dunlop bethought herself of Ellisland, and gave a beautiful heifer; another friend contributed a plough. The young couple, from love to their native country, ordered their furniture from a wright in Mauchline; the farm-servants, male and female, were hired in Ayrshire, a matter of questionable prudence, for the mode of cultivation is different from that of the west, and the cold, humid bottom of Moss-giel bears no resemblance to the warm and stony loam of Ellisland."

Before Mrs. Burns could be received at Ellisland, a house had to be built, and with this end in view the poet at first took up his residence alone on the farm. The discomfort of his dwelling-place made him not only discontented with his lot, but also with the people amongst whom his lot was cast. "I am here," he writes, "on my farm, but for all the pleasurable part of life called social communication I am at the very elbow of existence. The only things to be found in perfection in this country are stupidity and canting. . . . As for the Muses, they have as much idea of a rhinoceros as of a poet."

When he was not in Ayrshire in bodily presence, he was there in spirit. It was at such a time that, looking up to the hills that divide Nithsdale from Ayrshire, he breathed to his wife one of the most natural and beautiful of all his love-lyrics:—

"Of a' the airts the wind can blaw
I dearly like the west,
For there the bonnie lassie lives,
The lassie I lo'e best."

About the middle of 1789 Burns entered the house which had cost him so much toil in building. It was a humble abode, the accommodation it afforded consisting only of a large kitchen, in which the whole family, master and servants, took their meals together; a room to hold two beds, a closet to hold one; and a garret, coom-ceiled, for the female servants. "One of the windows looked southward down the holms; another opened on the river; and the house stood so near the lofty bank, that its afternoon shadow fell across the stream, on the opposite fields. The garden or kail-yard was a little way from the house. A pretty footpath led southward along the river-side, another ran northward, affording fine views of the Nith, the woods of Friars Carse, and the grounds of Dalswinton. Half-way down the steep declivity, a fine, clear, cool spring supplied water to the household."

Such was the first home which Burns found for himself and his wife, and it was the best they were ever destined to find.

THE POET AS AN EXCISEMAN.

Soon after this, by the interest of Mr. Graham of Fintry, he was appointed, on his own application, an officer of excise for the district in which he lived. The salary which he received in this capacity was originally £50 a year, but was eventually increased to £70. The duties, however, greatly interfered with the attention due to his farm.

We have some interesting glimpses of him in this new capacity. To the country folk, farmers, or cottagers who sometimes set the excise at defiance, he tempered justice with mercy. Many stories are told of his leniency, and of these we shall repeat two, as given by Professor Shairp.

At Thornhill, on a fair day, he was seen to call at the door of a poor woman who for the day was doing a little illicit business on her own account. A nod and a movement of the fore-finger brought the woman to the doorway. "Kate, are you mad? Don't you know that the supervisor and I will be in upon you in forty minutes?" Burns at once disappeared among the crowd, and the poor woman was saved a heavy fine.

Again, a woman who had been brewing, on seeing Burns coming with another exciseman, slipped out by the back-door, leaving a servant and a little girl in the house. "Has there been any brewing for the fair here the day?" "O no, sir, we hae nae licence for that," answered the servant-maid. "That's no true," exclaimed the child; "the muckle black kist is fu' o' the bottles of yill that my mither sat up a' nicht brewing for the fair." . . . "We are in a hurry just now," said Burns; "but when we return from the fair, we'll examine the muckle black kist."

ON THE BANKS OF THE NITH.

From the year 1786, onwards, a cloud of melancholy seemed to oppress the poet towards the close of each autumn. In October, 1789, as the anniversary of Highland Mary's death drew near, he was observed by his wife to "grow sad about something, and to wander solitary on the banks of the Nith, and about his farmyard, in the extremest agitation of mind, nearly the whole night. He screened himself on the lee-side of a corn-stack from the cutting edge of the night wind, and lingered till approaching dawn wiped out the stars, one by one, from the firmament." Only after his wife had frequently entreated him, he was persuaded to return to his home, where he sat down and wrote as they now stand these pathetic lines:—

"Thou lingering star, with lessening ray,

That lovest to greet the early morn,

Again thou usherest in the day

My Mary from my soul was torn.

O Mary! dear departed shade!

Where is thy place of blissful rest?

Sweet thou thy lover lowly laid?

Hear'st thou the groans that rend his breast?"

The autumn of 1791 was signalized by the production of Tam o' Shanter, a matchless tale, which was struck off at one heat. Mrs. Burns retained a vivid recollection of the day on which the poem was written. Her husband had spent most of the early part of it by the river-side, and in the afternoon she joined him with her two children. He was busily engaged crooning to himself; and Mrs. Burns, perceiving that her presence was an interruption, loitered behind with her little ones among the broom. Her attention was presently attracted by the strange and wild gesticulations of the bard, who was now seen at some distance. He was reciting very loud, and with tears rolling down his cheeks, those animated verses which he had just conceived,—

"Now Tam! O Tam! had thae been queans, A' plump and strappin' in their teens."

"I wish ye had seen him," said his wife; "he was in such ecstacy that the tears were happing down his cheeks."

The poet, having committed the verses to writing on the top of his sod-dyke above the water, came into the house, and read them immediately in high triumph at the fireside.

Burns speaks of Tam o' Shanter as his first attempt at a tale in verse—it was also his last. He himself looked upon it as the masterpiece amongst his poems, and the public, we believe, are of much the same opinion.

A few songs were all the rest of the Ellisland productions during 1791. Only one of these is noteworthy—the popular lyric, The Banks o' Doon. In sending it to a friend, he says: "March, 1791. While here I sit, sad and solitary, by the side of a fire, in a little country inn, and drying my wet clothes, in paps a poor fellow of a soldier, and tells me he is going to Ayr. By heavens! say I to myself, with a tide of good spirits, which the magic of that sound, Auld Toon o' Ayr, conjured up, I will send my last song to Mr. Ballantine."

Then he gives the second and best version of the song, beginning thus:—

"Ye flowery banks o' bonnie Doon,
How can ye blame sae fair?
How can ye chant, ye little birds,
And I sae fu' o' care?"

The latest edition of Burns's works gives three different versions of this song. "Anyone," says Professor Shairp, "who will compare these, will see the truth of that remark of the poet, in one of his letters to Dr. Moore, 'I have no doubt that the knack, the aptitude to learn the Muses' trade is a gift bestowed by Him who forms the secret bias of the soul; but I as firmly believe that excellence in the profession is the fruit of industry, attention, labour, and pains; at least, I am resolved to try my doctrine by the test of experience.'"

In the summer of 1791, two English gentlemen, who had before met with him in Edinburgh, paid a visit to him at Ellisland. On calling at the house, they were informed that he had walked out on the banks of the river; and dismounting from their horses, they proceeded in search of him. On a rock that projected into the stream, they saw a man employed in angling, of a singular appearance. He had a cap made of a fox's skin on his head, a loose great-coat fixed round him by a belt, from which depended an enormous Highland broadsword. It was Burns. He received them with great cordiality, and asked them to share his humble dinner—an invitation which they accepted. On the table they found boiled beef, with vegetables and barley-broth, after the manner of Scotland, of which they partook heartily. After dinner, the bard told them ingenuously that he had no wine to offer them, nothing better than Highland whisky, a bottle of which Mrs. Burns set on the board. He produced at the same time his punch-bowl, made of Inverary marble, and, mixing the spirits with water and sugar, filled their glasses, and invited them to drink. The travellers were in haste, and besides, the flavour of the whisky to their southern palates was scarcely tolerable; but the generous poet offered them his best, and his ardent hospitality they found it impossible to resist. Burns was in his happiest mood, and the charms of his conversation were altogether fascinating. He ranged over a great variety of topics, illuminating whatever he touched. He related the tales of his infancy and of his youth; he recited some of the gayest and some of the tenderest of his poems; in the wildest of his strains of mirth, he threw in touches of melancholy, and spread around him the electric emotions of his powerful mind. The Highland whisky improved in its flavour; the marble bowl was again and again emptied and replenished; the guests of our poet forgot the flight of time and the dictates of prudence. At the hour of midnight they lost their way in returning to Dumfries, and could scarcely distinguish it when assisted by the morning's dawn.

LIFE IN DUMFRIES.

About the end of the year 1791, he retired, with his wife and family, to a small house in the town of Dumfries, placing his dependence for the future exclusively on his chances of promotion in the excise.

Towards the close of 1791, and about the time of Burns's first settling in Dumfries, he paid his last visit to Edinburgh. It was caused by the intelligence that Clarinda, whom we have already mentioned, was about to sail for the West Indies, in search of the husband who had deserted her. Since the poet's marriage, the silence between them seems to have been broken by only two letters to Clarinda from Ellisland. In the first of these he resents the name of "villain," which she seems to have hurled at him. In the second he acknowledges that his past conduct has been wrong, but winds up by repeating his error and enclosing a song addressed to her in the most exaggerated strains of affection. He now rushed to the capital to see her once more before she sailed. The interview was brief and hurried, and no record of it remains, save some letters and a few impassioned lyrics, which about that time he addressed to her. The first epistle is stiff and formal, as if to break the ice of their long estrangement; but not so the others, which are in the language of rapturous devotion. The lyrics are in some cases strained and artificial, but one of them stands out from all the rest as one of the most impassioned effusions Burns ever poured forth. It contains that one consummate stanza in which Scott, Byron, and many more, saw concentrated "the essence of a thousand love tales,"—

"Had we never loved so kindly,
Had we never loved so blindly;
Never met, or never parted,
We had ne'er been broken-hearted."

In course of time Mrs. McLose returned from the West Indies, and without having succeeded in the recovery of her truant husband. On her return Burns again addressed her in the old exaggerated style; the last time was in June, 1794, after which Clarinda is heard of no more.

In Dumfries Burns spent the short remainder of his life. The habits which he had acquired during the sudden and short-lived excitement of his first introduction to public notice now gained entire ascendancy over him, as misfortune and disappointment broke, or, at least, embittered.

tered, his spirit, and enfeebled his powers of resistance. The admiration and applause, by which he had been surrounded at Edinburgh, were sought for at any cost, and among companions of any order who would join him in drowning reflection. Even the prospects upon which he had placed his reliance of advancement in the excise were suddenly overcast, in consequence of some imprudent expressions which he had dropped on the subject of the French Revolution, to which some despicable informer had called the notice of the Board. It was only through the exertions of his friend Mr. Graham, on this occasion, that he was saved from being dismissed. Ill-health and great dejection of spirits at last came upon him, along with the pressure of accumulating pecuniary difficulties.

During the first year of Burns's residence in Dumfries he was asked by Mr. George Thomson to lend his aid in the preparation of a collection of Scottish melodies and words, then projected by a small band of musical amateurs in Edinburgh. This collection was pitched in a higher key than the comparatively humble Museum. It was to be edited with more rigid care, the symphonies and accompaniments were to be supplied by the first musicians of Europe, and it was to be expurgated from all leaven of coarseness, and from whatever could offend the purest taste. To Thomson's proposal Burns at once replied, "As the request you make to me will positively add to my enjoyment in complying with it, I shall enter into your undertaking with all the small portion of abilities I have, strained to their utmost exertion by the impulse of enthusiasm. . . .

"If you are for English verses, there is, on my part, an end of the matter. Whether in the simplicity of the ballad, or the pathos of the song, I can only hope to please myself in being allowed at least a sprinkling of our native tongue. . . . As to remuneration, you may think my songs either above or below price; for they shall be absolutely the one or the other. In the honest enthusiasm with which I embark in your undertaking, to talk of money, wages, fee, hire, etc., would be downright prostitution of soul."

Burns's correspondence with Thomson on the subject of his contributions to this work has been printed, and forms a highly interesting series of letters, as well as a most affecting chapter in the poet's history.

GATHERING GLOOM.

Burns now began to feel himself prematurely old. Walking with a friend who proposed to him to join a country ball, he shook his head, saying, "That's all over now," and adding a verse of Lady Grissel Baillie's ballad:—

"Oh, were we young as we ance hae been,
We sud hae been galloping down on yon green,
And linking it ower the lily-white lea,
But were na my heart light I wad dee."

Amid the gloom of this unhappy time Burns turned to an old Edinburgh friend. Alexander Cunningham, and poured forth this passionate and well-known complaint: "Canst thou minister to a mind diseased? Canst thou speak peace and rest to a soul tossed on a sea of troubles, without one friendly star to guide her course, and dreading that the next surge may overwhelm her? Of late, a number of domestic vexations, and some pecuniary share in the ruin of these cursed times—losses which, though trifling, were what I could ill bear—have so irritated me, that my feelings at times could only be envied by a reprobate spirit listening to the sentence that dooms it to perdition. Are you deep in the language of consolation? I have exhausted in reflection every topic of comfort. A heart at ease would have been charmed with my sentiments and reasonings; but as to myself, I was like Judas Iscariot preaching the gospel. . . . Still there are two great pillars that bear us up amid the wreck of misfortune and misery. The one is composed of a certain noble, stubborn something in man, known by the names of Courage, Fortitude, Magnanimity. The other is made up of those feelings and sentiments which, however the sceptic may deny them, or the enthusiast may disfigure them, are yet. I am convinced, original and component parts of the human soul, those senses of the mind—if I may be allowed the expression—which connect us with, and link us to those awful obscure realities—an all powerful and equally beneficent God, and a world to come, beyond death and the grave. The first gives the nerve for combat, while a ray of hope beams on the field; the last pours the balm of comfort into the wounds which time can never cure."

This remarkable, or, as Lockhart calls it, noble letter, was written on February 25, 1791.

In November of the same year, Burns wrote the well-known song:—

"Contented wi' little, and cantie wi' mair,
Whene'er I forgather wi' sorrow and care,
I gie them a skelp as they're creeping along,
Wi' a cog o' gude swats, and an auld Scottish sang."

"I whyles claw the elbow o' troublesome thought;
But man is a sorer, and life is a faught;

My mirth and gude humour are coin in my pouch,
And my freedom's my lairdship nae monarch dare touch.

"A towmond o' trouble, should that be my fa',
A night o' gude fellowship sowthers it a';
When at the blythe end o' our journey at last,
Wha the deil ever thinks of the road he has past?"

"Blind Chance, let her snapper and stoyte on her way;
Be't to me, be't frae me, e'en let the jauls gae:
Come ease, or come travail, come pleasure or pain,
My warst word is—Welcome, and welcome again."

"This song," says Professor Shairp, "gives Burns's idea of himself, and of his struggle with the world, when he could look on both from the placid, rather than the desponding side. He regarded it as a true picture of himself; for, when a good miniature of him had been done, he wrote to Thomson that he wished a vignette from it to be prefixed to this song, that, in his own words, 'the portrait of my face, and the picture of my mind may go down the stream of time together.'"

Allan Cunningham tells us, "While he lived in Dumfries he had three favourite walks—on the Dock, green by the river-side, among the ruins of Lincluden College, and towards the Martingdon-ford, on the north side of the Nith. This latter place was secluded, commanded a view of the distant hills and the romantic towers of Lincluden, and afforded soft greensward banks to rest upon, within sight and sound of the stream. As soon as he was heard to hum to himself, his wife saw that he had something in his mind, and was prepared to see him snatch up his hat, and set silently off for his musing-ground. When by himself, and in the open air, his ideas arranged themselves in their natural order—words came at will, and he seldom returned without having finished a song. . . . When the verses were finished, he passed them through the ordeal of Mrs. Burns's voice, listened attentively when she sang, asked her if any of the words were difficult, and when one happened to be too rough he readily found a smoother; but he never, save at the resolute entreaty of a scientific musician, sacrificed sense to sound. The autumn was his favourite season, and the twilight his favourite hour of study."

In the beginning of 1796 he somewhat revived, but recovering health did not involve an increase of prudence. Chambers thus records a fact which the local tradition of Dumfries confirms: "Early in the month of January, when his health was in the course of improvement, Burns tarried to a late hour at a jovial party in the Globe tavern. Before returning home, he unluckily remained for some time in the open air, and, overpowered by the effects of the liquor he had drunk, fell asleep. . . . A fatal chill penetrated his bones; he reached home with the seeds of a rheumatic fever already in possession of his weakened frame. In this little accident, and not in the pressure of poverty or disrepute, or wounded feelings or a broken heart, truly lay the determining cause of the sadly shortened days of our national poet."

It was thought that sea-bathing might improve his health, so the poet removed to Brow. Whilst residing there, on the 12th of July, he wrote to Thomson the following memorable letter:—

"After all my boasted independence, curst necessity compels me to implore you for £5. A cruel scoundrel of a haberdasher, to whom I owe an account, taking it into his head that I am dying, has commenced a process, and will infallibly put me into jail. Do, for God's sake, send that sum, and that by return of post. Forgive me this earnestness, but the horrors of a jail have made me half-distracted. I do not ask all this gratuitously; for, upon returning health, I hereby promise and engage to furnish you with five pounds' worth of the neatest songs you have seen. I tried my hand on Rothemurichie this morning. The measure is so difficult, that it is impossible to infuse much genius into the lines. They are on the other side. Forgive, forgive me!" And on the other side was written Burns's last song, beginning, Fairest maid on Devon banks.

A LAST INTERVIEW.

While he was at Brow, his former friend, Mrs. Walter Riddell, to whom, after an estrangement, he had been reconciled, happened to be staying for the benefit of her health in the neighbourhood. She asked Burns to dine with her, and sent her carriage to bring him to her house. This is part of the account she gives of the interview:—

"I was struck with his appearance on entering the room. The stamp of death was imprinted on his features. He seemed already touching the brink of eternity. His first salutation was, 'Well, madam, have you any commands for the other world?' I replied, that it seemed a doubtful case which of us should be there soonest, and that I hoped that he would yet live to write my epitaph. (I was then in a poor state of health.) He looked in my face with an air of great kindness, and expressed his concern at seeing me look so ill, with his accustomed sensibility. At table he ate little or nothing, and he complained of having entirely lost the tone of his stomach

We had a long and serious conversation about his present situation, and the approaching termination of all his earthly prospects. He spoke of his death without any of the ostentation of philosophy, but with firmness as well as feeling, as an event likely to happen very soon, and which gave him concern chiefly from leaving his four children so young and unprotected, and his wife in so interesting a situation—in hourly expectation of lying-in of a fifth. He mentioned, with seeming pride and satisfaction, the promising genius of his eldest son, and the flattering marks of approbation he had received from his teachers, and dwelt particularly on his hopes of that boy's future conduct and merit. His anxiety for his family seemed to hang heavy upon him, and the more perhaps from the reflection that he had not done them all the justice he was so well qualified to do. Passing from this subject, he showed great concern about the care of his literary fame, and particularly the publication of his posthumous works. He said he was well aware that his death would occasion some noise, and that every scrap of his writing would be revived against him to the injury of his future reputation; that letters and verses written with unguarded and improper freedom, and which he earnestly wished to have buried in oblivion, would be handed about by idle vanity or malevolence, when no dread of his resentment would restrain them, or prevent the censures of shrill-tongued malice, or the insidious sarcasms of envy, from pouring forth all their venom to blast his fame.

"He lamented that he had written many epigrams on persons against whom he entertained no enmity, and whose characters he should be sorry to wound; and many indifferent poetical pieces, which he feared would now, with all their imperfections on their head, be thrust upon the world. On this account he deeply regretted having deferred to put his papers into a state of arrangement, as he was now quite incapable of the exertion." The lady goes on to mention many other topics of a private nature on which he spoke. "The conversation," she adds, "was kept up with great evenness and animation on his side. I had seldom seen his mind greater or more collected. There was frequently a considerable degree of vivacity in his sallies, and they would probably have had a greater share, had not the concern and dejection I could not disguise damped the spirit of pleasantry he seemed not unwilling to indulge.

"We parted about sunset on the evening of that day (the 5th of July, 1796); the next day

I saw him again, and we parted to meet no more!"

THE POET'S END.

At first, Burns imagined bathing in the sea had been of benefit to him: the pains in his limbs were relieved; but this was immediately followed by a new attack of fever. When brought back to his own house in Dumfries, on the 18th of July, he was no longer able to stand upright. At this time a tremor pervaded his frame; his tongue was parched, and his mind sunk into delirium, when not roused by conversation. On the second and third day the fever increased, and his strength diminished.

When the news spread in Dumfries that Burns had come back from Brow, and now lay on his deathbed, the whole town was deeply moved. Allan Cunningham was there at the time, and thus describes what he saw: "The anxiety of the people, high and low, was very great. Whenever two or three were together, their talk was of Burns, and of him alone. They spoke of his history, of his person, and of his works; of his witty sayings and sarcastic replies, and of his too early fate, with much enthusiasm, and sometimes with deep feeling. All that he had done, and all that they had hoped he would accomplish, were talked of. Half a dozen of them stopped Dr. Maxwell in the street, and said, 'How is Burns, sir?' He shook his head, saying, 'He cannot be worse,' and passed on to be subjected to similar inquiries farther up the way. I heard one of a group inquire, with much simplicity, 'Who do you think will be our poet now?'"

On the 21st of July, 1796, the sufferings of this great but ill-fated genius were terminated, and a life was closed in which virtue and passion had been at perpetual variance. His remains were consigned to the earth with the solemnities of a public funeral, which was rendered remarkably imposing by the voluntary attendance of a vast multitude of persons of all ranks from every part of the surrounding country.

Much has been said on the disgrace reflected on persons of power and affluence for having allowed Burns to die in so humble a condition and in poverty. But these observations, it has been very sensibly pointed out by Sir Harris Nicolas, though springing from a just admiration of the bard, are not strictly just, and being liable to create expectations in future writers that cannot, from the nature of things in this country, be realized, are likely to tend to disappointment and discontent.

The only patronage to which an author can safely direct his hopes is that of the public, shown by their applause and by the demand for his works. In this patronage Burns shared largely; and it would seem, from the preface to the first edition of his poems, that to it alonedid he aspire; for he proudly says "he found poetry its own reward." Few writers have been more honoured by their contemporaries; and the profits arising from the sale of his works, considering their extent and the slight remuneration then given for literary labour, were very considerable. If he had chosen, he might have received payment for his other productions; and had he devoted the hours spent in the tavern to his pen, his income would have been still further increased.

The only other sources of patronage are private benevolence and public employment. The former Burns would, it is certain, have treated with contempt, for it is not likely that he would have condescended to be the pensioner of any man; and with regard to the latter, to which some of his biographers more particularly allude, it must be asked, Was he at the time when he was brought into notice, from his habits of life and fondness for the society of persons of his own class, suited for a much higher office than that which his intimate friends, who must have known his character best, suggested, and with which he often expressed himself perfectly content? Though the author of unrivalled poems, there is no proof of his fitness for a higher official appointment when he first came to Edinburgh; and after that period, his irregular life and imprudent conduct render it unlikely that he should have been patronized by a government alive to the slightest appearance of disaffection in its servants.

Of the person and manners of Burns, the best description will be conveyed by the description of those in whose society he moved. Professor Walker, who met him on his first visit to Edinburgh, says: "His person, though strong and well-knit, and much superior to what might be expected in a ploughman, was still rather coarse in its outline. His stature, from want of setting up, appeared to be only of the middle size, but was rather above it. His motions were firm and decided; and though without any pretensions to grace, were at the same time so free from clownish constraint as to show that he had not always been confined to the society of his profession. His countenance was not of that elegant cast which is most frequent among the upper ranks, but it was manly and intelligent, and marked by a thoughtful gravity, which shaded at times into sternness. In his large dark eyes the most striking index of his genius resided. They were full of mind, and would have been singularly expressive under the management of one who could employ it with more art for the purpose of expression."

THE LITERARY POSITION AND CHARACTER OF BURNS.

The history of literature scarcely affords another instance of a popularity either so sudden or so complete as that obtained by the poetry of Burns. Even in his own lifetime, and indeed almost immediately after his genius first burst into public notice, his name and his poems were familiar to all ranks of his countrymen. Nor did the enthusiasm for his poetry die away with the generation among whom it was first kindled. His works are still everywhere a cottage-book in his own land, and they are read wherever the English language is understood.

No poetry was ever better fitted to obtain extensive popularity than that of Burns. It had little of either grandeur or richness of imagination, qualities that demand much cultivation of mind as well as a somewhat rare endowment of the poetic temperament for their appreciation and enjoyment. It is all heart and passion, and every human bosom capable of feeling strongly must be stirred by its fire and tenderness. The themes which Burns has chosen are all of the kind which come home to the natural feelings of men, and his mode of treating them is the most simple and direct. In what he has written, in his native dialect at least, there is nowhere anything of mere rhetorical ornament or display. The expression is throughout, as truly as that of any poetry ever was, the spontaneous utterance of the thought or sentiment, which falls into measured words as if it and they were struck out together by the same creative act. In his lyrical pieces especially, the passion, and the language, and the melody, which is "married" to the "immortal verse," seem to come all in one gush from the full fountain of the heart. In this exquisite truth of style no writer in any language has surpassed Burns. But, with all his nature, he is, like every great writer, also a great artist, nature being the inspiration of his art. Nothing can be more masterly—more demonstrative both of high skill and of general elevation of mind—than the manner in which he triumphs over the disadvantages of a dialect so much vulgarized as that of Scotland had come to be at the time when he wrote. Familiar as his subjects generally are, and bold and expressive as his diction constantly is, we will venture to say that there is not one instance of real vulgarity in all that he has written. Of mere license and indecorum there is certainly no want in some of his productions; but even in his broadest humour, in his most unpardonable violations of moral propriety, in the rudest riot of his merriment and satire, there is never anything that is mean or grovelling, anything that offends our sense of what is noble and elevated. Some of the most immoral of his pieces are distinguished by a studied propriety of expression springing from the finest taste and most delicate sensibility to the beautiful.

There can be little question about the justice of Lockhart's remark: "The Cotter's Saturday Night is of all Burns's pieces the one whose exclusion from the collection would be most injurious, if not to the genius of the poet, at least to the character of the man. In spite of many feeble lines, and some heavy stanzas, it appears to me that even his genius would suffer more in estimation by being contemplated in the absence of this poem, than of any other single poem he has left us." It is this poem which has most endeared the name of Burns to the more thoughtful and earnest of his countrymen. The strange, not to say painful, fact has been pointed out, that this poem, in which the simple and manly piety of his country is so finely touched, and the image of his own religious father so beautifully portrayed should have come from the same hand which wrote nearly at the same time The Jolly Beggars, The Ordination, and The Holy Fair.

As examples of songs in which he has given "their ultimate and consummate expression to fundamental human emotions," we may mention such pieces as the following: "Oh, wert thou in the cauld blast," "Of a' the airts the wind can blaw," "Ye flowery banks o' bonnie Doon," "Go fetch to me a pint o' wine," and that other which expresses so blithely, yet pathetically, the calm depth of long-wedded and happy love, "John Anderson, my Joe."

As an expression of the comic humour of courtship, what is equal to "Duncan Gray cam here to woo"? For personal independence and sturdiness, if somewhat self-asserting manhood, we have "A man's a man for a' that." For patriotic heroism there is "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled." The contented spirit finds a voice in the song we have already quoted, "Contented wi' little and cantie wi' mair;" and old friendship never had a representative song of anything like the power of "Should auld acquaintance be forgot?"

"The poet," to quote Professor Nichol, "passed away in darkness, but his name will never disappear from our literature. He stands before us as a feature of Nature; and the fact that he cannot be moved from the hearts of his countrymen, that they recognise and respect a man who has refused to mutilate human nature, and who at once celebrates and strives to harmonise its ethereal and Christian elements, marks a gulf still fixed between Scotland and the Spain with which Mr. Buckle has associated it. 'The generous verse of Burns,' says Dr. Craik, 'springs out of the iron-bound Calvinism of the land, like flowing water from Horeb's rock.'

Burns, according to Professor Wilson, is by far the greatest poet that ever sprung from the bosom of the people, and lived and died in an humble condition. No country in the world but Scotland could have produced such a man; and he will for ever be regarded as the glorious representative of the genius of his country. He was born a poet, if ever man was, and to his native genius alone is owing the perpetuity of his fame. For he manifestly had never very deeply studied poetry as an art, nor reasoned much about its principles, nor looked abroad with the wide ken of intellect for objects and subjects on which to pour out his inspiration.

The condition of the peasantry of Scotland, the happiest, perhaps, that Providence ever allowed to the children of labour, was not surveyed and speculated upon by him as the field of poetry, but as the field of his own existence; and he chronicled the events that passed there not merely as food for his imagination as a poet, but as food for his heart as a man. Hence, when inspired to compose poetry, poetry came gushing up from the well of his human affections, and he had nothing more to do than to pour it, like streams irrigating a meadow in many a cheerful tide over the drooping flowers and fading verdure of life. Imbued with vivid perceptions, warm feelings, and strong passions, he sent his own existence into that of all things, animate and inanimate, around him; and not an occurrence in hamlet, village, or town affecting in any way the happiness of the human heart, but roused as keen an interest in the soul of Burns, and as genial a sympathy, as if it had immediately concerned himself and his own individual welfare.

Whatever, therefore, be the faults or defects of the poetry of Burns—and no doubt it has many—it has, beyond all that was ever written, this greatest of all merits, intense life-pervading and life-breathing truth.

THE SHAKSPEARE FAMILY.

ELIZABETH had been Queen of England for five and a half years, and the clear light of the dawn of a new intellectual and political era was breaking over her realm, when, on the 26th April, 1564, an infant of a few days old was carried into the stately parish church of Stratford-on-Avon, Warwickshire, to receive the rite of baptism according to the ritual of the reformed Church of England, re-established, not without some conflict and cruel retaliation, by the famous maiden Queen. That infant received the name of William; and his father was John Shakspeare, a thriving burgess of the Avonside town, who owned and farmed land, dealt in country produce, and sold stout gloves made of dressed skins, in the small low-browed shop, the lower room—scarcely more, indeed, than the expansion of the family kitchen—of a mean-looking but strongly-built house, with massive timber beams, in Henley Street. In the little upper room lay, waiting the return of the father and gossips, with her three days old baby, the mother, Mary Shakspeare. She had been married nearly seven years: two girl babies had passed away in infancy, and her home, so carefully provided and furnished by the prudent husband, had been childless, except for those brief gleams of life, until on the 23rd of April the sweet little Willie came to make mother and father, house and town, England itself, famous with an undying fame.

More than ordinary anxiety, no doubt, visited the heart of Mary Shakspeare, and tempered the "joy that a man child was born into the world." The terrible plague, which only a few months before had, helped by famine, swept away twenty thousand persons in London, had spread into the midland counties, and in Stratford (where more than two hundred died of the disease) and other Warwickshire towns there were the tears of mourners and the troublings of fear. Can it be doubted that Mrs. Shakspeare listened eagerly for the footsteps of the returning party in the street and on the narrow stairway, and clasped to her bosom with an intense joy her bright-eyed baby?

There were at the time several Shakspeares living in Stratford and the adjacent villages, whether related or not to the John Shakspeare of Henley Street we cannot say. One was a shoemaker, and had a large family, and some too zealous modern searcher of the parish register discovered entries of the christening of his many children, and credited the Henley Street couple with the parentage of nearly a score of lively boys and girls. How the various Shakspeares spelt the name is unknown. Probably they did not spell it at all. The poet's father, who seems to have been the most substantial of those who bore the name, used a mark as a signature. The town-clerk, when he had occasion to write the name, spelled it Shaxpere; and the poet's own signatures, of which three or four remain, leave the orthography a vexed question, so difficult is it by any analytical process known to experts to separate the autograph into distinct letters. So it appears, according to the fancy of editors, as Shakspeare, Shakespere, and Shaxpere; the first being the form more generally adopted. The name is still met with in various parts of the county, especially at Coventry, Henley-in-Arden, Kenilworth, Leamington, and Stratford; the persons who claim it belonging almost exclusively to the trading and working classes. The name Shakeshaft—evidently derived from the other—also appears in the Warwickshire Directory.

Of the history of the family nothing certain is known, but the name is almost a warrant of knightly descent. The yeomen and peasants who followed the feudal lords to battle, and fought in France or in the civil wars at home, were armed with bills and bows; nobles and knights only could "shake the spear;" and probably the surname was bestowed on some "doer of doughty deeds," of whose family a junior branch settled down in Warwickshire, content to own or rent, and cultivate by his own labour, a few acres of land. The first of the name of whom we have any record was John Shakspeare, who, in 1550, at Snitterfield, near Stratford, was a tenant of Robert Arden, a yeoman farmer of Wilmeccote, in the adjacent parish of Aston-Cantlowe. We can hardly be wrong in supposing that the John Shakspeare whom we meet with in Henley Street was the son of this Snitterfield farmer, for it is known that his brother Henry lived and died in that village, and perhaps inherited the little property, John trying to make his way in the world at Stratford—looked on, we may suppose, as quite a large town—by combining farming and trading. Assuming that to be the case, we find that young John Shakspeare made love to Mary Arden, the daughter of his father's landlord, and so prospered in his wooing that in 1557 the marriage took place, the bridegroom being a fine young fellow about twenty-six years old, and his wife three or four years younger. Mary's father had died about a year before, leaving six daughters, four of whom were married. The two who were at the time single, Mary and Alicia, were appointed executors of Robert Arden's will; and the former brought to her husband, as a marriage portion, a small sum of money and a property known as Asbyes, in the parish of Aston-Cantlowe, consisting of a dwelling-house, fifty acres of arable land, six acres of meadow and pasture, with right of common; and, in addition, an interest in some property at Snitterfield.

The young couple, then, began married life under favourable circumstances. For their station, they might, indeed, be considered wealthy. John Shakspeare, young as he was, had been for at least five years a householder, for there is a record that he was fined, in 1552, for having a dung-heap in front of his residence in Henley Street—a circumstance which shows that the town authorities tried to enforce some wholesome regulation. The year before his marriage, his name appeared in the town records as suing and being sued before the bailiff, John Burbage—a name to be remembered, as it may throw light on some incidents in the career of William Shakspeare. The record, still preserved, describes him as “a glover.” In the same year—probably in anticipation of his union with Mary Arden—he acquired two tenements, with appurtenances—one of them, in Henley Street, being described as being almost as good as freehold. He must have been regarded already as a man of substance and good repute, for in that year (1556) he became a member of the corporation of Stratford, which, according to a charter dated only three years earlier, consisted of fourteen aldermen and fourteen burgesses. He was also appointed to the office of ale-taster, with power to visit breweries and ale-houses and test the quality of the liquor supplied to the thirsty souls of Stratford. The duties of this office were perhaps not very congenial to the prudent, industrious glover; at any rate, he was fined for not performing them diligently. That occurred in the year of his marriage; and we may be excused for suggesting that, if it was before the wedding, he preferred visits of courting, and strolls about the country lanes with Mary Arden—or, if after marriage, the comforts of domestic life—to the inspection of alcovats and altercations with hosts and drawers. Of course, having undertaken the duty he should have performed it diligently, but much may be excused to a young man head over ears in love.

THE ARDEN FAMILY.

Mary Shakspeare was a descendant of a junior branch of one of the oldest families of Warwickshire, the Ardens, from whom the extensive woodland district in the northern, western, and midland parts of the county, the Forest of Arden, took its name; or it may be that the family took its name from the forest. Robert Arden of Willmccote, the father of Mary, was probably the grandson of Robert Arden, who was Groom-of-the-Chamber to Henry VII. His uncle, Sir John Arden, also held an office at the Court of the same monarch, and his brother, Walter Arden, married a daughter of John Hampden, of Buckinghamshire. There is thus a link—we admit, a very slight one—between two famous names. Sir William Dugdale, the historian, herald, and antiquary, who, in 1656, published the “Antiquities of Warwickshire,” traces the pedigree of the Ardens to the time of Edward the Confessor; and a modern writer of authority, Professor

Ward, in his “History of English Dramatic Literature,” says there seems no doubt that Mary Shakspeare’s father, Robert Arden, “was a lineal descendant of the ancient family of that name, which traced its descent to ‘Ælwyn, vice-Comes of Warwickshire, under his uncle Leofric,’ in the time of Edward the Confessor, and through him it seems farther traceable to Guy of Warwick, with a possible female descent from Alfred the Great.” Here are more links, “long drawn out,” indeed, by which we may in fancy connect the poet who “was not for an age, but for all time,” with Godiva of Coventry, the great Earl Guy of Warwick, and the greater Alfred. Certainly womanly beauty and tenderness, chivalrous achievement and large-hearted wisdom may, in imagination at least, be fitly associated with him who was incomparably the best delineator of those qualities.

If Mary Shakspeare knew anything of this,—and probably she did, for family traditions are carefully treasured in old country families, and if some of the facts are lost in the lapse of time, legend is always ready to supply the deficiency,—no doubt she took a pride in knowing that she was a scion of a goodly stock, related to the wealthy and influential Roman Catholic family who held up their heads proudly in another part of the county. One of Mary’s cousins was appointed to the high office of Sheriff of Warwickshire in 1568.

The mother of William Shakspeare was, then, in the estimation of Warwickshire folk, a lady by descent and association, although her father was described in a legal document as agricola, or farmer, and her husband sold gloves at Stratford and looked after cows and sheep in the meadows at Snitterfield and on the Asbyes farm in Aston-Cantlowe. Neither she nor her husband could write; perhaps they could read a little, but that is very uncertain. It is not probable that there was a book of any kind in the Henley Street house. By the law newly-passed, all persons, unless they could make some lawful excuse, were compelled to attend the parish church once every Sunday, under the penalty of a fine; and the Shakspeares, as respectable and law-abiding folks of position in the town, no doubt punctually took their seats in the large church. The head of the house probably looked upon regular church attendance as a duty which, as a burges, and therefore an example to his fellow-townsmen, he was bound to perform; and most likely his wife understood little about doctrinal differences, and was happy enough sitting by her husband’s side, listening to the Protestant service, although the traditions of her family were connected with the Roman Catholic Church, for which it was natural she should feel an affection and respect. On the Shakspeare side, too, there were associations with the great historic church. In the reign of Henry VII., the prioress of Wraxall monastery, eight miles from Stratford, was Isabella Shakspeare. The nuns of the monastery held, according to an official return made in the reign of Henry VIII., large possessions in the Arden district; and in that circumstance was a connection of family names which would, with the other considerations, tend to increase the respect of the Shakspeare family for the institutions, at least, of the Catholic Church. It is a noticeable fact, that the poet, who nowhere gives evidence of particular attachment to any doctrinal or ecclesiastical forms, invariably exhibits an almost affectionate respect for priests and nuns, who appear in his dramas as wise, holy, and devoted advisers and doers of kindly and charitable works.

One of the perplexing questions connected with Shakspeare is, how could he have acquired such an extensive knowledge of the Scriptures as he evidently possessed? Bishop Wordsworth has published a volume, "Shakspeare's Knowledge and Use of the Bible," in which he shows how intimately acquainted the poet was with the language and incidents of the Old and New Testaments.

The versions then in use were those by Parker, called also the Bishops' Bible, of 1568, required to be read in churches; or various reprints of the Geneva Bible of 1560, with short marginal notes, and much used in private families (a translation due, in fact, to John Knox, while resident abroad). Cranmer's translation was also used by some Protestants, but was not so likely to be known to Shakspeare as the others, to one of which he probably had access in school. Bishop Wordsworth shows how some of the grammatical peculiarities of these versions, especially in connection with the articles and pronouns, are reproduced by Shakspeare. The authorized version of the Bible now in use was not published until 1611, after the appearance of nearly all the plays of Shakspeare; and Bishop Wordsworth does not hesitate to say, "While the contents and general language of the Bible would be known to our poet from translations previously in use, in regard to particular words and modes of speech it is probable that our translators of 1611 owed as much, or more, to Shakspeare than he owed to them." "Shakspeare," says the Bishop, "has not received the credit which I think I shall be able to prove that he deserves, of having been, in a more than ordinary degree, a diligent and a devout reader of the Word of God."

Something he may have learned at the Grammar School, but in all likelihood he learned a great deal more by means of the enforced regular attendance at the services of the church. His mind was too eager and inquisitive, and the poetic faculty too instinctive, to permit him to be an uninterested listener to the reading of the historical incidents and magnificent poetry of the Bible, although he might have been careless as to the spiritual or moral lessons taught; and his vigorous memory would retain a vast amount of what he heard.

The year after William's birth, his father was elected alderman; and, three years later, was appointed high bailiff of the town, and, by virtue of that office, justice of the peace. In the following year he attained the position of head alderman, and we may suppose there was scarcely a more important personage in Stratford than the Henley Street glover. His family cares increased with his prosperity, sons and daughters filling the small house. One daughter, Anne, died when eight years old. It is just possible that she was named after Anne Hathaway, afterwards the wife of William, and, when John Shakspeare's daughter was christened, a girl thirteen or fourteen years old. The Hathaways and Shakspeares were old friends, for in the year of the poet's birth his father's name appeared in a legal document as security for Richard Hathaway. Gilbert, Joan, Richard, and Edmund followed in quick succession, making eight children born to John and Mary Shakspeare, four sons and four daughters; only one of the latter, however, Joan, surviving the age of childhood.

In 1570, John Shakspeare rented a meadow known as Ingow, of fourteen acres, at a rent implying there was a good house on it, and in 1575, when William was eleven years old, bought two houses with gardens and orchards in Henley-street, for £40. It has been suggested that one of these houses is that one shown as "the birth-place of Shakspeare,"—an unwarranted claim if his father only occupied it after the date mentioned. It is possible, however, that the family may have lived in the house before the freehold was purchased; and local tradition stoutly maintains that there William was born. We have seen, besides, that one of the houses he became possessed of the year before his marriage was described as "almost as good" as freehold; and it is quite possible that, as his means increased, he made it "quite as good," by purchasing the property he may have previously held on a very advantageous lease.

The vivacity and natural gifts of his eldest son must have been apparent even in childhood; and his father and mother seem to have desired that he should have the best education at their command. Chief Alderman John Shakspeare no doubt wished that he could affix something better than a mark to documents requiring his signature, and was not willing that his clever little boy should grow up as ignorant as he himself was. There was in the town a Grammar School, established as a free school by Thomas Jolyffe, about a hundred years before, and remodelled by a charter granted by Edward VI., who ordered it to be named the King's Free School. It adjoined the old chapel of the Guild, and the low part of the building was the Guildhall, where the worshipful aldermen and burgesses assembled to transact business, the schoolroom being on the floor above, and reached by an external flight of steps. The chapel and school-buildings still exist, very little altered by the lapse of time, except by the removal of the staircase a few years since. In this school William seems to have remained for seven or eight years, and to have acquired a fair knowledge of the rudiments of classical learning; for Latin was undoubtedly the principal subject of instruction in Grammar Schools, and it is quite possible that he made there some slight acquaintance, by means of extracted passages, with the Latin writers, and with the biographies of Greek and Roman heroes, which afforded him such abundant material afterwards. When he first entered the school, the head-master was Walter Roche, succeeded in 1577 by Thomas Hunt, who wielded the ferule for three years, and then, becoming curate of Luddington, gave way to Thomas Jenkins. Whether any of these worthy schoolmasters suggested the Holofernes of Love's Labour Lost, we may leave to conjecture; but critics have discovered an allusion to one of them in the phrase in Twelfth Night, "A pedant that keeps school i' the church"—it being a fact that for a brief time, when the room was under repair, the school was held in the Guild Chapel.

Nearly opposite the school was the newest and most handsome mansion in the town, familiarly known as the "great house," but more strictly New Place, built by Sir Hugh Clopton, who in 1491 was Lord Mayor of London. This house appears to have attracted the attention in no common degree of the schoolboy, who regarded it with the same sort of vague and ambitious hope which Charles Dickens, as a boy, felt when he passed the big house at Gad's Hill. Each lived to make the coveted house his own, and each died in the place the desire to possess which stimulated him to exertion and prudence.

School teaching, however, contributed but little to the real education of Shakspeare. He had quick eyes, an exquisite instinctive perception of character, a marvellous memory, and that indefinable sympathy with humanity under all aspects which no other poet or dramatist, certainly no philosopher or historian, has ever equalled. His mind was like a camera, perpetually receiving images from the external world to be developed into pictures when the time came. He went to school—not, we may well believe, like the boy described by himself, "creeping like snail unwillingly," but willingly enough, getting through his lessons cheerfully, and no doubt the leader in all games and frolics. At any rate, if there was any boy in the school capable of outshining William Shakspeare, he ought to have made a great mark on the world.

In his early boyhood he was possibly present at some of the performances by companies of actors who visited the town and enacted plays in presence of the high bailiff, aldermen, and burgesses, and were paid by the town treasurer. These companies were attached to the households of great noblemen, and styled themselves "the Earl of Leicester's servants," "the Earl of Worcester's servants," and so forth; but were permitted to accept what in these days we might speak of as "private engagements." They travelled from town to town, and are probably fairly sketched in the player troop in Hamlet. It appears that the first actors who visited Stratford were the Earl of Leicester's servants, the chief among them, and manager, being Richard Burbage, or perhaps, as Mr. Howard Staunton supposes, James Burbage, father of Richard; and that the first performance was given in 1568, when John Shakspeare was chief alderman. William Shakspeare was then only four years old, but as the plays were acted in the daytime and in the open air, it is quite possible he may have witnessed them. Nine or ten subsequent visits to the town are recorded, and young Shakspeare would have been less than himself if he had not contrived to witness at least some of the performances. The actors of the Earl of Leicester's company were, it would seem, possessed of more than ordinary ability, and were in good repute; for, in 1574, they received a patent under the great seal, and were afterwards known as the Lord Chamberlain's servants, famous in our dramatic history. We have noticed that the name of the high bailiff of Stratford who preceded John Shakspeare in that office, was Burbage, and there is a possibility that Richard (or James) Burbage, the actor and manager of the company, was his relative, it might be a son, or nephew; and in that case there might have been a friendship between the two families of Burbage and Shakspeare, which would clear away some obscurity respecting William's early association in London with Richard Burbage the actor. We know that we are dealing considerably in "might have beens," but authentic information is so scarce that we are compelled to follow the advice given by Shakspeare himself to those who witnessed his historical dramas—"entertain conjecture of a time," and "piece out our imperfections with our thoughts."

We may make a tolerably sure guess as to the nature of the plays performed at Stratford by Burbage and his fellows. Very likely the description by Polonius of the strolling troop who visited Elsinore would be applicable to the players who made their bows to the worshipful John Shakspeare and the aldermen and burgesses of the good town of Stratford—"The best actors in the world, either for tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, (tragical-historical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral), scene individable, or poem unlimited. Seneca cannot be too heavy, nor Plautus too light." There may have been old folks in Stratford who had seen "miracle plays" at Coventry on the feast of Corpus Christi, and enjoyed the strange association of Scriptural personages with outrageous buffoonery and coarseness, "the fight between Noah and his wife," after the fashion of the later Punch and Judy, and the wild pranks of the Vice. A recent writer noticing the republication of some of these miracle plays, says: "The language of most of these plays is very rude, and often disgustingly coarse; the most sacred and divine persons are frequently made to speak in a manner that would now be considered unbecoming even in Billingsgate, though no doubt the language was regarded by those who heard it as perfectly proper and appropriate."

If, however, the old townsmen who thronged around the stage when Burbage and the others played, expected to witness any productions of that kind, they were no doubt disappointed. A new dramatic literature was growing into shape, and the Stratford "player-folk" were among its earliest and best exponents. One of our best popular historians remarks: "Between the date of Shakspeare's birth and majority we find notes of acted plays that range through every variety of 'moral' and 'miracle' plays,—plays of English and ancient history; mythological, romantic, and what may be called fantastic subjects. Blank verse, prose, rhyme, extemporised dialogue, dumb show, and to a certain extent spectacle, were interchanged and combined with every degree of extravagance and simplicity."

It is not likely that the Burbage company revisited Stratford after they had settled at the Blackfriars theatre and obtained a patent entitling them to be styled the Lord Chamberlain's servants; but by that time William Shakspeare was twelve years old, and had no doubt seen so much of the Stratford performances, that a very strong impression was produced on his precocious and plastic mind. We are justified in remembering that we are not estimating the effect which such early experience might have had on the mind of a boy of average intelligence; but with the effect on a mind of phenomenal power which ripened early, and to which ordinary standards cannot fairly be applied.

There were, besides, as we have said, other dramatic companies, known as the "servants" of eminent noblemen, including performers of talent; and it is quite probable that they too visited Stratford, and afforded the townsfolk the opportunity of witnessing many performances after the time of Burbage.

But these occasional play-actings, great as their influence must have been, were far from being the exclusive preparation of young Shakspeare for his future career. Warwick Castle, one of the finest baronial residences in England, is only nine miles from Stratford, and Kenilworth, then the superb residence of the magnificent Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, only thirteen miles. This nobleman, already popularly credited with being the chosen lover of Elizabeth, held almost regal state at Kenilworth, when residing there. His elder brother, Ambrose Dudley, had been created Earl of Warwick in 1561, and was so popular in the locality that the county people generally spoke of him as the "good Earl." Attached to each of these stately households was a retinue of men-at-arms, pages, and serving-men. The flower of the splendid nobility of the Elizabethan age, gallant knights, cultured and beautiful women, visited there, and pageants were presented, splendid to a degree which, in our more prosaic age, we can scarcely appreciate. Along the highway from the south which passed through Stratford to Warwick and Kenilworth, rode brilliantly-appointed horsemen, with troops of retainers; the wayside taverns resounded with the boisterous laughter and not unfrequently with the too ready quarrelling of the men-at-arms and rough bragging soldiery, among whom might have been found Nym, Pistol, and Bardolph, "full of strange oaths and bearded like the pard." When there were revels at the great castles, a motley group of hangers-on, Autolycus-like pedlars, and others, would collect at village ale-houses, singing that "a quart of ale is a dish for a king," or "jog on the footpath way," with the "merry heart that goes all the day," while the "sad tires in a milc-a." Mopsa and Dorcas, Phoebe and Audrey, comely wenches, clustered by the wayside and curtsied to the ladies who, beaming with smiles of graceful courtesy, rode by.

Is it likely that nobles and ladies, gay servitors, stalwart rough-bearded soldiers, fussy officials, and picturesque country folk, passed through the streets of Stratford unnoticed by the little son of John Shakspeare, who had an eye for everything, a ready wit to note peculiarities, an irrepressible sense of humour, and a wonderful sympathy with brilliant show and gallant bearing? Is it likely that an active boy, accustomed to country life, with all its exercises and sports, would have thought it a great feat to run a few miles, even across fields and over hedges, much more along a broad high-road, when there was anything remarkable to be seen? We may well suppose, too, that his father, local great man as he was, would not permit himself to be too obscure on public occasions; and as he was presumably a kind father, and very proud of his handsome, intelligent eldest son, he took him, it may be, with him when anything stirring was going forward. William was eight years old when (1572) Queen Elizabeth visited Sir Thomas Lucy, at Charlecote; and as the Corporation of Stratford was put to some small charges "for the Queen's provision," the head alderman, John Shakspeare, would most likely assist at her reception, and take care that his family had a good view of Her Majesty.

The Queen had been on a visit to Warwick, where extraordinary preparations had been made for her reception, and of course the excitement in the locality was great. On the 12th August she dined with Mr. Edward Fysher, at Ichington, one of the houses belonging to the Earl of Leicester, about two miles from the town. Sir William Dugdale gives a minute account of her reception at the Ford Mill, at the entrance to Warwick. Immense crowds had collected; people from the adjacent towns and villages swelling the throng. If Stratford was not well represented it was strange indeed; for nine miles of high-road is not generally an alarming distance to country people on a summer's day, especially if a queen is to be seen; and it is almost a certainty that many of the townsfolk, including some of the bigger boys from the Grammar School, saw the show, and brought back glowing accounts of it.

The Queen apparently liked Warwick and Ambrose Dudley well, but liked Kenilworth and Robert Dudley better. Having stayed two days with the Earl of Warwick, she went for five days to Kenilworth, where she was entertained with "such princely sports as could be devised." On the Sunday, having returned to Warwick, "it pleased her to have the country people resorting to see her [from Stratford, of course, among other places] dance in the court of the castle, Her Majesty beholding them out of her chamber window, which thing, as it pleased well the country people, so it seemed Her Majesty was much delighted and made very merry." On the following day, Elizabeth, "taking that pleasure in the sport she had at Kenilworth, would thither again," and she remained there till the following Saturday, and thence went on to Charlecote, the owner of which, Sir Thomas Lucy, memorable in Shakspearean annals, calling, it would appear, on the Stratford Corporation to help him to defray the expense of the royal entertainment.

Here was matter enough for talk at Stratford and the places round about—public receptions, brave revellings, princely sports, dances by country folk in the presence of the handsome and gracious Queen—for Elizabeth was then under forty, and at that time handsome, and at all times frank and gracious in public—who so especially honoured the two powerful brother Earls, the great men of the locality. John Shakspeare, well-to-do farmer and glover, burgess, and head alderman, felt that he had borne some creditable part in the business; and perhaps Mary Shakspeare, whose ancestors, the Ardens, had held offices at court, looked forward to a possible future, when her lively, clever, frolicsome boy Willie, her "handsomest, sweetest young prince," might be restored to the rank of gentility, and hold up his head with the best of them. Fond mothers like to indulge in speculations of this kind; and clever sons listen to them with considerable satisfaction. The desire to possess armorial bearings, gratified, but not without difficulty, at a later date, perhaps had its origin in talk of this kind.

In 1575 Queen Elizabeth made that famous visit to Kenilworth which furnished Scott with material for some of the most telling chapters of his novel. Shakspeare was then eleven years of age, and not at all likely to have kept indoors when there were such brave doings only a dozen miles away, and gallant shows all along the road.

The purchase of the two houses in Henley Street appears to have marked the turning-point in John Shakspeare's career. His corporation honours and the expenses incurred to keep up the dignity of office had apparently impoverished him. He neglected his duties, and in 1577 was fined for irregular attendance as alderman. A year later he was unable to furnish his quota of expense for pikemen and billmen to serve as soldiers if wanted. In 1579 he should have contributed something towards purchase of armour and weapons; but the town accounts show an entry against his name in respect of the sum, "unpaid and unaccounted for." In the same year the corporation paid a portion of the expense of the funeral of his daughter Anne. Then came the sale of the Snitterfield property, part of his wife's marriage portion. Another part, the estate at Asbyes, was mortgaged for £40 to Edmund Lambert, of Barton-on-the-Heath, her brother-in-law. So hard pressed, indeed, were the family for money, that they owed Roger Sadler, the baker, £5; and, a year after the mortgage mentioned, Lambert and another became security for the amount. About this time, the youngest of the family was born, and named Edmund, perhaps in compliment to his uncle, with whom it was advisable to keep on good terms. The second wife of Robert Arden of Wilmecote, Mrs. Mary Arden, was still alive, and after her death further property would come to Mary Shakspeare; but the reversionary interest was sold for £40, and that sum was offered to Edmund Lambert in redemption of the mortgage. He refused to accept it in that sense unless other sums due to him were paid at the same time, and retained the property, notwithstanding his relationship; affording another instance of the fact that those of kin are sometimes "less than kind." In after years William Shakspeare instituted a Chancery suit to recover the estate, but the result is unrecorded.

Straitened in circumstances as John Shakspeare now was, it was necessary that his eldest son, sixteen years old, should do something for the support of the family. In the ordinary course he would have left school by that time, unless intended for the clerical or other learned profession, with a probability of being able to study at one of the Universities. No such career appeared open to the son of the impecunious Stratford tradesman; and, indeed, there is no evidence that William desired it.

He set to work at such employment as the country town offered. There is a vague tradition that he acted as schoolmaster. Malone thought he might have been clerk to a local lawyer—the only ground for the supposition being his familiarity with legal phraseology; but, if similar tests were applied in other directions he might have been a soldier, sailor, surgeon, divine, or have belonged to almost any profession, or followed any calling, so versed was he in the technical and familiar language of all. An old parish clerk of Stratford, who, however, was only three years old when Shakspeare died, was accustomed to tell visitors to the poet's grave that he was apprenticed to a butcher; and John Aubrey, the antiquary, writing nearly eighty years after Shakspeare had been laid in the chancel, asserted, "His father was a butcher, and I have been told heretofore by some of his neighbours that when he was a boy he exercised his father's trade; but when he killed a calf, he would do it in a high style, and make a speech." John Shakspeare certainly was not a butcher, in the ordinary sense of the word; but probably he bred and killed calves, oxen, and pigs too, for the use of his family; and it is very likely indeed that his son, a well grown active lad, helped in all kinds of work in the little homestead, especially as poverty had shown its face, and all the family would be called on to do something. There was little idling among boys and girls in those days, even among country folk more prosperous than the Shakspeares could pretend to be.

Local traditions respecting those who have made themselves famous in after life are generally very untrustworthy; for there is a prevalent disposition to father on them all kinds of exploits. If literary eminence is attained, the poet must have been the author of every silly couplet or doggerel verse familiar to the garrulous folk of his native place. The local hero who becomes famous for adventure, equally, of course, is credited with every wild exploit which can be remembered, exaggerated or invented. Similarly when, as generally is the case in small communities, there is a prominent "bad character," he is blamed for all the hen-roost robberies and poaching exploits perpetrated by more obscure delinquents. Eminent wits are quoted as the author of countless jokes, epigrams, and bon-mots which they never heard of; and Shakspeare, sharing the common fate, has had attributed to him doggerel and drunken verses, which a dozen other Stratford men were quite capable of producing, and much more likely to produce.

Whatever his work may have been—and we may well suppose it was of an ordinary kind—it was no doubt done well; he was too healthy, cheerful, active, and bright to do anything in a slovenly fashion. He soon added to it another occupation, for which he had an especial aptitude—making love; and he appears to have made it in all sincerity. The name of Anne Hathaway is almost as well-known as his own. She lived, as we know, at Shottery, a little rural place near Stratford, on the Alcester road, reached by way of meadows and a rustic bridge across a rustic brook. She was seven years older than her lover; but then he was only about seventeen when he went courting, though manly for his age, and she, in her twenty-fourth year, was only a very pretty girl; so disparity in years was not much thought of. It is a very noticeable fact, considering how eagerly every scrap of information relative to the poet's youthful days has been sought for, and how ready local tradition is to furnish something to meet the demand, that nothing whatever has been forthcoming connecting Shakspeare's love-making with any other girl than Anne Hathaway, of Shottery. The "passionate pilgrim" was constant in his love. Anne was his Juliet, and there was no antecedent or rival Rosalind. Had he been a "wild gallant," there is little doubt that we should have heard something more or less authentic of his love adventures. Poetry was possibly warmed into life by love, and the "bright particular star" of Shottery was the inspiration of the first efforts of the muse destined to be so great. The old cottage where she dwelt, with many brothers and sisters, is to this day a place of pilgrimage, and is very little altered in appearance by the lapse of three centuries.

Richard Hathaway was a farmer and sheep-owner, in comfortable circumstances. He died early in 1582, and left his large family under the guardianship of his eldest son Bartholomew, charging him to be a support to his mother and a comfort to his brothers and sisters. His will was apparently drawn by Fulks Sandells and John Richardson, and both these names appear to a document binding the persons named in fifty pounds as securities to the Bishop of Worcester against any liabilities he might incur by licensing the marriage of William Shakspeare and Anne Hathaway with one asking of the banns of matrimony. The date of this bond, still preserved at Worcester, is November 28th, 1582.

Where the marriage ceremony took place is not known. No trace of it is found in the Stratford register; and it may have been, as Malone suggested, that the wedding took place at Ludington, a little riverside village, about three miles from Stratford. The only ground for the supposition, and it is very slight, is that one of Shakspeare's schoolmasters, Thomas Hunt, was curate there. The church was destroyed by fire, and the register consumed, so that no information is attainable. It would be very interesting to know the place and date of the ceremony, because very much has been made of the fact that the first child, Susanna, was baptized on the 26th May, 1583, and was born therefore less than six months after the date of the marriage bond. It is possible of course that the lovers had been indiscreet, but if so, the young man hastened to make what reparation he could; and it is possible also, as has been apologetically suggested, that a formal betrothal, with the recognition of friends, was morally regarded as really equivalent to a formal marriage. But it is also possible that, by some accidental irregularity, the banns had only been once published, instead of three times, and that, after the marriage, fearing that it might be considered invalid, or that, at any rate, difficulties might arise, the friends of the young couple might have persuaded the bishop to license it, binding themselves to hold him harmless should the question arise and any expenses be incurred.

To what sort of a home William Shakspeare, aged eighteen, took his bride, we cannot say. His father was growing poorer and poorer. Two of the Henley Street houses, probably those purchased the year before his marriage with Mary Arden, were disposed of, and the family were no doubt greatly pinched. The young wife's brother Bartholomew helped her, we may suppose, in conformity with their father's dying injunction; and William Shakspeare's own avocations, whatever they may have been, were not likely to be neglected now that new responsibilities were upon him. At the end of January 1585, his wife presented him with twins, a boy and girl, baptized, on the 2nd February, as Hamnet and Judith. Three children, and very little to keep them on! The old home breaking up, and his father, once the chief man of the little town, poverty-stricken and litigious, suing and being sued for petty sums. William himself, with his great heart and marvellous powers, of which he could scarcely be unconscious, "cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd" in a little Warwickshire town of some 1,500 inhabitants, very few of whom could write their names or pick out the alphabet from a horn-book.

At length came the last straw which might have broken a camel's back, but which started on his grand career a high-mettled steed. In January 1586, a distraint was made on the goods of John Shakspeare, but the bailiff's men found, according to the town record, "that the said John Shakspeare has nothing on which the distraint can be executed." The furniture which the once prosperous burgess had collected to make his home comfortable, had disappeared bit by bit, to provide for the needs of the family, including, we can suppose, the three little children of his son William. Writ after writ was issued for the arrest of the wretched man, who seems to have been in hiding; and at last the aldermen, who had acted with forbearance and kindness, struck his name off the corporation's roll, because "he doth not come to the halls when he is warned, nor hath done of a long time." A few weeks afterwards he was a prisoner for debt.

At the age of twenty-one, only just legally arrived at man's estate, but a husband and the father of three children, William Shakspeare bade good-bye to Stratford, intent on seeking his fortune in London. Perhaps the good Bartholomew Hathaway "comforted" his wife and her little ones, and received them in the old cottage where she had passed her childhood. All is speculation regarding this matter, and this act of Shakspeare's life-drama terminates with a picture of him riding to London, thinking of what he had left behind, and of the unknown land of promise to which he was going. In the fiftieth of his Sonnets, he perhaps hints at this journey:—

"The beast that bears me, tired with my woe, Plods daily on, to bear that weight in me."

THE DEER-STEALING STORY.

We are now brought face-to-face with a tradition which, more than any other connected with Shakspeare, has been accepted as authentic. Aubrey, the earliest writer who attempted a biography of the poet, knew nothing about it. Rowe, who wrote about a hundred years after the supposed event, and who, with Davis, Oldys, and other collectors of anecdotes, accepted with great readiness local gossip, tells us:—

"Shakspeare had by a misfortune common enough to young fellows, fallen into ill-company, and amongst them some that made a frequent practice of deer-stealing. He engaged with them more than once in robbing a park that belonged to Sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlecote, near Stratford.

For this he was prosecuted by that gentleman, as he thought somewhat too severely, and in order to revenge that ill-usage, he made a ballad upon him. And though this, probably the first essay of his poetry, be lost, yet it is said to have been so very bitter, that it redoubled the persecution against him to that degree, that he was obliged to leave his business and family in Warwickshire for some time and shelter himself in London."

William Oldys, learned and inquisitive, but the drunken hack of a bookseller, of about the same date, not only confirmed the story, but professed to have discovered the first stanza of the scurrilous verses, of which Rowe, who had made eager search, could discover no trace. Oldys apparently met with an "old inhabitant," who was kind enough to have a good memory. There is a coarse play on the name Lucy which we need not repeat, but which we must admit Shakspeare himself indulged in, in The Merry Wives of Windsor (the comedy, however, had been published nearly a hundred years when Oldys discovered the lines). We think that Shakspeare, even in his most careless mood, would have written something smarter than these:—

"A Parliamento member, a justice of peace,
At home a poor scarecrow, at London an ass.

* * * * *
He thinks himself greater,
Yet an ass in his state,

We allow by his ears but with asses to mate."

We have already adduced very good reasons why Shakspeare left Stratford; and there were other reasons of which Rowe and Oldys appear to have known nothing, why Shakspeare should have disliked Sir Thomas Lucy of Charlecote.

In tracing the connection of Mary Shakspeare with the old family of the Ardens, we mentioned that they were Roman Catholics, and that Isabella Shakspeare, an aunt or great-aunt of the poet, was an abbess, and noticed the great respect he always exhibited for the old church, probably from family influences. It need not be supposed that he felt the slightest sympathy with the plot against the life of Queen Elizabeth originated by Catholic emissaries; but it doubtless pained him greatly that his mother's relatives should suffer punishment, and it is quite likely he thought they were rather martyrs for their adherence to their religious faith than active conspirators. They were ardent Roman Catholics who would not conform. A priest, disguised as a gardener, was attached to their household. The Ardens were charged with being concerned in some of the conspiracies which preceded that for which Babington suffered, and in 1583—a year after Shakspeare's marriage—the head of the family, Edward Arden, of Park Hall, was hanged at Tyburn, and his son-in-law, John Somerville, strangled himself in the prison-cell, to avoid the horrible tortures inflicted on those convicted of high treason. Their heads were set up on London Bridge, and a few years afterwards Shakspeare must often have looked on the blackened skulls when he crossed the river to Bankside. There must have been a latent but powerful dislike, on the part of the members of that Stratford household, towards the violent ultra-Protestants who took an active part in the persecution of the Catholics; and few were more active or merciless than Sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlecote, who, two years after the execution of Edward Arden, and a few months only before William Shakspeare left Stratford, rose in his place in Parliament and proposed that "some new law should be devised for Parry's execution"—Parry was a Roman Catholic who had been convicted of high treason—"such as might be thought fittest for his extraordinary and horrible treason." As if hanging and quartering and disembowelling were not horrible enough! It was scarcely likely that the Shakspeares would like their rich neighbour Sir Thomas Lucy over-much, and his popularity would scarcely be increased by the fact that he was one of the Commissioners appointed to inquire about the "Jesuits, seminary priests, and recusants in Warwickshire," the Parliament having ordered all such to leave the realm within forty days, or suffer as traitors, and those who harboured them were to be hanged as felons.

SHAKSPEARE IN LONDON.

It may be fairly supposed that the young Stratford man did not venture to London without some definite prospect of employment. His instinct would naturally point towards literature as a pursuit, and the drama as a possible opening. It seems to be an indisputable fact that he made his way at once to the theatre at Blackfriars; but it is not at all necessary to accept the story that he at first earned a miserable living by holding the horses of the Court gallants who visited the theatre, and that so well was he known, that the boys who afterwards performed similar offices, were known as "Shakspeare's boys." It is more likely that he introduced himself to James Burbage, who is mentioned as "the first builder of playhouses," and who had a few years previously purchased a house at Blackfriars, "at extreme rates, and made it into a playhouse with great charge and trouble." This theatre nearly occupied the site of the present Apothecaries' Hall, behind the Ludgate Hill railway-station, and within a few yards of the printing-office of the Times; and the short thoroughfare adjoining still bears the name Playhouse Yard. It may be observed that the theatre was within the limits of the old Sanctuary, and so exempt from interference from the Corporation of London, who prohibited stage plays in their domain.

At first Burbage leased the house to a man named Evans, who produced plays acted by "Her Majesty's Children of the Chapel." These youthful actors must have been heavily taxed, for we have records of the performance by "Her Majesty's Children and the Children of St. Paul's" of such long plays as Lilly's Campaspe. It is not surprising, therefore, that "the boys were daily wearing out," and, in consequence, Burbage purchased the lease from Evans, and formed a regular company of grown-up actors. A subordinate place in this company appears to have been occupied by Shakspeare; but it was not long before the manager perceived his talents, and employed him to prepare for performance, by re-arranging and partly re-writing, dramas not otherwise adapted for effective representation.

The vigorous Elizabethan drama sprang into existence with amazing rapidity. The miracle plays and moralities, as they were called, had been superseded. Between 1560 and 1580, forty-six regular tragedies and comedies are known to have been enacted, none of which are now extant, besides those which have been preserved. In some instances, the open yards of large inns, such as the Belle Savage, at Ludgate, were converted into temporary theatres; but generally the plays were performed in the halls of the Inns of Court, the Sovereign's palace, and the residences of the nobility. The Blackfriars Theatre was roofed in, and so were the Whitefriars and the Curtain, at Shoreditch, opened a few years afterwards; but the Bankside theatres, the Rose, Hope, Swan, Paris Garden (originally a place for baiting bears), and the large Globe, built in 1593, were open to the sky. Altogether there were about a dozen theatres open at one time or other in the eighteen years of Shakspeare's London life.

About the time that Shakspeare joined the Blackfriars company, or within two or three years afterwards, several dramatic authors attained considerable reputation. Among them was George Peele, a Devonshire man of good family and Master of Arts of Oxford. When twenty years old he came to London, and led a sadly wild life. He died miserably from the effects of drunkenness and dissipation.

Another writer, Robert Greene, contributed to the stage. He was born at Norwich, and was Shakspeare's senior by three or four years. According to his own account, he had taken the M.A. degrees at both the great universities, and was certainly possessed of learning and superior abilities. He took orders, and was for a short time a vicar in Essex, but soon came to London, and "after leading one of the maddest lives on record, died a miserable death in September, 1592, his last illness being caused by a surfeit of Rhenish wine and pickled herrings." He would have died in the streets, but a poor cobbler and his wife, at Dowgate, gave him a shelter.

Far greater than either of these was Christopher Marlowe, of "the mighty line," who came to London, and it is thought appeared as an actor, shortly after Shakspeare had established himself at Blackfriars. As a dramatic poet, he unquestionably holds the second place in the Elizabethan annals; and in Faustus there are passages of power and beauty which Shakspeare himself could scarcely have surpassed. His Troublesome Reign and Lamentable Death of King Edward the Second, of England, may almost take rank with the historical plays of his great contemporary, and perhaps suggested them. His Jew of Malta was the origin of Shakspeare's Merchant of Venice, but is savage and sombre, unrelieved with the delightful gaiety and tenderness and the human sympathy infused by the master mind. A tavern brawl ended the life of this great but misguided genius.

Shakspeare, while affecting no puritanical austerity, and witnessing, perhaps sharing in, some of the revels in which these unhappy men passed the greater portion of their lives, was too prudent to damage his reputation and endanger his prospects in life by injurious excesses. That he was familiar with the wild life of his time, the Eastcheap tavern scenes in Henry the Fourth attest; and we need not suppose that the Hostess, and Doll, and the drawers, not to speak of the great Sir John himself, were entirely evolved from the inner consciousness of the poet. Some faint resemblance to them may have been found among the surroundings of Peele, Greene, and Marlowe. But William Shakspeare lived in the main temperately, and worked hard, transmuting the rude ore accumulated by others into fine gold, writing original plays, and acting in those parts known to the modern stage as "utility" business. The order in which his dramas were produced cannot be exactly settled; but we may safely place The Two Gentlemen of Verona (in which are the germs of several of the characters and incidents of later plays) and Love's Labour Lost among the earlier productions.

His growing success, his unimpeached character, and the brilliancy of his genius, the dawn of which was clearly enough perceptible, excited the malicious envy of some of his dissolute contemporaries. A few days before Robert Greene died so wretchedly in the little room over the cobbler's stall, he wrote a spiteful attack on Marlowe and Shakspeare, in a pamphlet entitled, "Groat's Worth of Wit Bought with a Million of Repentance." "There is," he said, "an upstart crow, beautified with our feathers, that, with his tiger's heart wrapped in a player's hide, supposes he is well able to bombast out a blank verse with the best of you; and being an absolute Johannes Factotum, is in his own conceit, the only Shake-scene in a country." The quibble on the name would in itself be sufficient to indicate the reference, but the parody of a line in Henry the Sixth, then recently produced, "O tiger's heart wrapped in a woman's hide," fixes it beyond doubt.

Shakspeare felt this attack keenly, and supposed it to have been the work of a small dramatist named Chettle, whose handwriting had been identified in the manuscript sent to the printer. Chettle replied, explaining that he had only transcribed it, Greene's writing being, perhaps from weakness, almost unreadable. He argues how unlikely it is he should have attacked Shakspeare, for "I myself have seen his demeanour, no less civil than excellent in the quality he possesses. Besides, divers of worship have reputed his uprightness of dealing, which argues his honesty, and his facetious grace in writing that approves his art."

Friends enough surrounded the poet, and were eulogistic enough to compensate for the spite of Greene or other enviers. Henry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, William Herbert, afterwards Earl of Pembroke, and many of the wealthiest, most brilliant of the Court gallants, among them Walter Raleigh, frequented the theatre and were on terms of intimacy with the author and the actors. In 1593, Shakspeare published his Venus and Adonis, dedicated to the Earl of Southampton. He speaks of it as "the first heir of his invention," from which we may conclude it had been written some years earlier. It was very successful, and ran through four editions in the poet's lifetime. In the next year appeared the Rape of Lucrece, also very successful, passing through four editions. It has been stated, and there appears no reason to doubt the fact, that the Earl of Southampton made a present of a large sum of money (some say as much as a thousand pounds) to the author of Venus and Adonis, who was by that means enabled to purchase a share in the new Globe Theatre. That the friendship existing between Shakspeare and the two young noblemen, Southampton and Herbert, was of the most intimate character is one of the best known facts in the poet's history; and by their aid, perhaps, he obtained access to good libraries. His reading must have been extensive. Early British legends, mediæval histories, the works of Holinshed and other chroniclers, Italian romances, classic biographies, Montaigne and other French writers, the "Gesta Romanorum" and "Decameron," and other collections of pathetic and humorous stories, seem to have been among his favourite books; and if the innumerable allusions scattered broadcast throughout his plays are any evidence, he appears to have been equally well versed in philosophical, religious, speculative, political, and professional literature.

THE SONNETS.

We now approach the most perplexing problem connected with the life of Shakspeare. The "Sonnets," a hundred and fifty-four in number, were not printed till 1609, after Shakspeare had returned to Stratford, but they were evidently written in the early years of his residence in London. They were published apparently without the author's knowledge or sanction, and with a dedication printed in so enigmatical a manner that even now English, French, German, and American critics are disputing as to its meaning. They made very little sensation when published. Shakspeare himself was either ignorant of, or quite indifferent to, the fact, and Alleyn the actor, founder of Dulwich College, has left a record that he purchased a copy for fivepence! Some of the Sonnets had circulated in manuscript among the poet's friends, and are spoken of by the Rev. Francis Meeres as the "sugared sonnets." Many of them are addressed to a young man—critics almost unanimously suppose to William Herbert—and the praises of his personal beauty are so fulsome as to be, unless they have some secondary meaning, almost nauseous. Then there are references to a rival poet (perhaps Marlowe), and to some woman of wonderful beauty and dark complexion, who had interfered between him and his friend. Interspersed are bitter self-accusations, expressive of weariness of life, reminiscences apparently of early happiness long passed away, and flashes of proud consciousness of the immortality of his poetry. Altogether there is such a revelation of the workings of a passionate nature, such an admixture of lofty imagination and perception of beauty with discontent, jealousy, and remorse; such terrible hints and self-accusations, that the reader marvels that so tempestuous a nature could have been veiled by the calm, cheerful exterior which ordinarily Shakspeare presents to the world. Some writers regard the Sonnets as mere literary exercises, no more to be taken as representatives of the poet's individuality than are the characters of Hamlet or Othello. Others suggest that the Sonnets were written to order, and supplied at different times to various persons who were rich enough to pay, but not clever enough to write poetry for themselves. It is true hack writers of the time were willing to sell their pens, but we cannot believe Shakspeare was one of them, and there are too many obvious allusions to himself to permit the suggestion to be accepted. Mr. Gerald Massey finds in the Sonnets a dramatic character, and divides them into two series. In the first the author, in his own character, addresses the young Earl of Southampton, advising him to marry; while other of the Sonnets are written in the character of the Earl, and addressed to his mistress, Elizabeth Vernon; and some are supposed to be expressive of that lady's jealousy of Lady Rich. The second series, Mr. Massey tells us, are written in the character of the young Earl of Pembroke, expressing his love for Lady Rich. All this is very fanciful, but fails to be convincing. Another investigator divides the Sonnets into separate poems, believing the first to illustrate the Platonic love of beauty in the abstract, which the highest poetical minds have experienced, and to be addressed to the young Herbert, whose personal beauty was remarkable.

We cannot, within our limits, attempt to test minutely these theories; but we cannot understand the Sonnets as having other than a personal origin, and as unveiling the secrets of a powerful and passionate nature. The abstract love of beauty, and the insistence that it should be perpetuated for the good of the world, was a favourite idea of Shakspeare's, and is allied to the motives which have inspired great sculptors and artists of all ages. Romeo says of his first love, Rosaline,

"O, she is rich in beauty! only poor
That when she dies, with beauty dies her store.
Beauty, starved with her severity,
Cuts beauty off from all posterity."

And Viola, in the character of her lord's envoy, says to the fair Olivia,

"You are the cruellest she alive
If you will lead these graces to the grave,
And leave the world no copy."

These passages run parallel with the first lines of the first Sonnet—

"From fairest creatures we desire increase,
That thereby beauty's rose might never die."

The love of beauty was as settled a principle in the mind of Shakspeare as in that of Keats, who wrote, "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever." We cannot resist the impression that the subjective element is as powerful in these Sonnets as the objective; and that when urging his youthful friend to bequeath his beauty to the world, there is an appeal to his own genius, of the possession of which he was conscious, to produce some work worthy of itself. He feels keenly while professing to despise, the obloquy to which he is exposed. He is "in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes." (XXIX.) With a daring appropriation of the most sacred words, he says,

"I am that I am; and they that level
At my abuses reckon up their own." (CXII.)

He feels "the impression which vulgar scandal stamped upon my brain." (CXII.) He is sadly conscious of his secret faults: "What wretched errors hath my heart committed." (CXIX.) He wails "my dear time's waste" (XXX.), and feels a degradation even in the exercise of the profession he has adopted.

"I have gone here and there
And made myself a motley to the view." (CX.)

"Thence comes it that my name receives a brand,
And almost thence my nature is subdued,
To what it works in, like a dyer's hand." (CXI.)

There is the cry, "Vanity, all is vanity," the crushing sense of the supremacy of evil, which Solomon uttered, in Sonnet LXVI. The desponding heart of Shakspeare was conscious of

"Purest faith unhappily forsworn,
And gilded honour shamefully misplaced . . .
And right perfection wrongfully disgraced . . .
And simple truth miscalled simplicity,
And captive good attending captain ill;"

and, "Tired with all these, for restful death I cry." (Was this line ringing in the ears of that ardent genius Keats when despondingly he wrote, "I have been half in love with careless death"?)

Yet, in all this sadness of heart, this moody discontent, there was the consciousness of his own power, and that he had contributed something which the world would treasure—

"Not marble nor the gilded monuments
Of princes shall outlive this powerful rhyme" (LV.)

Quite as remarkable is the passage (XVIII.) in which he says to the object of his verse:—

"Nor shall Death brag thou wand'rest in his shade,
When in eternal lines to time thou growest:
So long as men can breathe, or eyes can see,
So long lives this, and this gives life to thee."

What secret history underlies the Sonnets the world knows not, and never will know. It is buried in the poet's grave; but there is a suggestive hint—

"Two loves I have of comfort and despair,
Which like two spirits do suggest me still;
The better angel is a man right fair,
The worser spirit a woman coloured ill." (CXIV.)

It would seem that Shakspeare, at the time when most of these powerful but mysterious Sonnets were written, was passing through that strange experience which so many men of highly-sensitive natures and great mental powers have endured, marked by despondency, morbid intensity, disappointment, weariness of life itself; a time of conflict, exaggeration, and despair. Solomon experienced it, so have nearly all great natures since his time. It is the "melancholy" of the old writers; the struggle between the Two Voices of Tennyson. It has driven men into monasteries; wrestled with and subdued, it has made saints, philosophers, and heroes. John Stuart Mill has pathetically described the despondency and weakness of intellect and will which for a time he felt. Many never conquered it; but passed through life discontented, disappointed, cynical, and railing at gods and men. The greatest have wrestled, and, Jacob-like, discovered an angel in their opponent. Of these was Shakspeare.

From this moody chaos emerged a noble manhood. He worked hard and cheerfully, realized prosperity, and enjoyed life temperately and frankly. He had been twelve years in London when he met with Ben Jonson, who was ten years younger than himself, and who in later days wrote the noblest of all the eulogiums of Shakspeare, whom, he says, "I loved on the side of idolatry." The taverns then frequented by gallants and wits enabled the best men of the time to meet and enjoy one another's society; and it is not necessary to suppose that intemperance or licentiousness was an inevitable adjunct. There took place the "wit combats" between Shakspeare and Jonson, which Fuller describes; and as nobody would describe Samuel Johnson, Joshua Reynolds, David Garrick, and Edmund Burke as toppers, because they met at the Literary Club, so we need not imagine that at the merry meetings of the Elizabethan time the brilliant men who gathered together went beyond "the limits of becoming mirth."

VISITS TO STRATFORD.

Tradition asserts, and it appears with authority, that Shakspeare made yearly visits to Stratford; and it is confirmed by the story of the regular calls at Davenant's inn at Oxford, which gave rise to a scandal which even William Davenant, the cavalier poet, countenanced, although it attacked his mother's reputation. These yearly visits certainly do not sanction the presumption that he neglected his wife and family. On the contrary, there is reason to suppose that he provided for their support. His father's difficulties would seem to have increased; for in 1592 his name appears on a return made to Sir Thomas Lucy of recusants "and others," who absented themselves from church, an absence accounted for as probably owing to fear of arrest for debt. A year or two afterwards his name appears in the town records as a party to petty actions.

William's youngest brother, Edmund, is known to have gone to London and adopted the stage as his profession. There is a record of his burial at St. Saviour's, Southwark, in 1607. In 1596, in pursuance of his cherished aim, William Shakspeare obtained, not without great difficulty and after three years' demur of the heralds, a coat of arms, as a gentleman, for his father, then an impoverished old man, on the ground of his marriage with a descendant of the Ardens of Henley. The shield shows a spear, and is quartered with the Arden arms. The profession he had adopted prevented Shakspeare himself from becoming an armiger, or gentleman from the heralds' point of view, but if the dignity were granted to his father, he as eldest son would inherit it, and so his object would be attained. Two years before he had purchased the fine house of the Cloptons, on which he had set his boyish heart. He repaired and enlarged it, and most probably his wife and two daughters—his son Hamnet had died a year before—took up their residence there. In the same year he assisted his father to recover the Asbyes estate, Mary Shakspeare's dower.

In London his reputation surpassed that of any of his contemporaries, and his prudence enabled him to secure a handsome competence. The order of the production of his plays is not likely to be accurately ascertained; and the tests applied by examination of metrical peculiarities and general style are at the best unsatisfactory; but it is tolerably certain that during his residence in London he produced all his historical plays, except Henry the Eighth, The Two Gentlemen of Verona, The Comedy of Errors, Love's Labour Lost, Taming of the Shrew, Merchant of Venice, Much Ado About Nothing, As You Like It, The Merry Wives of Windsor, A Midsummer Night's Dream, Hamlet, Othello, Troilus and Cressida. He received the direct patronage of Queen Elizabeth, and, after her death, in 1603, of James I.,—he "did delight Eliza and our James." When James passed through London in procession, on the 15th March, 1604, Shakspeare took part in the pageant, heading the company of King's Players, and for his dress on that occasion was furnished with four-and-a-half yards of scarlet cloth. It is stated, too, that he was present, probably as an invited guest, at Hampton Court Palace on the 8th January in the same year, on the occasion of the production of Samuel Daniel's masque, The Vision of the Twelve Goddesses, the characters in which were supported by Lady Suffolk, Lady Rich (who appeared as Venus), Lady Bedford, Lady Hertford, Lady Derby, Lady Dorothy Hastings, Lady Nottingham, and other brilliant beauties of the Court.

By this time he was a shareholder in the Blackfriars and Globe theatres, owner of houses in Bishopsgate, and had added a house near New Place, and more than a hundred acres to his Stratford property; and very significant of his affection for his wife is an entry recording that he wished to purchase "some odd yard of land or other at Shottory." "Respect and memory, and troops of friends," an unrivalled reputation, and a considerable share of this world's goods, had been achieved in eighteen years of London work by the Stratford poet, who had wrestled so desperately with fate in the Sonnet time. Now, like his own Horatio, he was not "passion's slave," but one "whose blood and temper were so well commingled that he was not a pipe for Fortune's fingers to play what stop she please." He could, when he willed, reproduce the utterances of his old moods, as we may see in Hamlet (especially), O'hello, Timon of Athens and other of his plays. He could even pleasantly jest about them, as we find in little Prince Arthur's talk about the affected melancholy of the young gentlemen in France, and in the mingling of cynicism and humour in "the moody, melancholy Jaques."

RETURN TO STRATFORD.

In 1604 he left London for Stratford. His father having recently died, he was entitled to bear the arms and take the rank of a country gentleman. His two brothers who had remained at Stratford were dead, and only his sister Jona survived. His mother was probably dead, but we have no record of the fact. When he took up his abode in New Place, his daughter Susanna was twenty-one years old; his other daughter, Judith, was nineteen.

Soon after returning to Stratford we find him investing £440 (equivalent to a much larger sum now) in the purchase of the unexpired lease of tithes in Stratford, and in 1613 he purchased more property in London, especially a house in Blackfriars, near the Wardrobe, on St. Andrew's Hill, to which he made occasional visits. He by no means relinquished his literary pursuits, but must have worked nearly as hard as he did in London.

The Homeric legends had already attracted his attention, and Chaucer's version of the story of Cressida was probably the immediate origin of Troilus and Cressida, written shortly before he left London; and now, in his leisure, he turned to Roman history, as seen chiefly through the medium of Plutarch, and to early British history. From the study of the old chroniclers, Holinshed and others, came Macbeth, Lea, and Cymbeline; from Roman history, Julius Caesar, Coriolanus, and Antony and Cleopatra. The dates of the composition of the plays are uncertain, and much critical ingenuity has been displayed in endeavouring to fix them; but there is reason to believe that his last effort was one of the most beautiful, The Tempest; and that, in the full maturity of his powers, he laid down his pen as the magician Prospero laid down his magic wand. Henry VIII. is perhaps the next latest,—a reverting to English history suggested by the death of Queen Elizabeth. The only scrap of personal correspondence extant is a short letter to Shakspeare from Thomas Quiney, vintner and wine merchant of Stratford, asking for a loan of money. This Quiney afterwards married Judith Shakspeare. That marriage took place on the 10th of February, 1616; and on the 23rd of April, on his fifty-third birthday, Shakspeare had ceased to live. There is a well-known assertion, based on an entry in the diary of the Rev. Mr. Ward, vicar of Stratford, to the effect that Shakspeare died of a fever contracted after hard drinking at a "merry meeting with Drayton and Ben Jonson." As this entry was made about forty-four years after the poet's death, it is not of much authority.

He had made his will (still to be seen in London) on the 25th of January, about three weeks before Judith's marriage. New Place, its furniture, and the bulk of his property, he bequeathed to his daughter Susanna, who had married Dr. John Hall, a physician. His widow was entitled to dower, and was therefore provided for. The special legacy to her of the "second-best bed" was long considered as a mark of slight; but if we remember that in all good houses there was a "guest-chamber," in which the best bed and fittings were kept, only used on special occasions, we can well understand that the "second-best bed" was the one on which Shakspeare and his wife slept, and that the bequest had a special significance. To his daughter Judith he left £150, and £150 more if she or children of hers were living three years after the date of his will. There are several minor legacies, and the bequests to Susanna include the houses in Henley Street, "barns, stables, orchards, gardens, lands and hereditaments" in Warwickshire and London.

He was buried in the chancel of the beautiful parish church of Stratford-on-Avon, and his memorial is placed on the wall. A story is extant that a lady who had heard the funeral sermon preached by the vicar, remembered that he expressed regret that Shakspeare had not been bred a divine. His widow survived him more than seven years, dying in August 1623, and lies beside him in the chancel. His daughter Susanna Hall (died July 1649), and her husband (1635), and their son-in-law, John Nashe (1647), are also buried there. On the stone over the poet's grave are the lines (we modify the spelling), written by himself:—

"Good friend, for Jesu's sake, forbear
To dig the dust enclosed here;
Blest be the man that spares these stones,
And cursed be he that moves my bones."

After the death of her first husband, Nashe, Susanna Hall's daughter Elizabeth, the granddaughter of Shakspeare, married Sir John Barnard, of Abingdon, Berkshire. She had no children, and was the last of Shakspeare's lineal descendants. She sold New Place, and, it is supposed, destroyed any letters or other papers that might have been left by the poet. Some of his manuscripts were probably lost when the Globe Theatre was burnt down in 1613, during a performance of Shakspeare's Henry the Eighth.

THE GOLDSMITHS AT LISSOY.

OLIVER, the second son of the Reverend Charles Goldsmith, was born at Pallasmore, in the county of Longford, Ireland, on the 10th of November, 1728—not 1731, as erroneously recorded on the tablet to his memory in Westminster Abbey,—that famous epitaph which Johnson insisted on composing in Latin, in spite of the "round Robin" remonstrance handed in—with many misgivings, we may be sure,—by the chief members of the Literary Club; "Mund Burke" and the rest pleading that an English memorial would most appropriately keep alive the memory of an eminently English man of letters. A poor, a very poor parson was the Reverend Charles Goldsmith in 1728; but within two years, modest Church preferment came in the shape of promotion to the rectory of Kilkenny West, and an agreeable alteration of income from the forty pounds a year on which he could only have been "passing rich" in a highly metaphorical sense, to the comfortable stipend of two hundred, and a respectable house and farm at Lissoy, not far from Ballymahon, in Westmeath. Here was the home of Oliver Goldsmith's childhood and youth. Round Lissoy were entwined the warmest feelings of his gentle, affectionate heart;—to Lissoy his thoughts turned fondly and regretfully, alike in the dark days when, unknown and unfriended, he wrote for bread in his garret in that horrible Fleet Street slum, termed with unconscious irony Green Arbour Court, and in the times of feverish and uncertain prosperity when he numbered some of the best and worthiest in the land among his friends. To get back some days to Lissoy, there "among the swains to show his book-learned skill"—to rejoice in the admiration and wonder of those simple souls, as by the evening fire he "told of all he felt and all he saw," to find there a refuge from literary jealousies, carping critics, and social duns—especially the latter—was the dream of the poor heedless, harassed poet. Thus he writes in "The Traveller," the poem that first opened the eyes of the circle around him to the depths and heights of his genius:—

"In all my wanderings round this world of care,
In all my griefs—and God has given my share—
I still had hopes my latest hours to crown,
Amidst those humble bowers to lay me down.

* * * *

I still had hopes—for pride attends us still—
Amidst the swains to show my book-learn'd skill;
I still had hopes, my long vexations past,
Here to return—and die at home at last."

It was a natural, if not a very lofty aspiration; but was destined, like the majority of human hopes, to remain unfulfilled. For, after his first start in the race of life, Goldsmith never saw Lissoy again.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH AS A BOY.

That scourge of the last century, the smallpox, descended with terrible severity on the face of poor little Oliver, scarring and seaming it indelibly—it did worse, for it left wounds in his heart that rankled and festered at times, to his dying day. Then, too, the genius that was in the boy was entirely unsuspected by those around him. From good Elizabeth Delap, the trusty servant who taught him his letters, and whose pride in after days, at having been the first instructress of the famous Dr. Goldsmith, could not prevent her from frankly confessing that "he seemed impenetrably stupid," to the schoolfellows who "made fun" of him, all seem to have concurred in a low estimate of the boy's abilities. And yet there are recorded some words of his that indicate at least readiness of wit. "Why, Noll," said a notorious scapegrace of the family, "you are become a fright! When do you intend to get handsome again?" "I mean to get better, sir," retorted the insulted boy, "when you do."—"Our herald hath proclaimed this saying, See Æsop dancing, and his monkey playing," was his sarcastic reproof to the amateur musician who dubbed him "little Æsop" when he attempted to dance a hornpipe. But poor Goldsmith's deficiencies in the outward graces continued to be a cheap source of amusement, alike to his friends and foes, to the end of his life. Miss Reynolds, Sir Joshua's sister, when called on to give as a toast the ugliest man she knew, without a moment's hesitation gave Doctor Goldsmith; though, after reading "The Traveller," she had certainly the grace to declare that she should never think Dr. Goldsmith ugly again. The consciousness of this unfortunate ugliness, and the belief, continually strengthening in his over-sensitive mind, that those around him were secretly making merry over his defects, will explain much of the uneasy self-assertion that Boswell, Hawkins, and other detractors have set down as evidence of poor Goldie's ludicrous and insatiable vanity. He felt horribly awkward, at times, among the polished men of the world, the Topham Beauclerks and the Bennet Langtons, who would now be utterly forgotten but for their association with him and with his friend Johnson; and if he occasionally talked at random, and swaggered, and exhibited his ungainly little person in the silk and velvet clothes of tyrian bloom that were too fine for him, and too expensive, and for which, alas! he did not always pay, it was done chiefly to improve his position with those whose good opinion he valued, and was nervously anxious to gain.

For, to appreciate this man in his great qualities and his failings, his vast genius and his poor weaknesses, it must at once be understood that he was not of the oak, but of the willow—accustomed to be dominated by circumstances, rather than to mould them to his will; far too strongly swayed by the impulse of the moment, and ready to sacrifice the remote to the immediate ; anxious for the approbation of his fellows, even to the extent of longing for "the vulgar praise which fools impart ;" in his diffidence of his own powers, and his over-anxiety for applause, forgetful of the fact he himself has so well expressed in his "Traveller" :—

"For praise too dearly loved, or warmly sought, Enfeebles all internal strength of thought ;
And the weak soul, within itself unblest,
Leans for all pleasure on another's breast."

He was nervously anxious about the opinion of others, and painfully conscious of his own defects. He drew bills on the future, never thinking that they would certainly be presented at maturity. His kindly nature led him to relieve want wherever he found it. Even fictitious distress frequently imposed upon him, and was listened to and solaced to the detriment of just claims. "What a pity it is, Jarvis," says wise Sir William Honeywood, in "The Goodnatured Man," "that any man's goodwill to others should produce so much neglect of himself as to require correction." Yet we must touch his weakness with a delicate hand. There are some faults so nearly allied to excellence, that we can scarce weed out the vice without eradicating the virtue. To the author of "The Goodnatured Man," it might well have been said, "Mutato nomine, de te fabula narratur,"—for he was himself the "goodnatured man" whose generosity often prevented him from being just.

FAMILY FAILINGS AND EMBARRASMENTS.

A powerful tendency to act on the impulse of the moment seems to have been inherent in the Goldsmith family ; and a singular instance is found in a proceeding of the Reverend Charles Goldsmith, which for the gratification of a very false pride impoverished the whole family, and especially inflicted hardship on Oliver. Henry Goldsmith, the eldest son, after a very creditable college career, had become tutor to a Mr. Daniel Hodson, whose father was a gentleman of property. Master Daniel fell in love with his tutor's sister Catherine, and privately married her. The young man's father may probably have said some hard words on the subject of the breach of confidence involved in this clandestine marriage ; whereupon Charles Goldsmith executed a bond pledging himself to pay to Daniel Hodson four hundred pounds as a marriage portion for his daughter. The means of the whole family were thus crippled, that Mrs. Daniel Hodson might be put in a better position ; and the first to suffer was poor Oliver, to whom was announced that he must go to Dublin University, not like his brother Henry, as a pensioner, but as a sizar ; and accordingly, after an examination in which he came out last among eight candidates, he entered Trinity College, Dublin, on the 11th of June, 1745.

GOLDSMITH'S COLLEGE DAYS ; UNCLE CONTARINE.

That certain menial duties, hardly consistent with the position of youths intended to become scholars and gentlemen, were exacted from the sizars, in return for almost gratuitous commons, teaching, and chambers, cannot be denied. The worst part of the affair was, perhaps, the red cap, the compulsory badge that marked out the poor sizar as the recipient of charity. At a later period Goldsmith wrote bitter complaints of the humiliations to which the sizars were subjected ; but here, also, some traces of his over-sensitiveness are to be found. The college years, like any other period of life, will be passed more pleasantly by a rich than by a poor man ; and wealth will be worshipped and poverty despised by the vulgar-minded until the world shall have very greatly changed. After all, there was the college education, a solid, tangible benefit, a weapon of strength in the hands of a man who knew how to use it ; and the wiser part, under such circumstances, is to secure the permanent benefit, and to disregard the temporary inconveniences which surround its attainment. Nor was Goldsmith without a friend at this important period of his life. In the Reverend Mr. Contarine, the "Uncle Contarine" remembered to the last with real gratitude and affection by the heedless, lovable nephew whom he persistently strove to start in the world, Goldsmith had a helper whose bounty and patience seemed alike inexhaustible. When the lad's boyish pride revolted against an eleemosynary college career, it was Uncle Contarine who reminded him that he himself had been a sizar, "and that it had not availed to withhold from him the friendship of the great and good ;"—when the death of his father, about eighteen months after he entered college, left the poor student destitute, it was Uncle Contarine who supplied his wants ; and over and over again, when poor Oliver seemed obstinately bent on rendering abortive every plan for his advancement, it was Uncle Contarine who came forward to give him that one more chance that was to start him definitely in life.

The glimpses we have of his college life present him to us as very poor, and undergoing various hardships. His tutor, Mr. Theaker Wilder, more famous for knocking down hackney coachmen than for learning, and who, years afterwards, lost his life in a dissolute brawl, behaved to Goldsmith like the brute he was, sneering at him, browbeating, and occasionally striking him. In spite of Uncle Contarine's kindness, Oliver was often reduced to great straits to live. We hear of ballads written by him, and the copyrights sold for five shillings each. His name occurs in the list of those "admonished" for aiding and abetting in a college riot. He gets a small exhibition, worth thirty shillings, on the strength of which he gives a dancing party—it must have been an aristocratic "at home," that gathering in Oliver's room,—and Mr. Theaker Wilder bursts in, and scatters the guests to the four winds, and knocks down the unfortunate host. Burning with the sense of disgrace and insult, Oliver packed up his books next day, and ran from college with a vague intention of going to America,—but went to Lissoy instead, where his brother Henry came to him with conciliatory words; and he was induced to return to Dublin, a half-reconciliation being effected with Wilder. On the 27th of February, 1749, he obtained his B.A. degree—at the bottom of the list again; and having achieved in some sort the object of his residence in Dublin, bade adieu to the university.

And now, after his scholastic fatigues, the young graduate seems to have been determined to give himself a good long holiday. For a couple of years he lived chiefly with his mother, who had removed to Ballymahon. Sometimes he assisted his elder brother, Henry, in "teaching school" at Pallasmore; but his favourite haunt was a certain inn kept by one George Conway, where he established a club, with some associates and relatives, and lorded it like his own Tony Lumpkin at the "Three Pigeons." Whist-playing, anecdote-telling, and the singing of jolly songs, though sufficiently agreeable employments in themselves, with judicious alternation of field-sports in the season, and of flute-playing, are not the best preparation for the battle of life; and at length Goldsmith's friends began to look somewhat anxiously for some practical result of his university education.

YOUTHFUL INDISCRETIONS.

Never was there a learned graduate more difficult to settle. The Church, towards which, however, he did not feel himself very strongly impelled, was first thought of; but for some reason—tradition says he presented himself for ordination in breeches—the bishop to whom he applied rejected him. Uncle Contarine got him a tutorship in a family; he stayed long enough to earn thirty pounds, then quarrelled with the family, and came back to his mother. Thence he went off, well mounted, and with his thirty pounds in his pocket, bound for Cork, and thence for America. Six weeks afterwards he was back again at his mother's door, penniless, ragged, and mounted on a deplorable pony he named "Fiddleback." Of course he had a fine story to tell;—how he had paid for his passage, and taken his chest on board; and how then, during his absence on shore, the ship had sailed without him. "After having struggled so hard to come home to you, my dear mother," says the young scapegrace, "I wonder you are not more rejoiced to see me."

In some most amusing letters—for he was already an inimitable letter-writer—he appeals, in half-penitent, half-humorous fashion, to mollify Uncle Contarine as well as his mother. He was like "Tip" in Dickens's "Little Dorrit" in his talent for finding his way home again, after each dismal failure. In his lectures on the English humourists, Mr. Thackeray expresses a very strong and very shrewd opinion as to the truthfulness of these letters. He says that if Uncle Contarine and the good people at Lissoy believed those letters about the anonymous captain who sailed away with Oliver's valuable luggage, they were very simple folks, for it was a very simple rogue who was trying to cheat them.

As Oliver seemed not destined to make a position in the Church, the law was thought of as a profession for him. Mr. Forster tells us the story of this venture in very few words. "The good Mr. Contarine came forward with fifty pounds. It seems a small sum wherewith to travel to London, to defray the expenses of entrance at Inns of Court, and to live upon until a necessary number of terms are eaten. But with fifty pounds young Oliver started on a luckless journey. A Roscommon friend laid hold of him in Dublin, seduced him to play, and the fifty pounds he would have raised to a hundred he reduced to fifty pence. In bitter shame, after great physical suffering, he wrote to his uncle, confessed, and was forgiven."

MEDICAL STUDIES IN EDINBURGH, ETC.

By this time he seems to have wearied out his mother; and even his gentle brother Henry must have sometimes bitterly contrasted the school drudgery he himself went through, with the lettered ease of the impecunious but happy-go-lucky Oliver. It was Uncle Contarine who received the unlucky prodigal once more into his house; and in the autumn of 1752, Goldsmith, being then twenty-four years of age, began a new course of study at Edinburgh, again assisted by his uncle. He would be a medical man. Away with law and divinity! Physic was evidently the thing, for it was the newest toy.

Tradition has preserved some record of his course at Edinburgh,—how he became famous for his social qualities, his songs, and his anecdotes. Mr. Contarine is still his unwearied helper and friend; and if, as an ancient writer asserts, “it is a mark of a noble mind to be willing to owe more to one to whom you owe much,” Oliver certainly vindicates his claim to such nobility; for he continues, with effusive gratitude, to draw upon this jewel of an uncle for occasional supplies. Thus a couple of years glide by; and this singular student determines—not to make a start in life, at length, for himself, but to go in for a course at a third university—a foreign one this time—Leyden in Holland. The inexhaustible kindness of Uncle Contarine provides him with twenty pounds, and he starts for Holland; not unpursued by bailiffs, for he has “been security” for a fellow-student, and is probably not without debts of his own. At Leyden he maintained himself for a time, in Bohemian fashion—teaching, borrowing, and the play-table, all figuring in turn among his precarious means of support. At length, with a single guinea in his pocket, the clothes he wore, and his flute as a means of subsistence, he left Leyden, and started on the grand tour through Europe, in February 1755.

GOLDSMITH ON HIS TRAVELS.

In his essay on the “Present State of Polite Learning,” published some years afterwards, Goldsmith speaks of the travels of Holberg, the Danish author, whom he describes as wending on foot just as he himself did. “Without money, recommendations, or friends, he undertook to set out upon his travels, and make the tour of Europe on foot. . . . He travelled by day, and at night sang at the doors of peasants’ houses to get himself a lodging.”

Such, or nearly such, was Goldsmith’s tour. He must frequently have begged his way during that queer peregrination of his, that lasted about a year; and the hand-to-mouth manner of living he perforce pursued can at the best have been but a bad preparation for a settled career. But he saw much of life, and especially of the seamy side. In France he detected the muttering of the volcano on whose brink the privileged classes were dancing so complacently, as though oppression and endurance would last for ever.

“There is some taste of goodness in things evil, if men observantly distil it out,” said Shakespeare’s King Harry, environed by perils on the eve of the mighty struggle at Agincourt; and in the things evil that now surrounded Goldsmith—his poverty, his vagabond tendencies, and his habit, daily becoming more inveterate, of living for the day that was passing over his head—there were mingled certain advantages of which the effects appeared at a later time. He had, as he himself says, “a knack of hoping;” his queer mode of travelling enabled him to study the people—the toilers whose lives pass unnoticed and unchronicled, and whose honest and persistent advocate he afterwards became, to his own undying honour. “The slightest misfortunes of the great,” he afterwards wrote, “the most imaginary uneasiness of the rich, are aggravated with all the power of eloquence to engage attention; the poor weep unheeded, persecuted by every subordinate species of tyranny; and every law which gives others security, becomes an enemy to them.” Let any thoughtful reader take up that wonderful essay in the “Citizen of the World,” in which the story of the disabled soldier is chronicled. There he will see, set forth with that exquisite humour in which smiles and tears are so near each other, the hardships endured with unconscious but noble philosophy by thousands in Goldsmith’s time—hardships and wrongs the worst of which have disappeared in these better days of enlarged humanity and more generous feeling. Who can read unmoved that record of good-humoured, patient endurance so simply narrated by the old cripple with the wooden leg and the mutilated hand, who has fought valiantly for his country by land and sea, and who, beggared and mutilated as he is, can still shout—“Liberty, property, and old England for ever! Huzzay!” A strange chronicle of the evil “wrought by want of thought as well as want of heart,” is laid bare in that poor fellow’s experiences. The workhouse, where the pauper child is set to do felon’s labour; the game laws, that punish with seven years’ transportation the slayer of a hare; the pressgang, laying violent hands upon a “freeborn” Englishman, and dragging him off to the hardest of slavery; the wretched privateering system, that enriched merchants with plunder, while it left the unhappy crippled sailor to beg and starve,—all these things are set forth plainly and honestly by the writer, who saw “the seamy side” of life during his wanderings, and whose kind heart ever urged him to take the side of the poor and the oppressed, whose trials, temptations, and sufferings he did his best to alleviate. How, with his keen observations, he himself profited by this journey, was never known till the day, many years later, when he astonished the literary world by the publication of “The Traveller.”

BACK IN LONDON—MEDICINE AND TUITION.

In February, 1756, he was back again in London penniless, without employment, or any definite hope of obtaining it, and alone in that most dismal of lonelinesses, the solitude of a crowd. By this time his Irish friends had ceased to answer his letters. Uncle Contarine, sick of a disease that was hurrying him to the grave, could assist him no longer, and indeed the starving wanderer does not seem to have applied to him. To this part of his career belong experiences that he himself looked back upon with a shudder, and would hardly hint at; though on one occasion, in subsequent prosperous days, he startled a fashionable circle at polite Sir Joshua Reynolds's table by beginning a story with—"When I lived among the beggars in Axe Lane . . ." He "tramped" from Dover to London, and after desperate attempts to obtain employment of any kind, he was glad to pound drugs and run errands for a chemist in Monument Yard, though he had brought back from a foreign university, probably Louvain, the degree of Bachelor of Medicine. Soon afterwards, in a wofully shabby second-hand coat, whose chief patch he in vain tries to conceal by sedulously covering it with the hat he carries in his hand, he is trying to practise as a physician among the poorest inhabitants of Southwark. For a time he corrects the press for Samuel Richardson, the printer-author. He attempts—dismal resource of misery—to write a tragedy; and subsides, from dreams of poetic fame, into the dismal reality of the life of an usher at the school of Dr. Milner, at Peckham, in Surrey.

The reminiscences of Miss Milner, the Doctor's daughter, who survived those days for half a century, have furnished a view of him at this period of his life. He was very goodnatured and amiable; always ready to amuse the boys by playing on his flute, great at telling anecdotes, and always sure to spend his small salary the day he got it. "You had better, Mr. Goldsmith, let me take care of your money, as I do for some of the young gentlemen," said Mrs. Milner. "In truth, madam," he replied, "there is equal need."

Of course they played tricks upon him, and sneered at him, and made his dependent position bitter, in the full belief in their superiority over the poor drudge whose oddities they could laugh at, while no one among them suspected his genius. "I have been an usher at a boarding school myself," says one of his characters in the "Vicar of Wakefield," "and may I die by an anodyne neck-lace, but I would rather be under-turnkey in Newgate." And no doubt Goldsmith was drawing to some extent on his own experiences, when he continues: "The usher is generally the laughing-stock of the school. Every trick is played upon him; the oddity of his manner, his dress, or his language, is a fund of eternal ridicule; the master himself now and then cannot avoid joining in the laugh; and the poor wretch, eternally resenting this ill-usage, lives in a state of war with all the family. This is a very proper person, is it not, to give children a relish for learning! They must esteem learning very much, when they see its professors used with such ceremony."

COMMENCEMENT OF A LITERARY LIFE.

But one day a prosperous London bookseller, Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Ralph Griffiths, came to dine with the Milners at Peckham. This worthy was the proprietor of a London magazine, the Monthly Review; and his anxiety to obtain readable articles had been stimulated by the appearance of an opposition venture, the Critical Review, with no less a personage at the head of the literary staff than Tobias Smollett. Griffiths was struck by some remarks made by the uncouth, shabbily dressed usher; and having requested and obtained from him some specimens of criticism, offered him an engagement on the Monthly Review; and in April, 1757, Goldsmith was accordingly installed in a room at Griffiths's in Paternoster Row, under a year's engagement to write for the Monthly, in consideration of board, lodging, and an exceedingly moderate salary,

Only five months of the stipulated time had elapsed when the engagement came to an abrupt close. The employer complained that the drudge did not stick to his desk; the drudge retorted indignantly, denying the charge of laziness, and complaining in his turn that his work was continually and unfairly tampered with by Griffiths, and, worse still, by Mrs. Griffiths. It was a dismal apprenticeship, and we cannot wonder that the articles were broken. "The Critical is certainly not written," sneered Smollett, "by a parcel of obscure hirelings, under the restraint of a bookseller and his wife, who presume to revise, alter, and amend the articles. The principal writers in the Critical are unconnected with booksellers, unawed by old women, and independent of each other."

A garret near Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, was his refuge from the tyranny of the Griffithses, male and female; and very poor and needy, but still hopeful, he struggled on. His brother Charles suddenly appeared on the scene, attracted by a vague idea of assistance from the London author, who might procure him a start in life. "All in good time, my dear boy," says Oliver of the empty pocket, with persistent cheerfulness. "I shall be richer by-and-by. . . . Addison wrote his poem of 'The Campaign' in a garret in the Haymarket, three stories high; and, you see, I am not come to that yet, for I have only got to the second story." But Charles too plainly saw that starvation was the grim fellow-occupant of that dreary room; and he fled, even as far as Jamaica, not to return till thirty years afterwards, when Oliver had long been famous—and dead.

He could not yet knock a subsistence out of literature alone, and would have escaped only too gladly from the thralldom of the desk. Physic is thought of as a resource once more. "I suppose you desire to know my present situation," he writes to his prosperous brother-in-law, Hodson. "As there is nothing in it at which I should blush, or which mankind could censure, I see no reason for making it a secret. In short, by a very little practice as a physician, and a very little reputation as a poet, I make a shift to live." This was putting the best face on the matter; but a sorry shift it was, and drove him in a short time back to Dr. Milner and the usher's stool.

And now at last a transient gleam of light shone upon his dark path. Dr. Milner had some interest with an East India director; and through his influence Goldsmith was nominated as medical officer to one of the Company's settlements on the coast of Coromandel. Here was a chance of escape from literature and poverty; from the dreary life "in a garret, writing for bread and expecting to be dunned for a milk-score." He endeavoured to publish by subscription "An Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe," for money would be required for his outfit; and he wrote a series of letters to friends in Ireland, companions of the old Lissoy days, who now received his appeals, charmingly worded though they were, with the silence that gives—refusal. "Now see how I blot and blunder when I am asking a favour," he says at the end of one of these epistles to Mrs. Lauder, the married daughter of Uncle Contarine. To Mr. Hodson he puts the best face on his intended emigration to the East Indies, talks magniloquently of "the high interest which money bears—twenty per cent." in those regions, and estimates the private practice attached to the appointment "at not less than a thousand pounds a year;" and these advantages, to use his own words, "induce me to leave a place where I am every day gaining friends and esteem, and where I might enjoy all the conveniences of life."

All the conveniences of life, forsooth! He had removed by this time to another miserable lodging, in a ghastly square of tall houses, between the Old Bailey and Farringdon Street, approached by a steep ascent appropriately termed Breakneck Steps, and itself most imaginatively named "Green Arbour Court."

THE STRUGGLE TO ESCAPE FROM LITERATURE ABANDONED.

The gleam of sunshine quickly vanished. Whether because he could not get together the sum for his outfit, or because his qualifications for the post were doubted (as well they might be), the appointment was given to another. His next expedient was a desperate one, and shows him ready to escape from Green Arbour Court and hack-work at any cost. He obtained a decent suit of clothes, his old employer, Griffiths, who still gave him occasional work, becoming answerable to the tailor, "for a consideration" in the shape of critical articles to be written for the Monthly Review. Thus sorrowfully equipped in borrowed garments, Goldsmith presented himself on the 21st of December, 1758, at Surgeons' Hall, to pass his examination for the humble grade of "hospital mate." The book of the College of Surgeons for the date above mentioned tells the issue in few but sufficient words, amid the names of those who passed the ordeal on that occasion: "James Bernard, mate to an hospital; Oliver Goldsmith found not qualified for ditto." To this shipwreck had come the hopes of Indian fortune, and the private practice of "not less than a thousand a year," a miserable candidature for the lowest of medical employment, and a rejection, as unqualified. After this, there was no going back. Literature, taken up as a last resource, henceforth became the fate from which there was no escape. All endeavours in the direction of medicine had utterly failed. Even the unfortunate examination suit, pawned to rescue his landlady's husband from a debtor's prison, involved the unlucky would-be medico in a humiliating quarrel with Griffiths, who called him a sharper, and threatened him with a gaol. Thenceforth literature was to be the means of his daily livelihood; and through all his distresses there was still the love, hardly acknowledged to himself, that it might one day bring him reputation and fame.

The days of bitterness and poverty had, however, been productive of one benefit. The hope of escape from Green Arbour Court and its squalid surroundings had nerved the poor author to strenuous exertion; and the "Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning" was completed, and actually published, in April, 1759. It was a longer work than any he had yet produced, and the subject and treatment were likely to attract attention; and, more than this, Goldsmith had at last found his vocation, and after that miserable Surgeons' Hall failure made no further attempt to escape from literature.

THE BEGINNING OF BETTER DAYS.

How the compulsory apprenticeship had left its marks upon him, we learn from a letter to his brother Henry, the clergyman, to whom he opens his heart, discarding the thin veneer of cheerfulness with which he covered its wounds in writing to the prosperous Mr. Hodson. There is no disguise about these words of his :—

"I must confess it gives me some pain to think I am almost beginning the world at the age of thirty-one. Though I never had a day's sickness since I saw you, yet I am not that strong, active man you once knew me. You scarcely can conceive how much eight years of disappointment, anguish, and study have worn me down. If I remember right, you are seven or eight years older than I, yet I dare venture to say that if a stranger saw us both, he would pay me the honour of seniority. Imagine to yourself a pale, melancholy visage, with two great wrinkles between the eyebrows, with an eye disgustingly severe, and a big wig, and you may have a perfect picture of my present appearance. . . . I should actually be as unfit for the society of my friends at home, as I detest that which I am obliged to partake of here."

But Goldsmith was now becoming known. Learned Bishop Percy, the collector of the "Reliques of English Poetry," called upon him in the wretched Green Arbour Court lodging. "He was writing his 'Enquiry,'" says Percy, "in a miserable, dirty-looking room, in which there was but one chair; and when, from civility, he resigned it to me, he was himself obliged to sit on the window." When the "Enquiry" was published, by the Dodsleys of Pall Mall, it was found to contain many hard hits at critics and their doings; and especially did the author fall foul of the two reviews the Critical and the Monthly. "Though ill-nature is far from being wit," he says, "yet it is generally laughed at as such. The critic enjoys the triumph, and ascribes to his parts what is only due to his effrontery. I fire with indignation when I see persons wholly destitute of education and genius, indent to the press, and thus turn book-makers, adding to the sin of criticism the sin of ignorance also; whose trade is a bad one, and who are bad workmen in the trade."

Of course this provoked reprisals. Smollett answered sharply, and Kenrick, a malevolent and abusive hack in Griffiths's employ, coarsely and scurrilously. But the great object was achieved. All this made Goldsmith known; and he began to command a price in the Grub Street market.

GOLDSMITH'S ESSAYS; THE "CITIZEN OF THE WORLD."

The first effect of this was seen in his employment by Wilkie, a bookseller of St. Paul's Churchyard, to produce the matter for a weekly magazine, to be entitled the Bee, which commenced a short career of less than three months on the 6th of October, 1759. In it occurs that wonderful "City Night Piece," in which Goldsmith shows that, though the familiar and even the jocose was his usual vein, sublimity of style was within his reach; as when he speaks of the time "when this temporary solitude may be made continual, and the city itself, like its inhabitants, fade away, and leave a desert in its room."

The Bee was too well written for its readers, and failed accordingly; but it proved another step of the ladder whose lowest rungs the author was laboriously mounting. The Busybody, the Ladies' Magazine, and similar publications arose; and when Mr. Newbery, the enterprising bookseller of St. Paul's, purposes establishing the Public Ledger, with Dr. Smollett as its editor, the two find their way to Green Arbour Court, to obtain the co-operation of Goldsmith. To this period belong those essays which were afterwards collected into a volume by himself; and they are well worthy of preservation. He thoroughly understood what he was writing about. When he makes the strolling player describe his adventures, his own wanderings must have been vividly in his mind. "I 'love a straggling life before all things in the world," says the light-hearted philosophic vagabond, "sometimes good, sometimes bad; to be warm to-day, and cold to-morrow; to eat when one can get it, and to drink when it stands before me. We arrived that evening at Tenterden, and took a large room at the 'Greyhound,' where we resolved to exhibit 'Romeo and Juliet,' with the funeral procession, the grave, and the garden scene. Romeo was to be performed by a gentleman from the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane; Juliet by a lady who had never appeared on any stage before; and I was to snuff the candles;—all excellent in our way. We had figures enough, but the difficulty was to dress them." Mr. Jack Spindle, too, the good-natured man, whose friends are so profuse of offers of service so long as the sun shines upon him, and who can find nothing more substantial for him in his adversity than good advice, is drawn with the happiest humour. But the merit of the miscellaneous essays is entirely eclipsed by that of the admirable series that has become a part of our national literature,—the "Citizen of the World."

The idea of this work is ingenious, and it is capitably worked out. Not that it was altogether original, for in the "Lettres Persanes" of Montesquieu a similar notion—that of a foreigner describing in his own way the manners and customs of a country—is similarly worked out. The happy fancy, the genial sympathy with the poor, and the tender pity for "all who are desolate and oppressed," that formed the best part of Goldsmith's character, are here shown naturally and spontaneously, flowing without effort from the kind man's gentle heart. "Through tattered coats small vices do appear,—Robes and furred gowns hide all," a greater master had written a century and a half before; and manfully does Goldsmith pluck away the furred gown from wealthy vice, and with hearty and ever good-humoured eloquence did he plead for a little human pity and consideration for the wearer of the tattered coat, whom the great ones of the earth used so scurvily. He was always on the side of the poor; and it is not the least of his merits that he has persistently shown how many unhonoured and unsung heroes exist among the humblest toilers of the world. The characters in the work are alone enough to rescue it from oblivion. There is the inimitable "Man in Black," with maxims of curmudgeon prudence ever on his tongue, and overflowing benevolence and pity in his heart; and the wonderful little Beau Tibbs—the shabby, fussy, consequential, transparent impostor, bragging of the great "friends" with whom he has "scarcely a coffee-house acquaintance, affecting to despise the luxuries that are beyond his reach, as the fox despised the grapes, preferring ox-cheek and brisk beer to ortolans and claret, and serenely unconscious that his flimsy pretences were seen through by every one;" and Mrs. Tibbs, his worthy partner, with her airs of third-rate gentility, and her contempt of the Vauxhall entertainment as "low."

FRIENDSHIP WITH DR. JOHNSON.

The acquaintance with Johnson was formed at this time; and the friendship that arose between the rough, sturdy, honest-hearted "Cham of literature," and the affectionate, self-distrusting poet, was like a bright golden thread woven into the life of each. Both men of gentle nature, they understood each other well, and each knew the other's worth. It was all very well for such men as Boswell to depreciate Goldsmith's worth to Johnson—the sturdy old sage knew better. "He imitates you, sir," said Boswell the truckler, when the beautiful poem, "The Traveller," had set all London talking. "Why, no, sir," was Johnson's frank reply; "Jack Hawkesworth is one of my imitators, but not Goldsmith. Goldy, sir, has great merit." "But, sir, he is much indebted to you," cried the irrepressible Bozzy, "for his getting so high in the public estimation." Whereat Johnson complacently rejoined, "Why, sir, he has perhaps got sooner to it by his intimacy with me." Another time he said, in reply to disparagement by Boswell, who alluded to the loose, queer life Goldsmith had led, "Sir, Goldsmith is one of the first men we have now as an author, and he is a very worthy man too. He has been loose in his principles, but he is coming right." On the other hand, the sage cannot resist a jest now and then at the expense of the awkward Irishman, with his scarred face, his brogue, and his strange abrupt manners. When Miss Reynolds, Sir Joshua's sister, being called upon to give as a toast the ugliest man she knew, named Goldsmith, and a lady friend, with an ardent shake of the hand confirmed the accuracy of her choice, Johnson, exclaimed, "Thus the ancients, on the commencement of their friendships, sacrificed a beast between them;" and at a later period he acknowledged that "the partiality of Goldsmith's friends was always against him." No wonder that the poor poet now and then strove to carry off the shame and embarrassment he felt, under an appearance of bravado and swagger, which was set down to vanity. But he gratefully, and indeed eagerly, accepted the friendship honestly proffered by Johnson,—honoured and appreciated in him the sturdy endurance and strength in which he himself was so woefully deficient; bore his browbeating and contradictory moods with unflinching good-humour conscious that "there was nothing of the bear about Johnson but the skin;" was content to let the sage become a sort of growling supervisor of his affairs, and had the honesty to acknowledge the soundness of advice he had not the strength to follow. "It would be much, sir, that I could not take from you," was his affectionate reply to Johnson's apology for more than usual rudeness. "He is now become miserable, and that ensures the protection of Johnson," was his comment to Boswell, who expressed surprise at the Doctor's befriending a man whose reputation was not even doubtful. He could, however, occasionally retort upon the sage himself with a quickness that goes far to disprove the persistently repeated story of his deficiency in conversation. When Johnson laughed at the idea of skill being required in the dialogue of animals in a fable, he said, most happily, "This is not so easy as you seem to think, for if you were to make little fishes talk, they would talk like whales." It was observed that Johnson would take more of this kind of thing from Goldsmith than from any man alive ; but sometimes he would turn restive and growl. "There is no arguing with Johnson," said Goldsmith, on one such occasion, "If his pistol misses fire, he knocks you down with the butt-end of it." But throughout there was between the two men a hearty respect and affection, founded on the knowledge each possessed of the real good that was in the other.

THE ARREST ; A COMPULSORY SALE.

By this time Goldsmith had removed to better quarters, in Wine Office Court, Fleet Street, and here he had the honour of receiving Johnson and Percy—there were more chairs than one in the room now—at a supper he gave on the 31st of May, 1761. Johnson, who with his rusty brown suit, loose knee-breeches, soiled shirt, and frowsy little wig, was usually the untidiest of mortals, came out resplendent in new clothes and a new wig, to the amazement of Percy, who called for him on the way to their host's. Johnson explained that Goldsmith was accustomed to excuse his own slovenliness by quoting his practice ; "and I am desirous this night," he continued, "to show him a better example."

From this time Goldsmith had plenty to do, and could always command a remunerative price for his work. But his habits were formed, and he had not the strength of mind to break through them. He was a self-indulgent man, sadly given to procrastinate, and to prefer to-day's pleasure to the thought of to-morrow's responsibilities ; fond of pleasure, and holidays, and fine clothes, and persistently given to running in debt. Thus occurred the memorable scene, chronicled by Boswell, who took down the account from Johnson's own words, which are as follows :—

"I received one morning a message from poor Goldsmith that he was in great distress, and as it was not in his power to come to me, begged that I would come to him as soon as possible. I sent him a guinea, and promised to come to him directly. I accordingly went as soon as I was dressed, and found that his landlady had arrested him for debt, at which he was in a violent passion. I perceived that he had already changed my guinea, and had got a bottle of Madeira and a glass before him. I put the cork into the bottle, desired that he would be calm, and began to talk to him of the means by which he might be extricated. He then told me that he had a novel ready for the press, which he produced to me. I looked into it, and saw its merit ; told the landlady I should soon return ; and having gone to a bookseller, sold it for sixty pounds. I brought Goldsmith the money, and he discharged his rent, not without rating his landlady in a high tone for having used him so ill."

The bookseller here mentioned was the younger Newbery—for Goldsmith appears to have exhausted the patience of the elder, the uncle, who would make no more advances. Goldsmith had got into a new circle of acquaintance ; Hogarth and Reynolds came to his lodgings now ; and that celebrated literary club had been formed, to which it was considered a distinguished honour to belong, and Goldsmith was one of the original members, while rich David Garrick sighed for admittance in vain. The prosperous manager had made known to Johnson, through polite Sir Joshua Reynolds, that he liked the idea of the club excessively, and thought he should be of them, whereat Johnson exclaimed, "He'll be of us ! How does he know we will permit him ? The first duke in England has no right to hold such language ;" and Garrick had to remain outside. The fact was, Goldsmith was living beyond his means, as he always had done, and as he continued to do, until the day of his death. The bottle of Madeira into which Johnson "put the cork" was but too typical of his way of seeking consolation and refuge from care in any shape that offered most readily. But the book that was sold to satisfy the landlady's demand was no catchpenny, written in a hurry as a "potboiler ;" it was a work destined to move the laughter and tears of thousands during successive generations, and to exert an influence even on the mighty genius of Goethe—it was "The Vicar of Wakefield."

Francis Newbery, having bought the book on Johnson's recommendation, put it aside, entirely unconscious of the prize he had secured. It is probable that Goldsmith himself had built hopes of fame upon the work, in spite of his declaration in the opening sentence of the preface, "there are a hundred faults in this thing ;" and the necessity of sending it away in a hurry to sell for what it would bring was unfortunate. It is always unfortunate when a careless man lets his affairs get into hopeless disorder ; but that was Goldsmith's fault, and not Newbery's, who paid what was asked for the book, and thus relieved the author from a very disagreeable position. "A sufficient price, too, when it was sold," was Johnson's sensible reply to the indignant outcry afterwards made at the smallness of the sum, "for then the fame of Goldsmith had not been elevated, as it afterwards was, by his 'Traveller,' and the bookseller had faint hopes of profit by his bargain. After 'The Traveller,' to be sure, it was accidentally worth more money."

THE LITERARY CLUB; "THE TRAVELLER."

So Goldsmith went on for a time, compiling, writing prefaces; looked upon at the famous club with a sort of half-contemptuous toleration by stiff, dull Sir John Hawkins, and fussy, meddlesome Boswell, and Topham Beauclerk, the "swell" of that goodly association, whose tongue was so sharp that Johnson once cried indignantly, "Sir, you never open your mouth but with intention to give pain; and you have often given me pain, not from the power of what you have said, but from seeing your intention." Unfortunately for himself, Goldsmith was far too sensitive with regard to what in the present day would be called "chaff." He felt that he was somehow at a disadvantage; and, like the weak man he was, called to his aid Mr. William Filby, the tailor; and the finer the clothes in which he appressed his sturdy little person, the more awkward and ungainly was his appearance. "You are perhaps the worst-dressed man in the room," was Garrick's jesting comment on one occasion when Goldsmith appeared in unusual splendour at a dinner given by Boswell; and this, with certain long bills from the Mr. Filby aforesaid, made up the sum of the advantages he derived from his gorgeous array.

He was soon to take up a very different position, and to assert himself in a much more valuable way. At the end of the year, on the 19th of December, 1764, the following notice appeared in the Public Advertiser:—"This day is published, price one shilling and sixpence, 'The Traveller; or, A Prospect of Society.' A Poem. By Oliver Goldsmith, M.B. Printed for J. Newbery, in St. Paul's Church-yard." The poem came out, and found its way at once to the heart of every reader. Johnson pronounced it the best poem that had appeared since the days of Pope. "I shall never again think Dr. Goldsmith ugly," was Miss Reynolds's characteristic tribute; and Boswell, who arrived in London shortly after from the north, was amazed to find Goldsmith's poem in every mouth, and sagely opined that the greater part of the work must have been written by Johnson.

The design of "The Traveller" was to show that to every nation certain blessings are vouchsafed by Providence; that the goodness of God is everywhere; that "Nature" is "a mother kind alike to all." But a blessing, abused, may become a curse: "Till carried to excess in each domain, This favourite good begets peculiar pain." Each state has its evils to show, as well as advantages. The lavish natural beauties of Italy, where bright flowers and luscious fruits "own the kindred soil, Nor ask luxuriance from the planter's toil," must be taken in conjunction with the degradation of the inhabitants. "Man seems the only growth that dwindles here." The rugged valour and rough patriotism of the Swiss, fostered and developed by their way of life among stormy mountain regions, "where Winter lingering chills the lap of May," do not blind the poet to the defects in the national character; "For as refinement stops, from sire to son, Unaltered, unimproved, the manners run." This refinement the traveller finds in France; in bright France the poet finds a contrast to Switzerland, where their level life is but a smouldering fire. "Honour forms the social temper here;" and in that love of praise, that setting up of a false standard of glory, the poet rightly sees the source of evil and calamity. Holland, the home of industry and practical commercial energy, where the very land has been won from the sea, boasts the blessings that arise from opulence. But industry begets a love of gain, and everything, even to liberty itself, is made a subject of sale and barter; and "all those ills superfluous treasure brings, are here displayed." And lastly, the traveller writes of Britain, the land where the rights of the free man are recognized, "While e'en the peasant boasts those rights to scan, And learns to venerate himself as man." But here, too, the inevitable "other side" of the picture must be taken into account. "That independence Britons prize too high, Keeps man from man, and breaks the social tie." Liberty may degenerate into license; restraint may be removed until there is nothing to keep the rich man from using his money for unhallowed purposes,—the rich man being free to drive his poor neighbour out of doors, and destroy his habitation, to enlarge the park in which his own mansion stands solitary. The moral of the poem is contained in the last sixteen lines, which, with the exception of the couplet commencing "The lifted axe," were contributed by Johnson. It sets forth that kings and laws, bad or good government, have little influence on the sum of human happiness and sorrow. "Still to ourselves in every place consigned, Our own felicity we make or find,"—a truly Johnsonian proposition, but somewhat at variance with the spirit of the poem generally, in several passages of which, especially with regard to Italy, tyrannical repression is set forth as reducing men to the condition of children. "Each nobler aim, repressed by long control, Expires at last, or feebly snares the soul." But the incongruity of the concluding lines, especially as they had been written by the revered "Great Cham of Literature," was not likely to be severely criticised. All readers were charmed with the exquisite facility of the verse—the absence of that artificial, high-flown imagery, the frippery borrowed from the ancients, and which now, "like a robe tossed by a proud beauty to her waiting-woman, was abandoned by genius to mediocrity." In "The Traveller" the verse flows on naturally, musically, free from harsh inversions, strained imagery, and unreal thoughts. Goldsmith avoids the bombastic and the commonplace. "What acceptation a poem may find which has neither abuse, party, nor blank verse to support it," he says in the dedication, "I cannot tell, nor am I solicitous to know. My aims are right." And he appeals to no patron to stand sponsor to his work, and introduce it into the circles of fashion, for it is dedicated to his clergyman brother, Henry Goldsmith. Among the most felicitous lines in this beautiful poem may be cited those which describe the Italian of his time—ignorant, unambitious, unconscious of any meaning in the relics of a mighty cast by which he is surrounded:—

"As in those domes where Cæsars once bore sway, Defaced by time, and tottering in decay;
There in the ruin, heedless of the deed,
The shelter-seeking peasant builds his shed;
And, wondering man could want the larger pile,
Exults, and owns his cottage with a smile."

Again, where could we find a truer or more complete description of the natural features of Holland, with its dykes, canals, and pastures, than is comprised in the following lines:—

"To men of other minds my fancy flies,
Embosomed in the deep where Holland lies;
Methinks her patient sons before me stand,
Where the broad ocean leans against the land,
And, sedulous to stop the coming tide,
Lift the tall rampire's artificial pride.
Onward, methinks, and diligently slow,
The firm connected bulwark seems to grow,
Spreads its long arms amidst the watery roar,
Scoops out an empire, and usurps the shore,—
While the pent ocean, rising o'er the pile,
Sees an amphibious world beneath him smile;
The slow canal, the yellow-blossom'd vale,
The willow-tufted bank, the gliding sail,
The crowded mart, the cultivated plain,
A new creation rescued from his reign."

Long afterwards, when Goldsmith was lying in the Temple churchyard, emphatic testimony was given to the merits of the work. It was at a dinner given by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and Boswell is the narrator of the conversation. "I was glad," said the painter, "to hear Charles Fox say it was one of the finest poems in the English language." "Why were you glad?" asked Bennet Langton. "You surely had no doubt of this before?" Here Johnson joined in the conversation with a sturdy "No, sir; the merit of 'The Traveller' is so well established, that Mr. Fox's praise cannot augment it, nor his censure diminish it."

THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD.

Fame, however, will not pay the tailor's bill, or other household expenses; and Goldsmith had already altered his style of living in anticipation of the increased income this long-awaited-for fame was to bring him. By this time he had chambers in the Temple, and kept a man-servant, and was giving way more than ever to the pernicious habit of drawing as much as he could in advance on every work he engaged to produce, and deferring his task until the greater part of the copyright money had been spent. Early in February, 1766, the St. James's Chronicle announced to its readers the following fact: "In a few days will be published, in two volumes, twelves, price six shillings bound, or five shillings sewed, 'The Vicar of Wakefield,' a tale supposed to be written by himself. Printed for J. Newbery, at the Crown, in Paternoster Row." The work made its way, steadily and surely, into public favour, through the power of the truth that was in it,—the noble vindication of good, and the exhibition of its triumph over evil, and through the exquisite truth to nature in its portraiture of character. They are no conventional heroes and heroines of romance, this gentle Dr. Primrose and his surroundings, but simple folks with many little weaknesses and faults and vanities, and withal a hearty capacity for good. Was there ever anything in imaginative writing, more wonderfully and healthily attractive than the character of this good clergyman? "Equal to either fortune," as the old phrase has it,—not to be spoiled by prosperity, or soured by adversity; so ready to believe in the honesty of his fellow-men, that a schoolboy could cheat him, and all the more loveable for his simplicity, but endowed with a steadfast faith in the goodness of heaven, and an unwearied readiness to forgive, and to deal gently with the failings of humanity, compared to which the utmost elaboration of worldly wisdom would seem but foolishness. The loss of his fortune cannot disturb his equanimity, for he considers that every position in life has its pleasures and advantages, and fears nothing but dishonour. Never, except when he is struck at through his children, does his patience give way; and even then, he quickly remembers that it is for the Christian to forgive, and that pardon is nobler than vengeance. How pleasantly he adapts himself to the simple folks among whom he and his family are thrown by the loss of his fortune, is capitally told. "As we rose with the run, so we never pursued our labours after it was gone down, but returned home to the expecting family; where smiling looks, a neat hearth, and pleasant fire were prepared for our reception. Nor were we without guests. Sometimes Farmer Flam-borough, our talkative neighbour, and often the blind piper, would pay us a visit, and taste our gooseberry wine, for the making of which we had lost neither the recipe nor the reputation. These harmless people had several ways of being good company; for while one played, the other would sing some soothing ballad—"Johnny Armstrong's last good-night," or the 'Cruelty of Barbara Allen.' The night was concluded in the manner we began the morning, my youngest boys being appointed to read the lessons of the day; and he that read loudest, distinctest, and best, was to have a half-penny on Sunday to put into the poor's box."

What grander and more impressive picture was ever given of the dignity of Christianity than that of the good vicar in his days of trial reading the Church Service to his fellow-prisoners, strong in the consciousness of his righteous cause, and undisturbed by the fact that he finds his audience "perfectly merry upon the occasion," and serenely persevering, amid all the ridicule, the "lowly whispers, groans of contrition burlesqued, wailing, and coughing," with which the dissolute crew at first receive the efforts that at length succeed in awakening some to remorse, and all to attention? "I continued," says the good and faithful servant, "with my natural solemnity to read on, sensible that what I did might mend some, but could itself receive no contamination from any." The good vicar knew how to labour and to wait, as is shown in the plain practical manner and the strong common sense of his short sermon to the wretched congregation for whom his gentle heart is sad, and to whom in plain homely phrase he seeks to prove that the devil is the worst of masters, and that death is the wages of sin.

What signifies that the plot is improbable, and the construction in many respects faulty? The vicar and his family, the ambitious Livy and the demure Sophy, the good-hearted, scheming, hot-tempered Mrs. Primrose, the sedate Moses with his quotations from "the ancients," Mr. Burchell happy in the company of sturdy little Dick and Bill, and crying "fudge" at the mock morality of Lady Blarney and Miss Carolina Wilhelmina Amelia Skeggs, will live as long as there are English books and English readers.

GOLDSMITH AS A DRAMATIST.

The Vicar and the Traveller had brought him fame; it was now high time that Goldsmith should cast about for something that would yield him profit. His expenditure always ran in advance of his means. He now turned to dramatic writing as a means of filling his empty pocket, and of paying off the most pressing of his debts. The fashion of the day was in favour of what was known as "genteel comedy,"—an artificial and mischievous style, in which everything "low" and every natural delineation of a vulgar character was to be avoided. At a later date, in his character of Cumberland, Goldsmith happily outraged the tendencies of the genteel school, whose chief author he describes as

"A flattering painter, who made it his care
To draw men as they ought to be, not as they are.
His gallants are all faultless, his women divine,
And Comedy wonders at being so fine;
Like a tragedy queen he has dizen'd her out,
Or rather like Tragedy giving a rout."

Goldsmith chose, on the other hand, to depict men "as they are," and to make his stage a mimic world on which the high-bred and the vulgar, the generous and the mean, all appear together. "The Goodnatured Man," for so the comedy that he pressed upon the acceptance of Garrick, the manager, was called, presented in every respect a contrast and a defiance to the genteel and sentimental school. It was a bold experiment, that of "holding the mirror up to nature" to audiences accustomed to applaud artificial sentimentalities. Garrick took alarm, and, after suggesting alterations which would have made a gruesome corpse of the play, declined to bring it out at Drury Lane. Coleman, who presided at the rival house in Covent Garden, accepted the manuscript indeed, but with many misgivings as to its success; the actors caught the infection of the manager's despondency. The broad comicality of a scene in which two bailiffs are introduced was voted "low," and the play was saved from condemnation on the first night chiefly by the admirable acting of Shuter, the comedian, in the character of Croaker, a confirmed grumbler and alarmist. Poor Goldsmith went to the club after the performance was over, and rattled away as usual, even singing his pet song of "An old woman tossed up in a blanket," for the amusement of the company; but he himself afterwards at a dinner party made public confession of his real feelings on the occasion. "All the while," he said, "I was suffering horrid tortures; . . . but I made more noise than usual to cover all that, so that they never perceived my not eating, nor, I believe, at all imagined to themselves the anguish of my heart. But when all were gone, except Johnson here, I burst out a-crying, and even swore that I would never write again."

But when the bailiffs had been cut out, the comedy succeeded well enough ; and the "author's rights" and copyright money put nearly five hundred pounds into Goldsmith's purse in the course of a few days. Here was a chance of getting out of the slough of despond of debt and embarrassment. "Pay your debts," said Prudence. "Take a better set of chambers, and furnish them with 'blue marine' curtains, Wilton carpets, and expensive chimney glasses," whispered Extravagance ; and four hundred pounds squandered in the purchase of the set of chambers in Brick Court, Temple, indicated to which of these counsellors the heedless poet had listened. In fact, no sum of money would have set Goldsmith right with the world, simply because every increase in his earnings was made an excuse for augmented expenditure and waste. And we find tokens of this following close upon every supply of money, in the shape of fine entertainments, fine clothes, visits to Bath and other expensive resorts, etc. Not that Goldsmith could not enjoy himself, on occasion, in a very unpretending way. One of his favourite relaxations consisted in what he called a "shoemaker's holiday"—a day spent in a walk with a few friends into the country, a dinner at the Highbury Barn ordinary—tenpence a head, including a penny to the waiter, and a supper at a Fleet Street tavern, the whole day's expenses "never exceeding a crown, and being oftener from three and sixpence to four shillings"—very reasonable and primitive pleasuring, that would bear the morrow's reflection.

TASK-WORK ; THE HISTORIES OF ROME AND ENGLAND, ETC. ; THE "ANIMATED NATURE."

The jaunts and holidays, simple and expensive, were interspersed with periods of strenuous exertion. Before this time he had engaged to write a "History of Rome," on terms sufficiently liberal to have kept him beyond money troubles, had he possessed ordinary prudence ; he afterwards undertook to write an English History on the same plan, like the Roman History for the use of colleges and schools. The charm of the author's style was enough to ensure a very large sale for these works. No one could put information in a more pleasing form ; and this gift of making knowledge palatable was one of the many talents which made Goldsmith adorn whatever he touched in a literary way. Johnson's opinion regarding his friend's merits in this direction is emphatic. "Goldsmith's abridgment," he declared, "is better than that of Lucius Florus or Eutropius ; and I will venture to say that if you compare him with Vertot in the same places of the Roman History, you will find that he excels Vertot. Sir, he has the art of compiling, and of saying everything he has to say, in a pleasing manner. He is now writing a Natural History, and will make it as entertaining as a Persian tale."

This last-mentioned work, published under the title of "Animated Nature," very shortly before the author's death, fully realized Johnson's prognostication, in the charm of its style. That he might settle to these tasks without interruption, Goldsmith was accustomed to retire to a lodging about eight miles from London on the road to Edgware, away from all temptations to society and conviviality. At a later period, when he was writing his second comedy, he thus describes himself in a letter to Bennet Langton : "There have I been strolling about the hedges, studying jests with a most tragical countenance." Anecdotes of his eccentricities, his odd fits of absence of mind, and his strange habits, such as reading in bed and putting out the candle by throwing his slipper at it, long survived as traditions in the Edgware farmhouse.

CLOSING PERIOD ; A PROFESSORSHIP ; "THE DESERTED VILLAGE."

A further insight into his circumstances is obtained from a letter, dated January, 1770, to his brother Maurice, on the subject of a small legacy of some fifteen pounds left to him by Uncle Conarine, and which he gives up to the said Maurice, and to a sister who has married badly. "The King has lately been pleased," he says, with a touch of pardonable vanity, "to make me Professor of Ancient History in a Royal Academy of Painting, which he has just established ; but there is no salary annexed, and I took it rather as a compliment to the institution, than any benefit to myself. Honours to one in my situation are something like ruffles to one that wants a shirt." And so it continued to the end of his life. Literary reputation his genius could not fail to bring him, and fashionable acquaintances, and fame for his genius, mingled with affection for himself ; but from carking care he was never to be free. The publication of "The Deserted Village" greatly increased his fame. This beautiful poem has all the charms of "The Traveller," with additional ones of its own ; and the character of the village preacher, and that of the schoolmaster, with his "words of learned length and thundering sound," would in themselves have been enough to immortalize Goldsmith's name, if he had written nothing else.

The description of the loveliest village of the plain is in Goldsmith's happiest style. The good-natured, careless, holiday-loving idler, who could never wait patiently in his own life for the time when toil remitting should "lend its turn to play," seems to revel in the bucolic delights of the village festival. "The dancing pair that simply sought renown by holding out to tire each other down," may have brought many a reminiscence of Lissoy to his mind; nor did the rough practical jokes connected with the swain mistrustless of his smutted face, suggest any incongruity, as included in the "charms" of Sweet Auburn. And just as the description is beautiful, so the reasoning is utterly faulty. As in "The Traveller" he lays down the startling proposition that "honour sinks where commerce long prevails," so here in his second poem he talks of "trade's unfeeling train," who "usurp the soil, and dispossess the swain," utterly ignoring the fact that agriculture alone would never maintain a constantly increasing population. His inconsistency is sometimes laughable. In "The Traveller" he points out how, with simply agricultural and pastoral employments, a nation fails to exhibit any progress; "from sire to son, unaltered, unimproved, the manners run;" and yet in "The Deserted Village" he deprecates all change.

The description of the good clergyman has a resemblance to Chaucer's parson in the "Canterbury Tales," too close to be the result of chance. Not only is the genial character the worthy divine portrayed as only Goldsmith could do; the apparent contradiction between the general welcome—"careless their merits or their faults to scan"—extended to all applicants at the parsonage, and the anxious punctuality "prompt at every call," in the fulfilment of sacred duties, is admirably indicated and explained. We have few finer instances of concentrated power than in the six lines that describe the transition from despair to trembling hope on the deathbed.

"Pleased with his guests, the good man learn'd to glow,

And quite forgot their vices in their woe;
Careless their merits or their faults to scan,
His pity gave ere charity began.

Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride,
And ev'n his failings lean'd to virtue's side;
But in his duty prompt, at ev'ry call,
He watch'd and wept, he pray'd and felt, for all;
And as a bird each fond endearment tries
To tempt its new-fledged offspring to the skies,
He tried each art, reproved each dull delay,
Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way.

Beside the bed where parting life was laid,
And sorrow, guilt, and pain by turns dismiss'd,
The rev'rend champion stood. At his control,
Despair and anguish fled the struggling soul;
Comfort came down the trembling wretch to raise,
And his last falt'ring accents whisper'd praise.

At church, with meek and unaffected grace,
His looks adorn'd the venerable place;

Truth from his lips prevail'd with double sway,
And fools, who came to scoff, remain'd to pray.
The service past, around the pious man,
With steady zeal, each honest rustic ran;
Ev'n children follow'd, with endearing wile,
And pluck'd his gown, to share the good man's smile;
His ready smile a parent's warmth express'd,
Their welfare pleas'd him, and their cares distress'd:
To them his heart, his love, his griefs, were giv'n,
But all his serious thoughts had rest in heav'n
As some tall cliff, that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm,
Tho' round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head."

"THE HAUNCH OF VENISON;" AND "RETALIATION."

The charmingly humorous poetical epistle to Lord Clare, describing the unhappy fate of that "haunch of venison" of which the fortunate recipient was despoiled by the under-bred, fine-spoken fellow, whose delusive dinner-table exhibited "in the middle a place where the pasty was not," exhibits the versatile poet in a new and pleasing light. Robert Nugent, Lord Clare, a jovial nobleman of the hearty Irish school of the old time, contributed not a little, by his kindly hospitality and kindly attentions to lighten the cares of the harassed poet during that last period of his life when fame had come to him, but not prosperity or surcease from toil. The piece is perfect in its way, from the story of the gammon of bacon hung up for a show in this Irish house, whose inmates would no more think of eating a slice of that ostentatiously exhibited than they would of eating the pan that it's fried in, down to the conclusion, "when with looks that quite petrified entered the maid," to tell of the dire mishap that has robbed the dinner of its chief and much-expected dish. The last few lines, too, convey a compliment gracefully turned; and though the whole epistle is intended only as a piece of good-humoured banter, and the jest tells against the author who so humorously relates it, even here the good heart and heedless head of Goldsmith are unmistakably discernible. The little bit of harmless vanity in the possession of fashionable friends, while the author is laughing at his own weakness, is admirably indicated, as is likewise the manner in which the "under-bred fine-spoken" acquaintance jockeys the poor poet out of the present that has but just arrived, and asks him to a dinner at which the guest, and not the host, is to provide the pièce de résistance.

"While thus I debated, in reverie center'd,
An acquaintance, a friend, as he call'd himself, enter'd;
An under-bred, fine-spoken fellow was he,
And he smiled as he look'd at the venison and me.

'What have we got here?—why, this is good eating!
Your own, I suppose—or is it in waiting?'
'Why, whose should it be?' cried I with a founce,
'I get these things often;' but that was a bounce;
'Some lords, my acquaintance, that settle the nation,
Are pleased to be kind; but I hate ostentation.'
'If that be the case, then,' cried he, very gay,
'I'm glad I have taken this house in my way.
To-morrow you take a poor dinner with me
No words—I insist on't—precisely at three:
We'll have Johnson and Burke; all the wits will be there;
My acquaintance is slight, or I'd ask my Lord Clare.
And now I think on't, as I am a sinner,
We wanted this venison to make out a dinner!
What say you—a pasty, it shall and it must,
And my wife, little Kitty, is famous for crust.
Here, porter—this venison with me to Mile-end;
No stirring, I beg, my dear friend, my dear friend!
Thus snatching his hat, he brush'd off like the wind,
And the porter and eatables follow'd behind.'

But the finest touch is the piece of mock heroic that precedes the final compliment to Lord Clare:—

"While thus we resolved, and the pasty delay'd,
With looks that quite petrified enter'd the maid:
A visage so sad and so pale with fright,
Waked Priam in drawing his curtains by night.
But we quickly found out, for who could mistake her?
That she came with some terrible news from the baker:
And so it fell out, for that negligent sinner
Hud shut out the pasty on shutting his oven.
Sad Philomel thus—but let smiles drop—
And now that I think on't, the story may stop.
To be plain, my good lord, it's but labour misplaced,
To send such good venison to one of your taste."

"SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER;" "RETALIATION;"
THE END.

The non-success of "The Goodnatured Man" had made Goldsmith declare, in his haste, that he would write no more plays. But the increasing pressure of his debts induced him to try his fortune once more in this field, in the hope of realizing a large sum in a short time. He wrote the admirably humorous comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer," founding the plot on that long-past escapade of his youth, when he had mistaken a gentleman's house for an inn, and ordered a supper and a bottle of wine with the air of a young Cæsus. In spite of the misgivings of Manager Colman, the piece proved a brilliant success, and filled the author's purse with guineas that he squandered with incurable recklessness. As if to vindicate at the last his claim to Johnson's well-earned eulogium, declaring him to have touched almost every kind of literature, and to have touched nothing that he did not adorn, Goldsmith, in the last poem he ever wrote, showed how satire could be keen, polished, and yet without malice. At the invitation of some friends who had sharpened their wit, not for the first time, upon him, and some mock epitaphs, and who asked him to pay them in their own coin, he composed "Retaliation," a set of characters in which the foibles of the persons portrayed are hit off with infinite felicity and humour, while their good points are generously put forward, the concluding lines of each character always taking the sting out of the former part. The portrait of fussy, vain little Garrick is admirable:—

"Here lies David Garrick, describe him who can,
An abridgment of all that was pleasant in man;
As an actor, confess'd without rival to shine;
As a wit, if not first, in the very first line!
Yet, with talents like these, and an excellent heart,
The man had his failings—a dupe to his art.
Like an ill-judging beauty, his colours he spread,
And beplaster'd with rouge his own natural red.
On the stage he was natural, simple, affecting;
'Twas only that when he was off he was acting."

"With no reason on earth to go out of his way,
He turn'd and he varied full ten times a day:
Though secure of our hearts, yet confoundedly sick
If they were not his own by finessing and trick:
He cast off his friends, as a huntsman his pack,
For he knew when he pleased he could whistle them back.
Of praise a mere glutton, he swallow'd what came,
And the puff of a dunce he mistook it for fame;
Till his relish grown callous, almost to disease,
Who pepper'd the highest was surest to please.
But let us be candid, and speak out our mind,
If dunces applauded, he paid them in kind.
Ye Kennicks, ye Kellys, and Woodfalls so grave,
What a commerce was yours, while you got and you gave!
How did Grub Street re-echo the shouts that you rais'd,
While he was be Roscius'd, and you were beprais'd!
But praise to his spirit, wherever it flies,
To act as an angel and mix with the skies:
Those poets who owe their best fame to his skill Shall still be his flatterers, go where he will;
Old Shakspeare receive him with praise and with love,
And Beaumonts and Bens be his Kellys above."

Increasing debts and difficulties spoiled the successes of Goldsmith's later days. We get glimpses of him in fashionable company and among genial friends, striving to forget the care that is gnawing at his heart. For he is being dunned right and left; the publishers are tired of "reliance on his fractured dates," and will employ him no more. After a short, feverish attempt to work up literary arrears in a suburban lodging, in March, 1774, he comes to London, suffering from a local disease, but still more from low, nervous fever, brought on by anxiety. To the inquiry of the physician, who wondered at the disorder of his pulse, and inquired if his mind was at ease, he replied sadly, "No, it is not;" and these sad words are the last we hear from his lips, as he passes away in his forty-sixth year, and in what should have been the full vigour of his activity. "Let not his faults be remembered," said honest, sturdy Johnson; "he was a very great man."

CHILDHOOD AND SCHOOL DAYS.

"I thought never to be forgotten that the two most popular writers of the eighteenth century, Addison and Johnson, were such efficacious teachers of virtue, that their writings may be numbered amongst the causes which in an important degree have contributed to preserve and improve the morality of the British nation."

Such is the emphatic testimony borne in the life of Sir J. Mackintosh to the merits of the author of the "Rambler" and "Idler."

Samuel Johnson, the central figure among the literary men of the first twenty-four years of George the Third's reign, was born at Lichfield, on the 18th of September, 1709. His father, Michael Johnson, was a bookseller in that place, and used moreover to open a shop at Birmingham on every market day; for at the beginning of the last century the book-buying section of the Birmingham community did not support a single bookseller. Michael Johnson, magistrate, high churchman, and Tory, made money by selling books, and lost it by endeavouring to manufacture parchment; and in the end died insolvent. Samuel's mother, who lived to the age of nearly ninety, and whom he regarded with affectionate reverence, appears to have been a woman of strong sense and estimable character, but without education. "My father could not bear to talk of his affairs," says Johnson, speaking of his early years, "and my mother, being unacquainted with books, cared not to talk of anything else. Had my mother been more literate, they had been better companions."

A big heavy child young Samuel was, yet far from being healthy. His face was disfigured with scrofula, and from the same cause one of his eyes was almost useless—"The dog was never worth much, sir," he used to say of that unprofitable member in later days. His earliest reminiscence was of being taken to London to be touched by Queen Anne; for the belief in the efficacy of the royal touch as a cure for the king's evil had not yet died out in England. He told Mrs. Thrale he remembered Queen Anne—"He had a confused, but somehow a sort of solemn recollection of a lady in diamonds, with a long black hood." As a boy, at the Lichfield grammar school, under Mr. Hunter, who, according to Johnson, beat his pupils unmercifully, accompanying the flagellation by the consoling assurance, that it was administered to save them from the gallows, he made considerable progress in Latin; and he seems to think the discipline did him good. "My master," he said to Bennet Langton, "whipped me very well. Without that, sir, I should have done nothing." Indolent and procrastinating, he seemed yet to learn by intuition; and his marvellous memory enabled him to hold tenaciously what he had once gained. His indolence, and in some measure his shortsightedness, prevented him from joining in the ordinary sports of the boys. That his unusual talents were acknowledged by pupils and masters alike there is no doubt. Afterwards at the grammar school at Stourbridge, to which he was removed at the age of fifteen, he profited much from the instruction of the able Mr. Wentworth. He afterwards said of the Lichfield and Stourbridge grammar schools, "At one I learnt much in the school, but little from the master; in the other, I learned much from the master, but little in the school." But Johnson could hardly have avoided gaining knowledge anywhere.

JOHNSON AT PEMBROKE COLLEGE, OXFORD; PRIDE AND POVERTY.

Two years spent in a somewhat desultory manner at home intervened between his leaving Stourbridge and commencing his university career at Pembroke College, Oxford. He read a great deal, in an irregular and fitful way, during this period, and astonished the tutors at Pembroke by the extent and variety of his knowledge of books. How he got to the university at all is a matter of some doubt, for his father's affairs were becoming more and more embarrassed; but there is little doubt that the assistance of friends furnished the necessary funds. Promises of further assistance seem to have been given, and not fulfilled; and Johnson's college career was embittered by the sordid cares of poverty. The independence of spirit that marked him during his whole career was already shown here. He flung down the staircase the new shoes a sympathising observer of his raggedness had left outside his door; but he hid his real feelings with Spartan firmness; and few could have suspected, as he lounged at the college gates, entertaining a group of students with leaning that made them stare, how keenly he felt his position. "He was a gay and frolicsome fellow," said one of his university contemporaries to Boswell, "and passed there the happiest part of his life." "Ah, sir," said Johnson, when this account was reported to him, "I was mad and violent. It was bitterness which they mistook for frolic. I was miserably poor, and I thought to fight my way by my literature and my wit, so I disregarded all power and all authority."

START IN LIFE; FIRST ESSAYS IN AUTHORSHIP.

In the autumn of 1731 he left Oxford, after three years' residence, without a degree. Michael Johnson was now quite a broken man. He died at the close of the year. What little could be saved from the wreck of his fortunes was applied to the maintenance of the widow; and Samuel was fain, in July, 1732, to walk to Market Bosworth, where for a time he officiated as usher in the grammar school. But the drudgery was intolerable to him, and he soon gave it up. Presently we find him living as the guest of his old schoolfellow, Mr. Hector, in the house of Mr. Farren, the first resident Birmingham bookseller. Here he wrote his first book, a translation from the French, of a "Voyage to Abyssinia," by Jerome Lobe, a Portuguese. Johnson, with characteristic indolence, dictated part of the book to Mr. Hector from his bed. His morbid melancholy seems to have increased during his university career, and sometimes oppressed him to such an extent as to render him the prey to horrible fancies. On his return to Lichfield, he tried to live by his pen; and removing to Birmingham, wrote thence to Mr. Cave, the London bookseller, with a literary proposal, which does not appear to have met with any response. With as yet no settled means of living, he married Mrs. Porter, the widow of a trader—a fat, florid, vulgar woman, in her forty-ninth year, while he himself was but half her age; but in the eyes of the ungainly scholar she seems to have appeared "a phantom of delight." She had a few hundred pounds in the funds; and presently we find an advertisement in the Gentleman's Magazine, setting forth that "at Edial, near Lichfield, young gentlemen are boarded and taught the Latin and Greek languages by Samuel Johnson." But only three pupils appeared—David Garrick, afterwards the celebrated actor, his younger brother George, and a Master Osley. So Johnson, like many a needy clever man before him, turned his face towards the metropolis. He used afterwards to allude to "the year when I came to London with twopence-halfpenny in my pocket;"—"and thou Davy," he once added, in presence of a brilliant company, to the discomfiture of the prosperous manager, Garrick, "with three-halfpence in thine."

To get his livelihood as an author was now his fixed intention. Wileox the bookseller, to whom he first applied, scanned the robust frame of the applicant, and advised him to invest in a porter's knot. That his ideas of expense were not magnificent is shown by his account of his first way of living, when he lodged in an obscure street near the Strand. He describes himself as dining very well for eightpence, at the Pineapple in New Street—a cut of meat for sixpence, a penny for bread, and a penny for the waiter, made up his very frugal reckoning. After some trouble, he procured literary employment from Mr. Cave; and returning for a time to Lichfield, brought away thence Mrs. Johnson,—his Tetty or Tetsey, as with elephantine playfulness he called her,—and established himself permanently in London.

WORK FOR CAVE; THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

For a series of years he continued to write for the Gentleman's Magazine, published by Cave, at St. John's Gate, Clerkenwell. Biographies of Boerhave, of Admirals Drake and Blake, of Philip Bassetire, and others appear among his earlier articles. He also contributed the yearly prefaces to the volumes; and, indeed, he had a special talent in the composition of introductory notices, dedications, and similar tasks. Among his work done for the Gentleman's Magazine must not be omitted those articles in which, under the title "Debates in the Senate of Liliput," he gave an abstract of the parliamentary debates from November, 1740, to February, 1743. In those days there was no press gallery, furnished with conveniences for reporting the speeches of noble lords and honourable gentlemen in parliament assembled. Even to take a note was a breach of privilege, and for such an offence Woodfall the printer, "Memory Woodfall," was once rebuked at the bar of the Commons. Even an account given from memory had to be hidden under a pseudonym. Johnson, who was a violent Tory, half acknowledged that his reports were not written without bias, and speaking of the Whigs, said with a laugh, "I took care not to let the dogs have the best of it." To task-work of various kinds, for bread, not for fame, was Johnson condemned for many years; and sometimes he was reduced to great straits for common necessities. There is an authenticated story of his having a plate of victuals handed to him upon one occasion behind a screen at Cave's, because he was too ragged to show himself at the prosperous bookseller's table; at another time he significantly signs himself, in a business letter to the same worthy, Impransus, which may be interpreted "dinnerless." It was bitter bread that was gained by literary labour in those days.

The earliest work by which he set people talking about him was his "London," an imitation of the third satire of Juvenal. Pope, the literary autocrat of that period (1738), living in dignified ease at Twickenham, saw the poem, and was sufficiently interested to inquire the name of the author, and to prophesy that the unknown man would soon be unearthed, or, as he called it, déterré.—"Everybody was delighted with it," said a reverend bishop, quoted by Boswell; and, there being no name to it, the first buzz in the literary circles was, "Here is an unknown poet, greater even than Pope." And it is recorded in the Gentleman's Magazine of that year, that it "got to the second edition in the course of a week." But the last line of the poem, "Slow rises worth by poverty depressed," is singularly applicable to Johnson. Twenty years of hard and obscure work lay before him, ere he emerged from the slough of despond of poverty and neglect. How hard the struggle was, is shown by his unavailing efforts to escape from it. He who hated teaching tried vainly for the mastership of a country school, with a salary of sixty pounds. But for the fact that the want of a degree was fatal to the scheme, he would have turned to the study of civil law. He writes to Cave, "If you could spare me another guinea for the history, I should take it very kindly; but if you do not, I shall not think it an injury." Cave also speaks at a later time, while the Dictionary was in progress, of "feeding him with guineas;" that is, doling out those coins one or two at a time, to keep the working author at his task. This was the time when, to his own disadvantage, he made acquaintance with that wild, erratic, profligate, and utterly ungovernable genius, Richard Savage, whose life he afterwards wrote. At this time his dwelling-place was occasionally at some distance from London, as, for instance, at Greenwich; and in later and more prosperous days he once whimsically described to Joshua Reynolds how he and poor Savage had walked round and round St. James's Square all night, neither having enough money to pay for a lodging, but both brimful of patriotism, inveighing against a profligate ministry, and resolved to "stand by their country." This Bohemian Savage had a strange fascination for Johnson. His experiences were varied; he had seen life in its opposite phases, at one time in the nobleman's library, at another in the night cellar where footpads and highwaymen skulked from the thief-taker, or furtively caroused. Of his temper and discretion it is sufficient to state that he began an insolent letter to a nobleman who had been his friend, with the words, "Right Honourable Brute and Booby," and after a few lines of insolence, concluded with a petulant "I defy and despise you," worthy of a Miss Squeers.

JOHNSON'S MARRIED LIFE; THE "VANITY OF HUMAN WISHEES."

He accepted his life of drudgery and hardship with a quiet endurance which told of a true and wise philosophy. He must occasionally have been conscious of a bitter feeling when he saw his friend and pupil, little David Garrick, rapidly advancing to fame and fortune, by exhibiting his painted face on the stage, while he himself was toiling on, not able on all days to procure necessaries, and sorely put to it at the best of times to satisfy the demands of his elderly charmer, who seems not to have been so considerate to him as his constant affection and care for her entitled him to expect. "I have been told by Mrs. Desmoulins, who before her marriage lived for some time with Mrs. Johnson at Hampstead, that she indulged herself in country air and nice living, at an unsuitable expense, while her husband was drudging in the smoke of London, and that she by no means treated him with that complacency which is the most engaging quality in a wife." If Mrs. Desmoulins lived with the old woman at Hampstead, it was not quite kind on her part to expose the weaknesses of her hostess to that old woman of the opposite sex, James Boswell, who would be sure to put it on record; but it gives us a glimpse of the sturdy, rough-mannered, honest-hearted man, toiling on in his untidy garret library in Gough Square, Fleet Street, and believing in his doubtful spouse to the last, even to the extent of recording on her tombstone, of course in Latin, that she was beautiful, cultured, ingenious, and pious. He kept her wedding ring as an especial treasure to the last day of his life, and held her memory in honour. A gentle-hearted man was this uncouth, slovenly scholar, for all his roughness; but, naturally enough, he had little sympathy for what he called "foppish lamentations"—complaints of the minor ills of life, which appeared very small indeed to him, who had tasted the bitterness of real want and sorrow during a series of years. It was not safe, however, to beard the lion or the bear in his den. When purse-proud Osborne, the bookseller, ventured too far, presuming on the poor author's position, he was made by the most summary method to understand his mistake. "The fellow was impudent to me, sir," said Johnson to Boswell, in explanation, "and I knocked him down."

The drudgery of his life was, however, broken occasionally by fitful rays of the sunshine of success. While Mrs. Johnson was inhabiting those Hampstead lodgings, her husband occasionally came forth from Gough Square to pay her a visit; and at Hampstead, according to Boswell, he wrote much, if not all, of his second poem, "The Vanity of Human Wishes." Great pecuniary profit this poem did certainly not bring him; he received for it only fifteen pounds. But it confirmed the favourable impression already produced by his "London," and vindicated his pretensions to be considered a poet. Like "London," it is imitated from Juvenal; and the object is to show that man walketh in a vain shadow. "Vanity of vanities" is the text on which he writes; "all is vanity." Great men are taken as the types of especial forms of ambition. Wolsey the courtier stands "in full-blown dignity." Through him the rays of royal bounty shine. But the sovereign's countenance is withdrawn from him; he falls,

"Remembered folly stings,
And his last sighs reproach the faith of kings."

Charles XII., the frantic Alexander of the North, is to bear witness "on what foundation stands the warrior's pride;" the vanity of the wish for kingly titles is set forth in the example of that unfortunate Elector of Bavaria, who a few years before had paid for the short possession of the dignity of Emperor of Germany, with defeat and humiliation that broke his heart. Sir Walter Scott was accustomed, with genial enthusiasm, to praise the dignity and grandeur of the poem. Byron's estimate of this work is judicious and sound, though tinged with his own misanthropy. "Read Johnson's 'Vanity of Human Wishes,'" he says; "all his examples and mode of giving them sublime, as well as the latter part, with the exception of an occasional couplet." Then he takes objection, not without reason, to the opening line,

"Let observation with extended view," as heavy and superfluous. "But," he continues, "'tis a grand poem—and so true! True as the tenth (the famous tenth satire) of Juvenal himself. The lapse of ages changes all things—time—language—the earth—the bounds of the sea—the stars of the sky, and everything about, round, and underneath man, except man himself, who has always been, and always will be, an unlucky rascal. The infinite variety of lives conducts but to death, and the infinity of wishes leads but to disappointment." Thus wrote Byron in his Ravenna Diary of 1821; and none had more bitterly experienced the disappointment of these aspirations founded on the prospect of worldly praise and ambition, than the man who "awoke one morning to find himself famous," and on another turned his back for ever on the society that had loaded him with obloquy as exaggerated as its former laudation.

THE TRAGEDY OF IRENE; JOHNSON'S FRIENDS, "LANKEY" AND "BEAU."

In 1749, through the kindness of Garrick, who had now become manager of Drury Lane, a work of Johnson's, written some years before, was introduced to the public. "Irene," a tragedy, was performed at Drury Lane. It failed to please; and, indeed, it is heavy and wearisome to a degree; but it brought him nearly three hundred pounds in author's rights and copyright. He said he felt "like the monument," unshaken by his ill-success; but he acquiesced in the popular verdict, and never wrote for the stage again. In this year he commenced the series of essays known as "The Rambler."

By this time, too, he had begun the work with which his name is always associated in literary history, that Dictionary of the English language, which, imperfect as it may appear when judged by the standard of the present day, is certainly a marvellous achievement when we consider the circumstances under which it was undertaken and completed. The chief London booksellers took shares in the venture—the names of Mr. Robert Dodsley and the two Messrs. Longman curiously linking the past with the present—and Johnson undertook the task on his own responsibility, and fondly hoped to complete it in three years. His calculations were rather vague. "Sir," said Dr. Adams, "how can you do this in three years?" "Sir," replied Johnson, sententiously, "I have no doubt that I can do it in three years." "But the French Academy," urged Adams, "which consists of forty members, took forty years to compile their dictionary." Johnson's reply was decisive: "Sir, thus it is; this is the proportion. Let me see; forty times forty are sixteen hundred. As three to sixteen hundred so is the proportion of an Englishman to a Frenchman."

Of course there was no gainsaying so logical and lucid an estimate; but amid the toils of dictionary-making drudgery, and the struggle against the morbid melancholy and indolence proceeding mainly from chronic ill-health—long afterwards he declared in a letter to Boswell that after his twentieth year he rarely had a day entirely free from pain—we occasionally get a glimpse of Johnson in a more cheerful mood at this period of his career. One whimsical scene comes especially before us. Topham Beauclerk and Bennet Langton—Beau and Lankey, as he nicknamed them—were especial favourites with the sage at this time, and continued so, until death terminated the friendship. He liked them none the less because both were gentlemen of good birth, Beauclerk belonging to the St. Albans family, and one of Langton's ancestors, as Johnson complacently remarked, having received a grant from Edward III. Topham Beauclerk was, even for those days, essentially a 'fast' man, and there was something ludicrous in the close friendship between him and Johnson, respect for whom, however, always kept him on his best behaviour in the great man's presence. "What a coalition!" cried Garrick, on hearing of this close companionship. "I shall have to bail my old friend out of the round-house." In the summer of the year 1752, "one night at three in the morning," as the Irish song has it, there was a great knocking at the door of Johnson's chambers in the Temple. Down sallied the indignant lexicographer, armed with a poker, and found in the disturbers of his peace Messrs. Beauclerk and Langton, who had been supping, probably, "not wisely but too well," at a tavern, and now came to invite the author of the "Rambler" to a ramble. "What is it, you dogs?" cried Johnson, amused at their impudence. "I'll have a frisk with you." So forth they started, and helped the early fruiterers and greengrocers in Covent Garden to arrange their hampers (Johnson's assistance must have been valuable), and repaired to a tavern, where they made a bowl of bishop, and emptied it. Thence they proceeded by boat to Billingsgate market, and Johnson absolutely determined, with Beau, to continue their "frisk" through the day;—scolding Langton, who cried off on the plea of having to breakfast with some young ladies, for "leaving his social friends, to sit with a set of wretched unideal girls." "I heard of your frolic t'other night—you'll be in the Chronicle," said Garrick to Johnson; whereat the latter observed confidentially to some friends, "He durst not do such a thing; his wife would not let him."

THE DICTIONARY PUBLISHED; LETTER TO LORD CHESTERFIELD.

At length, after eight years of labour, the Dictionary was ready; and courtly Lord Chesterfield, by whom Johnson at the time of its commencement had been regaled with "the chameleon's diet—promise-crammed"—took upon himself to write two papers in the World, recommending the work, and assuming the air of a patron. This was too much for Johnson to stand. His honest blood boiled within him at the hollow compliments of the polite worldling; and he sat down and wrote that famous "letter," which, preserved to us by the indefatigable Boswell, remains to show posterity what kind of man was the Right Honourable Philip Dormer Stanhope, Earl of Chesterfield. There is at once dignity and pathos in the reproachful sentence in which the poor man of letters explains how he has been treated. "Seven years, my lord, have now passed," he writes, "since I waited in your outward rooms, or was repulsed from your door, during which time I have been pushing on my work through difficulties, of which it is useless to complain, and have brought it at last to the verge of publication, without one act of assistance, one word of encouragement, or one smile of favour. . . . Is not a patron, my lord, one who looks with unconcern on a man struggling for life in the water, and when he has reached ground encumbers him with help? The notice which you have been pleased to take of my labours, had it been early, had been kind: but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it; till I am solitary, and cannot impart it; till I am known, and do not want it."

In some quarters this plain speaking was censured as impertinence. But in those years of toil and drudgery Johnson had suffered much. He had lost the wife he loved, and had endured all the bitterness of hope deferred; and he had a right to speak out. His explanation of his conduct on this occasion has a sturdy English ring about it. "Sir," he said of Chesterfield, "after making great professions, he had for many years taken no notice of me; but when my Dictionary was coming out, he fell a scribbling in the World about it. Upon which I wrote to him a letter, expressed in civil terms, but such as might show him that I did not mind what he said or wrote, and that I had done with him." We do not think Johnson lost much by thus silencing Lord Chesterfield.

JOHNSON AND THE BOOKSELLERS; TASK-WORK AND DRUDGERY.

A work so important as the English Dictionary could not fail to raise the author to a position of eminence. The University of Oxford bestowed the degree of Master of Arts upon Johnson. At Oxford, which he visited in 1754, he was received with distinction. Laudatory letters poured in; and Garrick wrote an epigram, in which he dr clared that the boast that one English soldier could beat ten Frenchmen was now not only justified, but exceeded by the fact; here had a single Englishman beaten the whole French Academy, whose Dictionary was not yet ready.

"For Johnson, well armed, like a hero of yore, Has beat forty French, and will beat forty more!"

wrote the sprightly little actor; and Johnson was better pleased with his old friend's smart lines, than with many a more studied compliment.

But though fame had come, poverty had not yet gone. Johnson had still to earn his bread by task-work, and was not yet, to use his own expression, "set above the necessity of making provision for the day that was passing over him." In 1756 he was even arrested for debt, and bailed by his friend Richardson, the author of "Sir Charles Grandison." We find him accepting a guinea for writing a dedication for a new newspaper, the Daily Chronicle, furnishing reviews of books, and essays on various subjects; depending on the booksellers for work, and honestly declaring them to be his best patrons, without whom his Dictionary could never have been produced. Of the remuneration he received for that work he said, "It was very well. The booksellers are generous, liberal-minded men." With the Messrs. Dilly of the Poultry he maintained a cordial friendship to the last; and he had a high opinion of Dodsley and Cave. There were exceptions of course. Some extraordinary agreements exist, showing the degraded position of the Grub Street author, such as that between poor mad Kit Smart and a worthy named Gardner, who went to the unhappy author, then in the depths of poverty, and engaged him to write in a publication called the Universal Visitor on the following remarkable conditions, as set forth in a document found among Smart's papers when that most miserable of literates went mad. Poor Kit was to write exclusively for the Universal Visitor, a sixpenny monthly magazine. He was to have one-sixth of the profits, and the agreement was to be in force for ninety-nine years. In fact, Gardner took a long lease of Kit Smart, but Death came in and broke it. Johnson, in his kindness, had done Smart's work for him on this precious publication, little knowing the true state of the case. "I wrote, sir," he afterwards said, "for some months in the Universal Visitor for poor Smart, not then knowing the terms on which he was engaged to write, and thinking I was doing him good. I hoped his wits would soon return to him. Mine returned to me, and I wrote in the Universal Visitor no longer."

JOHNSON'S ESSAYS; RASSELAS; CRITICAL OPINIONS; LETTERS.

"The Idler," published in the Universal Chronicle, in numbers between April 1758 and 1760, in many respects appears as a continuation of "The Rambler." Some of the papers were written as hastily as an ordinary letter. Boswell speaks of one, on the authority of Langton, as being commenced by the Doctor at Oxford, about half an hour before the post went out for London, and consigned to the mail without even being read through by its author. At the beginning of 1759, his mother, who was ninety years old, fell ill at Lichfield, or rather, began to break up rapidly from mere age. Then the best part of Johnson's character came out, as it always did when the depths of that great nature were stirred. He writes to the aged mother with the affectionate simplicity of a boy, eagerly tells her "you have been the best mother, and I believe the best woman in the world," begs pardon "for all that I have done ill, and all that I have omitted to do well," and is full of loving self-reproach, lest he should have failed in his duty to his aged parent; though he had always shown himself a dutiful son, and had to the best of his ability contributed to support the mother he revered and loved in ease and comfort. All the money he could scrape together he sent off to Lichfield. "I shall send a bill of twenty pounds in a few days, which I thought to have brought to my mother; but God suffered it not," he writes regretfully, on hearing of her death. Some few debts and the funeral expenses remained to be paid; and to get the money for this he sat down and wrote his tale, "Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia."

Of this work very different opinions have been pronounced by various critics. Boswell, of course, speaks of it in terms of extravagant laudation. Johnson wrote it, and that was enough for him. On the other hand, Hazlitt calls it the most melancholy and debilitating moral speculation that was ever put forth. Sir Walter Scott's description is the best. "The work can scarce be termed a narrative," he says, "being in a great measure void of incident. It is rather a set of dialogues on the various vicissitudes of human life, its follies, its fears, its hopes, its wishes, and the disappointment in which all terminate. The style is in Johnson's best manner, enriched and rendered sonorous by the triads and quaternions which he so much loved." Some critics, on the other hand, maintain that these very triads and quaternions, the tendency to hammer out the sense into long periods, to repeat it, to balance it altogether needlessly with antithesis, constituted vices in Johnson's style. Wisdom the book certainly contains, and lofty morality and precept; but the characters are no more real than are the stilted and bombastic heroes who utter grand sentiments in the tragedies of Racine and Corneille. But the book has its undoubted value, and Christopher North was quite right when he declared in his "Noctes Ambrosianæ" that never were the expenses of a mother's funeral more gloriously defrayed by a son, than the funeral of Samuel Johnson's mother by the price of "Rasselas."

At this period, and indeed at all times in his long career, Johnson appears to great advantage in his letters. The turn of language, indeed, is artificial here and there; but the writer's good heart is seen throughout. Directly he became known, he received a number of applications requesting his good offices in matters of all kinds; and even where the applicants had the smallest possible claim on his consideration, even where he could not comply, he never forgot to be kind. One of the most remarkable instances of solicitation was on the part of a lady, a stranger, asking him to get the Archbishop of Canterbury's aid in sending her son to the University. This cool request might have put milder men than Johnson out of patience; but he replied in a long letter full of good and kindly feeling; at the same time he does not fail to put the unconscionable application in its true light. "When you made your request to me," he says, "you should have considered, madam, what you were asking. You ask me to solicit a great man, to whom I never spoke, for a young person whom I had never seen, upon a supposition which I had no means of knowing to be true. There is no reason why, amongst all the great, I should choose to supplicate the Archbishop, nor why, among all the possible objects of his bounty, the Archbishop should choose your son." After very kindly setting forth the reasons that would make a request to the Archbishop, on his part, utterly unwarrantable, he concludes with a pleasant sentence to soothe the mother's disappointment. "I have seen your son this morning," he says; "he seems a pretty youth, and will perhaps find some better friend than I can procure him; but though he should at last miss the University, he may still be wise, useful, and happy."

JOHNSON A PENSIONER; SHEBBEARE AND SHERIDAN.

The year 1762 was memorable in the life of

Johnson as the epoch from which was to date for him competence and leisure, a permanent relief from all apprehensions of "toil, envy, want, the patron, and the gaol." George II. had been utterly regardless of the claims of literary men to a share of the royal favour. Indeed, "boets and bainters" were his aversion; but with the accession of George III. a better time for literature began. The new king's taste was not irreproachable, nor was his mind very highly cultivated. "A good deal of Shakespeare is sad stuff, but one mustn't say so. Don't you think so? What, what?" was the confidential observation of the royal critic to Miss Burney, the author of "Evelina;" but at least he was English—"a Briton," as he expressed it—by birth and education, and honestly wished to encourage art, science, and literature in his dominions; and recognizing in Johnson the most respectable type of the literary character, bestowed on him a pension of three hundred pounds a year. "It is not given you for anything you are to do, but for what you have done," Lord Bute said to him in reply to Johnson's blunt question, "Pray, my Lord, what am I expected to do for this pension?" for the "Dictionary-maker," as Horace Walpole sarcastically called him, had toiled along a path so entirely unilluminated by Court favour, that he could hardly believe his senses when the sun shone on him at last. The definitions of pension and pensioner he had given in his Dictionary were also such that he had considerable misgivings as to whether he could, with honour, accept the proffered bounty; but Sir Joshua Reynolds, whose advice he asked, with great good sense urged him to take what had been spontaneously offered; and Johnson, in his letter of thanks to Lord Bute, expresses his sense of the delicate manner in which the gift had been bestowed. "You have conferred your favours," he says, "on a man who has neither alliance nor interest, who has not merited them by services nor courted them by officiousness; you have spared him the shame of solicitation, and the anxiety of suspense." Some drops of bitterness were mingled in the cup of Johnson's satisfaction on this occasion. Dr. Shebbeare, a violent political scribbler, who had been twice imprisoned, and had once exhibited himself in the pillory for libel, was pensioned by Lord Bute at the same time as the lexicographer. "The king has pensioned a Ho-bear and a She-bear," wrote a wicked wag in one of the newspapers. Thomas Sheridan, the elocutionist, whose exertions in tuition Johnson compared to "burning a farthing candle at Dover to show fight at Calais," afterwards received a similar favour. "What! have they given him a pension?" growled the sage. "Then it is time I relinquished mine." This was one of those stones that Johnson was accustomed to throw at random, in the belief that it hurt no man to have harsh things said of him; but it hit Sheridan so hard that he never forgave the insult. Long afterwards Johnson sent a message by Boswell, expressing a desire to see his old acquaintance, and shake him by the hand; but Sheridan did not respond,—and once, when invited to dine at a friend's house, went off in a huff on hearing that the Doctor was an expected guest; though Johnson had added to his splenetic outburst the mollifying words, "However, I am glad that Mr. Sheridan has a pension, for he is a very good man." The wounds of affection are hard to heal; but those of vanity fester longest.

BOSWELL MAKES JOHNSON'S ACQUAINTANCE.

It was when Johnson had arrived at this haven of rest, and had bid adieu once and for all to duns and sordid cares, that he met his fate in the shape of his biographer, Boswell, who was introduced to him by worthy Mr. Thomas Davies, once the actor "who mouths a sentence as curs mouth a bone," according to Churchill, the satirist,—afterwards a bookseller at 8, Russell Street, Covent Garden,—ultimately an author, and a very indifferent one. Boswell, who had an inveterate hankering for acquaintance with any celebrity—Paoli, the Corsican, or Jack Wilkes, or Churchill, or Tom Paine, it was all the same to him—had long been pestering Davies to bring about a meeting between himself and one whose conversation was reported to be so peculiarly excellent,—and at length, on the memorable 16th of May, 1763, a day to be marked with a white stone in the Boswellian annals, as Boswell was drinking tea in the back parlour of Russell Street, with Davies, the stalwart form of the great lexicographer was seen stalking through the shop towards them. "Look, my lord, it comes!" cried the theatrical Davies, in the words of Horatio in Hamlet. Boswell was in a flutter, and, knowing Johnson's prejudice against North Britons alike in human or in newspaper form, whispered an injunction to Davies to conceal his nationality; whereupon that waggish bibliopole introduced him as Mr. Boswell, from Scotland. Of course, Boswell, better at a blunder than Goldsmith himself, made matters worse by stammering out, "Mr. Johnson, I do indeed come from Scotland, but I cannot help it." This wise speech brought upon him the retort, "That, sir, I find, is what a very great many of your countrymen cannot help;" which stroke, Boswell assures us, "stunned him a good deal." Altogether, in this first interview, poor Bozzy did not escape being clawed by the he-bear, though he had his own obtrusive toadyism to thank for what he received. Boswell himself relates the circumstances with a serene unconsciousness of the light in which he was exhibiting himself, which is exceedingly amusing. "What do you think of Garrick?" said Johnson, addressing himself to Davies. "He has refused me an order for the play for Miss Williams, because he knows the house will be full, and that an order would be worth three shillings." "Eager to take any opportunity to get into conversation with him," writes the obsequious Boswell with refreshing frankness, "I ventured to say, 'O sir, I cannot think Mr. Garrick would grudge such a trifle to you.' Now it was one of Johnson's peculiarities that he would allow no one to abuse "his little Davy" but himself, and he was down upon Master Boswell in an instant. "Sir," said he, with a stern look, "I have known David Garrick longer than you have done; and I know no right you have to talk to me on the subject." "Perhaps I deserved this check," continues Boswell, "for it was rather presumptuous in me, an entire stranger, to express any doubt of his animadversion upon his old acquaintance and pupil. I now felt myself much mortified." But Boswell stood his ground, nevertheless; and was consoled by Davies's observing, as he let him out at the door, in reply to Bozzy's rueful complaints of the "hard blows" he had received, "Don't be uneasy; I can see he likes you very well."

How Boswell lost no time in improving an acquaintance thus auspiciously begun—how he called upon Johnson in the Temple a few days afterwards, and being asked to stay, modestly said, "Sir, I am afraid that I intrude upon you—it is benevolent to allow me to sit and hear you,"—whereat the sage, not impervious to compliment, was evidently pleased, and asked Boswell to come again, which Boswell accordingly did—how Johnson informed his visitor that he generally went abroad at four in the afternoon, and seldom returned till two in the morning (his pension having made him lazier than ever)—how the two supped at the Mitre in Fleet Street, and the ingenious Boswell proceeded to lay his innermost thoughts open to the sage—whereupon the latter, appreciating the honest admiration in which the confidence arose, suddenly reached across to his delighted companion, and roared out, ("called with warmth," Boswell says,) "Give me your hand—I have taken a liking to you;" and how a life-long friendship was thus struck between these two men, so different from each other,—all these things are recorded with loving fidelity in Boswell's inimitable life of his hero. On this particular night the young man fairly boiled over with enthusiasm. "It is very good in you," he said, "to allow me to be with you thus. Had it been foretold to me some years ago, that I should pass an evening with the author of the 'Rambler,' how should I have exulted!" What I then expressed was sincerely from the heart. Johnson was satisfied that it was, and cordially answered, "Sir, I am glad we have met. I hope we shall pass many evenings, and mornings, too, together;" whereupon they finished a couple of bottles of port, and sat till between one and two in the morning.

JOHNSON'S CONVERSATIONS; HIS POLITICAL OPINIONS.

This was only the first of many entertainments at the theatre and elsewhere, at which Boswell was only too glad to pick up and carry home for insertion in his humorous journal every word of wisdom, or sophistry, or petulance, or downright rudeness that fell from the lips of the "great cham." It was enough that Johnson had said a thing, for Boswell to flutter down upon it as a pigeon upon a pea. Even his Scottish patriotism does not prevent him from recording the hard things Johnson said about "Caledonia stern and wild." A Mr. Ogilvie, at one of those Mitre suppers had chosen to launch out in the praises of his native country, its fertility, etc. Driven at last into a corner by the contradiction of Goldsmith, who, having studied at Edinburgh, claimed to know something of the country, he took refuge in the impregnable position that Scotland certainly had a great many noble wild prospects. But the tremendous Johnson came swooping down upon him with his satirical lance in rest. "I believe, sir, you have a great many. Norway, too, has noble wild prospects; and Lapland is remarkable for prodigious noble wild prospects. But, sir, let me tell you, the noblest prospect which a Scotchman ever sees is the high road that leads him to England." "An unexpected and pointed sally," Boswell calls it, and rewarded with a roar of applause. It was rather cheap wit, to come from "my illustrious friend."

In politics Johnson was, as has been said, a high Tory, and moreover the highest of high churchmen. But his Jacobitism was of a theoretical and cloudy nature, and for practical politics he cared very little; his expressed opinion being that he would not give half a guinea to live under one government rather than another. "I cannot now curse the House of Hanover," he said with a smile, after accepting his pension, "nor would it be decent for me to drink King James's health in the wine that King George gives me the money to pay for. But, sir, I think that the pleasure of cursing the House of Hanover, and drinking King James's health, are amply overbalanced by three hundred pounds a year." His anger, however, was violently excited, when any one talked of the necessity of standing up for the liberty of the people, or of preserving a balance against the crown. When Sir Adam Ferguson took up this line of argument, Johnson, after rudely denouncing his antagonist as "a vile whig," exclaimed, "Why all this jealousy of the power of the crown? The crown has not power enough." It was a favourite theory of his, that the effects of good or bad government did not penetrate so low down as among the mass of the people. "What Frenchman," he unaccountably exclaimed, "is prevented from living as he pleases?" Yet very little personal observation of the French peasantry and their condition at that time, when the great chaos of the Revolution was at hand, might have convinced him that governments have an influence in making a nation happy or the reverse. He was angry at any assumption by women of public or prominent positions, and highly applauded young Richard Brinsley Sheridan for not allowing his first wife, the beautiful Miss Linley, to display her musical talents in public after their marriage. When Boswell told him how he had heard a woman preach at a quaker's meeting, "Sir," said Johnson, "a woman's preaching is like a dog's walking on his hind legs. It is not done well; but you are surprised to find it done at all."

HIS INTERCOURSE WITH BOSWELL, AND WITH THE THRALES.

That his liking for Boswell, even at an early stage of their acquaintance, was real, he proved by accompanying his worshipper to Harwich, where the young man was to embark for Holland, to pursue his law studies at Utrecht. "I must see thee out of England; I will accompany you as far as Harwich," he cried, to Bozzy's infinite delight; and he was as good as his word, and a very agreeable travelling companion he made, entering freely into conversation with an old lady in the stage-coach, confessing that he had been an idle fellow all his life, and introducing Boswell to her notice as one who rivalled him in that particular. "On this journey he astonished his fellow-traveller by the "outward and visible signs" by which he evinced his enjoyment of his meals, in spite of the essay he had written in the "Rambler" against "gulosity." "I never knew," says his biographer, "any man who relished good eating more than he did. When at table he was totally absorbed in the business of the moment; nor would he, unless when in very high company, say one word, or even pay the least attention to what was said by others, until he had satisfied his appetite, which was so fierce, and indulged with such intemperance, that while in the act of eating, the veins of his forehead swelled. . . . Johnson, though he could be rigidly abstemious, was not a temperate man either in eating or drinking. He could refrain, but he could not use moderately."

The University of Dublin in 1764 sent him the degree of Doctor of Laws, which he acknowledged in a very courtly letter to Dr. Leland. He had by this time quitted the Temple, and was living in a house in Johnson's Court, Fleet Street. To Boswell he has humorously described himself as "Johnson of that ilk."

A source of great social enjoyment to Johnson for many years was his intimacy with the Thrale family. Mr. Thrale was a wealthy brewer, the predecessor of Barclay and Perkins, of Southwark, which borough he represented in Parliament; and both he and the lively agreeable half-learned lady, his wife, made the sage quite at home in their house at Southwark and at Streatham Park, where a room was always kept in readiness for him. This pleasant family intercourse was the more desirable for him, as his constitutional melancholy returned at times with such force as to drive him almost to despair. One occasion in particular is recorded, when worthy Mr. Thrale, coming by chance to visit Johnson in London, found him upon his knees in an agony of despairing supplication, accusing himself of such things that the kindly visitor put his hand in horror over the poor hypochondriac's mouth, and insisted on carrying him off, there and then, to the healthier atmosphere of Streatham. For fifteen years did the pleasant friendship continue, without interruption. Then Thrale died, and it was found that he had named Johnson as one of his executors. The brewery was sold for a hundred and thirteen thousand pounds. Mrs. Thrale afterwards married Signor Piozzi, an Italian musician, to the somewhat comical horror of her friends, especially of Miss Fanny Burney, whose edifying expressions of disgust at Mrs. Thrale's throwing herself away on a member of the musical profession are somewhat ludicrous, from the fact that her own father was maintaining his family by hard work as a teacher of music—Signor Piozzi's profession. Mrs. Piozzi, after Johnson's death, published an amusing little book of "Anecdotes of Dr. Johnson," for which Boswell, who considered this as poaching on his domain, fell foul of her, and wicked Dr. Wolcott (Peter Pindar) made fun of them both in a poem entitled "Bozzy and Piozzi."

THE EDITION OF SHAKESPEARE; HIS REPARTES.

Some years previously Johnson had undertaken to bring out an edition of Shakespeare's works, with notes, and a biography. The task was not in all respects a congenial one to him, and his constitutional indolence delayed its completion year after year, and a good deal of money had been paid in the form of subscriptions, Johnson having promised that the book should be published before Christmas, 1757.

"He for subscribers baits his hook, wrote malignant Churchill; and at last, nine years after the time first arranged, the book made its appearance. To a bookseller's assistant who, on paying him some subscriptions for this work, ventured to express surprise that Dr. Johnson did not make a memorandum for a list of subscribers, he replied "that he should not print a list of subscribers, for two reasons—the first, that he had lost all the names; and the second, that he had spent all the money." Of the readiness of his repartee, in which, however, he did not always consider the feelings of his interlocutors, the following is a good instance: "You know, sir," said an advocate for the wine cup to him, "drinking drives away care, and makes us forget whatever is disagreeable. Would you not allow a man to drink for that reason?" "Yes, sir," replied Johnson, "if he sat next you." He could, indeed, seldom resist the opportunity of saying a smart thing, especially by way of reply; and Boswell, in his literal obtuseness, often chronicles as the doctor's deliberate opinions, what may probably have been only thrown out for the sake of saying a good thing. Thus Master Bozzy, who himself seldom contributed anything to the conversation, but an echo of the sayings of others, of Johnson in particular, on one occasion chose to lament "that Goldsmith would, upon every occasion, endeavour to shine, by which he often exposed himself." Langton mentioned Addison's reply to a lady who rallied him on his taciturnity: "Madam,
And takes your cash, but where's the book?"

I have but ninepence in ready money, but I can draw for a thousand pounds." "I observed," says self-complacent Boswell, that Goldsmith had a great deal of gold in his cabinet; but not content with that, was always taking out his purse." "Yes, sir," said Johnson, "and that so often an empty purse." Now, though Johnson loved a joke at Goldy's expense, this could never have been his deliberate opinion of his friend's conversation. He knew the author of the "Traveller" better than that. Boswell once rallied him on being hard on a certain political lady writer. "I have not been severe upon her," said Johnson. "Yes, sir," persisted Boswell, "you have made her ridiculous." "That was already done, sir," cried Johnson. "To endeavour to make her ridiculous is like blacking a chimney."

THE JOURNEY TO THE HEBRIDES.

Johnson was essentially a London man. As he himself expressed it, "the high tide of life was found at Charing Cross." A walk down Fleet Street had greater charms for him than a ramble through the most magnificent scenery; though he described the exhilaration of fast travelling in a post-chaise as realizing his most complete idea of happiness. But Boswell managed to inflame him with a desire to visit not only the Highlands of Scotland, but the remote Hebrides. For some years the project remained unfulfilled; but Boswell was a persevering man. "I knew that if he were once launched from the metropolis, he would go forward very well," he sagely remarked, "and I got our common friends there to assist in setting him afloat." In 1773 the vision of Boswell was realized, and he was in the seventh heaven of exultation when his ponderous idol actually arrived in Edinburgh. He bore him off to his own house, and Mrs. Boswell sedulously prepared the tea-board in readiness for the distinguished visitor, who in a critique on a work by Jonas Hanway, the despiser of tea, had declared himself "a hardened and shameless tea-drinker, who has for twenty years diluted his meals with the infusion of this fascinating plant."

Here it was that Boswell declared his little four months' old baby Veronica should have five hundred pounds of additional fortune because Johnson was pleased with her, and "she would be held close to him: which was a proof from single nature, that his figure was not horrid." On this journey Johnson, on the whole, behaved very well. He was much flattered by the respect shown to him by such men as Robertson, the historian, and Adam Smith, the author of the "Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations," and Adam Ferguson. He was much impressed with the novelty of the scenes through which he travelled, and put up good-humouredly enough with the inconveniences of the journey. Of course he could not give up the sport of teasing Boswell about Scotland; that would have been too much to ask; but he kept criticism within the bounds of good-humour. "I told him," says Boswell, who had been pointing out the beauties of the Firth of Forth, "that the port here was the mouth of the river or water of Leith." "Not Lethe," said Mr. Naime. "Why, sir," said Dr. Johnson, "when a Scotchman sets out from this port for England, he forgets his native country." Naime—"I hope, sir, you will forget England here." Johnson—"Then it will be still more Lethe."

During this memorable journey Boswell had an opportunity, dear to his ravenous vanity, of shining with a kind of reflected lustre, caught from the "great lexicographer," and sometimes he rather overdid it, to his own grievous discomfiture and perturbation. If Boswell was on many occasions too anxious to trot out his "illustrious friend," and to exhibit Johnson to an admiring company much as a self-satisfied showman might exhibit the tricks of a dancing bear, he had himself to thank for the fact that his bear did not always, like the Bruin mentioned in Goldsmith's "She Stoops to Conquer," dance to the genteelst of tunes, "but sometimes gave the showman a moral flap with his paw, or a hug that astonished him." Witness that memorable day when, the sage's digestion being probably out of order, poor Boswell had been even more inquisitive than usual, with the view of extracting information from the great lexicographer. A Roman spectator in a circus would undoubtedly have cried "habet" to see the punishment the unhappy victim of the "disease of admiration" received on that occasion. "Sir," roared Johnson, "I will not be put to the question! Do you not consider, sir, that these are not the manners of a gentleman? I will not be baited with 'what' and 'why?' What is this? What is that? Why is a cow's tail long? Why is a fox's tail bushy?" "Why, sir, you are so good, that I venture to trouble you," urged Boswell. "Sir, my being so good is no reason why you should be so ill," was the retort of the un mollified Johnson. "Sit down, sir," was his gruff injunction on another occasion, when Boswell had come behind his chair at dinner, to catch the words of wisdom. "Running about at meals!"

EFFECTS OF TRAVEL ON HIS OPINIONS; HIS TIMIDITY AWAY FROM HOME.

During this memorable tour, however, Johnson learnt much; and, indeed, became possessed of an uneasy, but by no means an unwholesome feeling, that he had been all his life inclined to judge things by too narrow a standard, and that it would have advantaged him had he been, to use a learned expression of his own, more peregrinate, and less governed by stay-at-home prejudices. Still he now and then did battle for his beloved metropolis, though he did not fail to note in others the deficiency of which he was but half conscious in himself. When told that Mrs. Macsweyn, the obliging landlady of the island of Col, had never been on the mainland, he remarked, "This is being rather behindhand with life. I would at least go and see Glenelg." But when Boswell reminded him that he himself had never seen anything beyond his native island, the sage replied, "But, sir, by seeing London, I have seen as much of life as the world can show." He evidently became aware, however, of the numerous things, no farther off than the Hebrides, not included in his philosophy. When Boswell, according to his custom, bustled about in his fussy manner, on their preparing to cross to Mull, Johnson very promptly rebuked him for rushing to and fro in his usual purposeless fashion. "It does not hasten us a bit," growled the sage. "It is getting on horseback in a ship. All boys do it; and you are longer a boy than others." He would not by any means relinquish his privilege of quizzing Bozzy's country and countrymen. When he was in the mood, he would jeer at the Scots, until even Boswell's patience was tried. One of these fits of railing came upon him on the passage in Ulinish's boat to Talisker. He declared of the Scots that "they had hardly any trade, any money, or any elegance, before the Union," until which time he declared they had been like savages, who had not yet come into contact with a civilized people. "We have taught you," said he, "and we'll do the same in time to all barbarous nations; to the Cherokees, and at last to the Ouran-outangs," and he laughed as gleefully as if Lord Monboddo, he of the "tailed-men" theory, had been by to hear. Poor Boswell was obliged to take very low ground, in the effort to defend his countrymen; but Johnson, in his contradictory mood, would admit nothing, not even that the Scots had the means of fuddling themselves, until the union with England in 1707 admitted them to that privilege. "We had wine before the union," urged poor Boswell. "No, sir," cried Johnson, "you had some weak stuff, the refuse of France, which would not make you drunk." "I assure you, sir," persisted the patriotic heir of Auchinleck "there was a great deal of drunkenness" (which, by the way, was not likely to become extinct so long as Boswell himself lived). "No, sir," roared the incorrigible contradictor, "there were people, who died of dropsies, which they contracted in trying to get drunk."

It was strange to see how timid the untravelled man was amid new and strange scenes, and how he clung to Boswell, on whom he now depended, even while he patronised him. At Glenelg, when they were proceeding towards the inn, at evening, Boswell thought of riding forward to have everything ready for the great man, who was jogging meditatively onward, with three men in attendance upon him. "I thought," writes Boswell, "there could be no harm in leaving him for a little while. He called me with a tremendous shout, and was really in a passion with me for leaving him. I told him my intentions, but he was not satisfied, and said, 'Do you know I should as soon have thought of picking a pocket as doing so?' 'I am diverted with you, sir,' cried Boswell. 'Sir, I could never be diverted with incivility,' was the sage's retort; 'doing such a thing makes one lose confidence in the man who has done it, as one cannot tell what he may do next.'" And poor Boswell, who had simply intended to see to his illustrious friend's accommodation, when he tried once more to defend himself, had to swallow the following additional piece of civility:—"Sir, had you gone on, I was thinking that I should have returned with you to Edinburgh, and then have parted from you, and never spoken to you more." The "I should have returned with you to Edinburgh" before the final parting is delicious. But persevering Bozzy made his peace; and the sage condescended to say, "Let's think no more on't," and to own that he had spoken in a passion. He was not very gentle to those who, like Sir Allan Maclean, tried to vaunt the grand rocks and lakes of the "land of the mountain and the flood," as a compensation for the paucity of fertile soil. "Your country consists of two things," he said, "stone and water. There is, indeed, a little earth above the stone in some places, but a very little; and the stone is always appearing. It is like a man in rags; the naked skin is always peeping out."

His Jacobitism, which, though softened by lapse of time, was always an ardent feeling with him, was gratified by an introduction to the celebrated Flora Macdonald, who aided so materially in the escape of the young chevalier, Charles Edward, after the fatal day of Culloden. She was "a little woman, of a genteel appearance, and uncommonly mild and well-bred," according to Boswell's account; and Johnson, with considerable satisfaction, occupied the very bed in which the unfortunate grandson of James II. had slept in 1746, when a reward of thirty thousand pounds had been offered for his capture.

Boswell chronicled every event of this famous tour in a journal which he published a year or two afterwards. Writing to his friend and future biographer, Johnson says in 1775: "Mrs. Thrale was so entertained with your journal (which Boswell had sent to her in manuscript), that she almost read herself blind." He had somewhat discomposed Mrs. Boswell, during his Scottish visit, with his uncouth ways, and had a lurking idea, none the less real, because he made it the subject of jest, that he did not stand very high in that lady's good graces. "Of Mrs. Boswell," he writes, "though she knows in her heart she does not love me, I am always glad to hear any good, and hope that she and the dear little ladies will have neither sickness nor any other affliction. But she knows that she does not care what becomes of me, and for that she may be sure that I think her very much to blame."

JOHNSON'S LOVE OF PRAISE; THE AMBASSADOR.

That the great Johnson was not indifferent to praise, though he professed himself impenetrable to censure, is shown by many passages in Boswell's book. Very characteristic is the anecdote respecting the foreign translation of the "Rambler." It shows, in an amusing way, a harmless weakness of the sage, and is told in the author's best style of narration, with an utter unconsciousness that he is exhibiting his hero in a ludicrous light. "A foreign minister," says Boswell, "of no very high talents, who had been in the company for a considerable time, quite overlooked, happened luckily to mention that he had read some of his 'Rambler' in Italian, and admired it much. This pleased Johnson greatly. He observed that the title had been translated 'Il Genio Errante,' though I have been told it was rendered, more ludicrously, 'Il Vagabundo;' and finding that this minister gave such a proof of his taste, he was all attention to him, and on the first remark which he made, however simple, exclaimed, 'The ambassador says well; his Excellency observes—' and then he expanded and enriched the little that had been said in so strong a manner that it appeared something of consequence. This was exceedingly entertaining to the company who were present, and many a time afterwards it furnished a pleasant topic of merriment. 'The ambassador says well,' became a laughable term of applause, when no weighty matter had been expressed."

THE BOLT COURT HOUSE AND ITS INMATES.

Not long after the tour to the Hebrides we find Johnson installed in his house in Bolt Court, which he continued to inhabit to the day of his death. He was thus faithful to the last to his beloved Fleet Street; and, as in Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield," the migrations of the Primrose family seldom extended beyond a change from the blue room to the brown, so were those of Johnson confined to a move from the south side of Fleet Street to the north, or from one court "of that ilk" to another. A good man he certainly was, kindly affectionate towards the weak and dependent, and willing to bear on those broad sturdy shoulders of his the burdens of the weak. Thus, in his house in Bolt Court he had quite an assemblage of pensioners, whose only claim upon him was one of old acquaintance, with perhaps the added fact that no one but he would put up with them. There was blind Mrs. Williams, who wrote verses after a fashion, and insisted on publishing them in a miscellany, and who must have sorely tired his patience. "For several years," says polite Boswell, "her temper had not been complacent." But Johnson had nothing but kindness for her while she lived, and kindly regret when she died. "Thou thy weary task hast done," he writes; "home-art gone to take thy wages." There was old Mr. Levett, the broken-down surgeon, who must also on many accounts have been a tiresome inmate; but Johnson saw the good that was in this uncouth, taciturn, illiterate Robert Levett. "He was an old and a faithful friend," he wrote in his diary; "a few days after Levett had died suddenly in the Bolt Court house that had been his asylum for many years. 'I have known him from about '46. Commendavi. May God have mercy on him. May He have mercy on me.' And in some simple verses he composed on his humble friend's death, the old sage pays a noble tribute to Levett's memory. He tells of the humble apothecary, the poor man's doctor, who had done what he could:

"His virtues walked their narrow round,
Nor made a pause, nor left a void;
And sure, the eternal Master found
His single talent well employed."

Then, among those who experienced his active benevolence must not be forgotten his black servant, Frank—Mr. Francois Barber, as Boswell ceremoniously calls him. For many years this Frank was treated by his master rather as a humble friend than as a menial. When Master Frank, who once took it into his head to go off to sea, had found out that there was more rope's-ending than glory to be got by a common sailor on one of His Majesty's ships of war, and was heartily tired of his bargain, Johnson interested himself to get the discharge of the poor credulous negro; and he received Frank back into his service when that gentleman, a free man once more, through his old master's humane intervention, came back to him, grinning rucfully; and he sent black Frank to school; and he left the bulk of the little property he possessed to the same "Frank," who was thereby made independent for life. Any one who would understand how kind a heart beat in the bosom of this rough, dictatorial, overbearing man, has only to read the letters he wrote to "My dear Frank," while that sable worthy was at school—how kindly he advises him as to his studies and conduct, with a whimsically paternal benevolence, as if he were writing to a schoolboy of twelve or thirteen. Then there was Mrs. Desmoulins, without any claim upon him but that of old acquaintance and "the days of lang syne." Her father, Dr. Swinfer, had been Johnson's godfather. Not only did Johnson allot to her and to her daughter a room in that wonderful Bolt Court house, but allowed her a little pension of half a guinea a week besides. When the old servant who had been with his mother for many years in the old home at Lichfield, lay dying, Johnson went down to see her, knelt by her bedside, and lifted up his great, simple, faithful heart in fervent prayer for the dying woman, who blessed him with her last breath; and when, on one memorable night, he found a wretched girl in almost the last stage of want and misery, fainting on the stones in Fleet Street, he thought no shame bodily to carry the poor forsaken creature into that queer refuge for the destitute of his in Bolt Court; and he laid her in his own bed, and, like the Good Samaritan, provided tendance for her, and comfort in her deep distress; and then, mindful of the Shakespearian aphorism, "'Tis not enough to help the feeble up, but to support him after," he procured for this desolate one the means of earning a honest livelihood. But even a four-footed denizen of Bolt Court was included in the scheme of his benevolence. "I never shall forget," says Boswell, "the indulgence with which he treated Hodge, his cat, for whom he used himself to go out and buy oysters, lest the servants, having that trouble, should take a dislike to the poor creature." And thereupon garrulous Boswell continues, always ready to tell the reader something about his noble self, "I am unluckily one of those who have an antipathy to a cat, so that I am uneasy when in the room with one; and I own I frequently suffered a good deal from the presence of the same Hodge. I recollect him one day scrambling up Dr. Johnson's breast, apparently with much satisfaction, while my friend, smiling, and half whistling, rubbed down his back, and pulled him by the tail; and when I observed he was a fine cat, saying, 'Why, yes, sir; but I have had cats whom I liked better than this;' and then, as if perceiving Hodge to be out of countenance, adding, 'But he is a very fine cat—a very fine cat indeed.' This reminds me of a ludicrous account he gave Mr. Langton, of the despicable state of a young gentleman of good family. 'Sir, when I heard of him last, he was running about town shooting cats.' And then, in a sort of kindly reverie, he bethought himself of his own favourite cat, and said, 'But Hodge shan't be shot; no, no, Hodge shall not be shot.'" Boswell certainly noted down very trivial circumstances and sayings, when Johnson was his theme; but who would like him to have omitted them?

WOLCOT'S PICTURE OF JOHNSON; LIVES OF POETS; JOHNSON'S LAST DAYS.

A characteristic sketch from a very different pen displays the doctor in a ludicrous but not an unkindly aspect. The whimsical satirist, Dr. Wolcot, who, under the assumed name of Peter Plindar, made himself formidable to the court, and especially the royal family, by his poetical strictures on their manners and actions, gives a humorous picture of Johnson's appearance in his later days. This is what the satirist has to say of the sage:

"Methinks I view his full plain suit of brown,—
The large grey bushy wig that graced his crown,
Black worsted stockings, little silver buckles,
And shirt that had no ruffles for his knuckles.
I mark the brown great coat of cloth he wore,
That two huge Patagonian pockets bore,
Which Patagonians (wondrous to unfold!)
Would fairly both his dictionaries hold."

Of his later works, by far the most important was the series of short biographies, known as the "Lives of the Poets." Here, as elsewhere, we wonder that a man who could do such great things, should occasionally stoop to such little ones. Sir Walter Scott talks of this work as "executed with a degree of critical force and talent which has seldom been concentrated;" and, indeed, it may be safely said that these lines will amply repay attentive and careful reading. But it must not be forgotten that Johnson sometimes let his prejudices run away with him. The criticism of the high churchman and Jacobite upon the puritan and republican Milton is ludicrously unjust; nor can the man who considered Gray 'a barren-spirited fellow,' and who dismisses Collins with a few words of very faint praise, be considered an altogether safe guide in the discrimination of excellence. "His life of Milton," says Prescott, the American author, "is a humiliating testimony of the power of political and religious prejudice, to warp a great and good mind from the standard of truth."

Sir Egerton Brydges has left a valuable piece of criticism concerning Johnson's merits as a judge of poets and poetry: "Wherever understanding alone is sufficient for poetical criticism," he says, "the decisions of Johnson are generally right. But the beauties of poetry must be felt before their causes are investigated. There is a poetical sensibility, which in the progress of the mind becomes as distinct a power as a musical ear or a picturesque eye. Without a considerable degree of this sensibility, it is as vain for a man of the greatest understanding to speak of the higher beauties of poetry, as it is for a blind man to speak of colours. To adopt the warmest sentiments of poetry, to realize its boldest imagery, to yield to every impulse of enthusiasm, to submit to the illusions of fancy, to retire with the poet into his ideal worlds, were dispositions wholly foreign from the worldly sagacity and stern shrewdness of Johnson."

The last scene of all, that ended the strange and not uneventful history of a life prolonged five years beyond the allotted threescore and ten, was certainly not the second childishness and mere oblivion that fell upon the gigantic intellect of Swift. Among the characteristics of Johnson had been a dark and ever-haunting dread of death, and a tendency to cling to life even amid circumstances of pain and sorrow. As the great change approached, however, his mind became clear and calm, and the mist of doubt and apprehension rolled away, leaving an evening sunlight of peace around the good man's dying bed. Boswell was away in Scotland, and strangely enough, Johnson does not seem to have mentioned him in his last illness; but the numerous friends who were in town were assiduous in attendance, and the dying man received their visits with evident pleasure. The statesman Wyndham, Hoole, the translator of Tasso, kind, affectionate Bennet Langton, sat by him; but the visits he most valued were those of Edmund Burke. "I am afraid, sir, such a number of us may be oppressive to you," Burke observed. "No, sir," replied Johnson, "it is not so; and I must be in a wretched state indeed, when your company would not be a delight to me." "My dear sir," said the orator, with tears in his eyes, and in his trembling voice, "you have always been too good to me." Bishop Horne has well remarked that though consciousness of superiority might sometimes induce him to carry it high with man,—but even this was much abated during the latter part of his life,—his devotions showed how humbly at all times he walked with his God. When, in reply to his urgent request for a "direct answer" as to whether he could recover, his physician, Dr. Brocklesby, informed him that the end was near: "Then," he replied, "I will take no more physic, not even my opiates, for I have prayed, that I may render up my soul to God unclouded." "Full of resignation, strengthened in faith, and joyful in hope," is the account written by one of his friends to another, telling of Johnson's last hours. "Attend, Francis, to the salvation of your soul, which is the object of greatest importance," was his admonition to his faithful servant—and an emphatic "God bless you, my dear," in reply to a young lady, an intimate friend, who begged the good man's blessing, were the last words he uttered in this world, before passing into the presence of the Master—so peacefully, that those who watched in that quiet room knew not the moment when the quiet slumber became the sleep of death.

"He has made," wrote Gerard Hamilton, who had known him intimately for thirty years, "a chasm which not only nothing can fill up, but which nothing has a tendency to fill up. Johnson is dead. Let us go on to the next best—there is nobody; no man can be said to put you in mind of Johnson."

INTRODUCTION.

BY way of introduction to this sketch of the life of the author of the Divine Comedy we cannot do better than quote the following lines from Carlyle's "Lectures on Heroes":—

"In this Dante, the silent centuries, in a very strange way, found a voice. The Divina Commedia is of Dante's writing, yet, in truth, it belongs to ten Christian centuries; only the finishing of it is Dante's. . . . Dante is the spokesman of the middle ages; the thought they lived by stands here in everlasting music. These sublime ideas of his, terrible and beautiful, are the fruit of the Christian meditation of all the good men who had gone before him. Precious they; but also is not he precious? Much, had not he spoken, would have been dumb; not dead, yet living voiceless.

"Dante speaks to the noble, the pure, and the great in all times and places. He burns as a pure star, fixed there in the firmament, at which the great and the high of all ages kindle themselves: he is the possession of all the chosen of the world for uncounted time."

Of all poets who have ever lived, Dante is one of the few about whose eminence there is no dispute. His life, too, is more picturesque than that of almost any other. Where can we find such another colossal solitary figure? and what match have we in the shape of deep affection for his life-long worship of Beatrice?

THE POET'S BIRTH AND EDUCATION.

Dante, or Durante Alighieri, was born at Florence, in May, 1265. By a familiar contraction of his Christian name, Durante, he was called Dante, by which name he has become generally known.

His family was noble; he was a great grandson of Cacciaquida Elisei, who married a lady of the family of Alighieri of Ferrara, and whose children assumed the arms and the name of their mother. Cacciaquida accompanied the Emperor Conrad III. in his crusade, was made a knight, and died in battle in 1147. In the Divina Commedia, Cacciaquida is made to relate to Dante his adventures, together with an interesting account of the state of Florence, and the primitive manners of its citizens in his time, before the breaking out of the great feud between the Guelphs and the Guibelines.

Dante's father died while he was but a child. By the advice, however, of his surviving relations, and with the assistance of an able preceptor, Brunetto Latini, he applied himself closely to polite literature and other liberal studies, at the same time that he omitted no pursuit necessary for the accomplishment of a manly character, and mixed with the youth of his age in all honourable and noble exercises.

"His education," says Mr. Carlyle, "was the best then going: much school divinity, Aristotelian logic, some Latin classics, no inconsiderable insight into certain provinces of things; and Dante, with his earnest, intelligent nature, learned better than most all that was learnable. He had a clear, cultivated understanding, and of great subtlety; this best fruit of education he had contrived to realize from these scholastic. He knows accurately and well what lies close to him; but, in such a time, without printed books or free intercourse, he could not well know what was distant; the small, clear light, most luminous for what is near, breaks itself into singular chiaroscuro striking on what is far off. This was Dante's learning from the schools."

It is asserted by some that Dante studied at Bologna, though this is not clearly ascertained; it is, however, evident from his works that he had deeply read and was imbued with all the learning of his age.

THE ROMANCE OF BEATRICE.

The first remarkable event of the poet's life, and one which served to colour the whole of his future existence, was his falling in love with Beatrice Portinari, of an illustrious family of Florence. This attachment served to purify his sentiments; the lady herself died about 1290, when Dante was about twenty-five years of age, but he continued to cherish her memory, if we are to judge from his poems, to the latest period of his life. It must have been about or a little before the time of Beatrice's death that he wrote his Vita Nuova, which is a series of canzoni intermixed with prose, in which he speaks of his love in a spiritual and platonic strain, and of the change it produced in him, which was the beginning of his "new life."

Dante first met Beatrice Portinari at the house of her father, Folco, on May-day of 1274, when the poet was nine years old. To quote his own words, as translated by Mr. Browning, "Already nine times after my birth the heaven of light had returned as it were to the same point, when there appeared to my eyes the glorious lady of my mind, who was by many called Beatrice, who knew not what to call her. She had already been so long in this life, that already in its time the starry heaven had moved towards the east the twelfth part of a degree; so that she appeared to me about the beginning of her ninth year, and I saw her about the end of my ninth year. Her dress on that day was of a most noble colour, a subdued and goodly crimson, girdled and adorned in such sort as best suited with her tender age. At that moment I saw most truly that the spirit of life which hath its dwelling in the secretest chamber of the heart began to tremble so violently that the least pulses of my body shook therewith, and in trembling it said these words: 'Ecce dius fortior me qui veniens dominabitur mihi!'"

The poet saw Beatrice but seldom, and she probably knew little of him. She married Simoni de' Bardi. But the adoration of her lover was more intense for the remoteness of its object.

"There is not one word," remarks Mrs. Oliphant, "to imply that Dante ever had the courage to speak of love to Beatrice herself, or to aspire to any return of it from one whom he felt to be far above him. She knew it, as women still, in less romantic days, know now and then of the silent devotion of some man, too young, or too poor, or too humble, even to approach them more nearly. The sentiment is not obsolete, though it has never produced another Vita Nuova. It is love in its highest and most beautiful sense, but it is incompatible with any idea of marrying or asking in marriage; and even the pang with which the lover sees his lady another man's bride is rather a wounded sense of some lessening of her perfection thereby, than the ordinary pangs of jealousy. This is, of course, a sentiment incomprehensible to many minds, but it is not the less a real one on that account."

THE FACTIONS OF FLORENCE.

The party of the Guelphs was, in the early part of Dante's life, predominant at Florence, having some years before driven away the Guibelines, with the assistance of the pope and of Charles of Anjou, king of Naples. But in the neighbouring city of Arezzo the contrary had occurred; the Guibelines, with the bishop at their head, being the stronger party, had turned the Guelphs out of the town.

It may be observed that the names of these two rival factions, which in their origin designated the respective partisans of the emperors and popes, lost much of their primitive meaning as the quarrel between the church and the empire subsided by the extinction of the house of Suabia. The rivalry, however, between the leading families of each party continued, mutual offences were remembered, and the remembrance was bequeathed from father to son; so that Guelphs and Guibelines were ever ready to fight in every part of Italy, not for the supremacy of church or empire, but for their own municipal superiority in their respective communities; and such was the ambition of domineering that prevailed among the wealthier families, that after the Guelphs had driven the Guibelines out of town, or vice versa, the leaders of the party that remained in possession of the place began to quarrel among themselves, and it not unfrequently happened that some of them courted the assistance of the emigrant rival faction against their own colleagues. This occurred among other instances at Florence in 1280, when Bonaccorso degli Adimari, one of the Guelph leaders, connected himself by marriage with the Guibeline count, Guido Novello, which led to a temporary truce between the two parties.

But the Guelphs soon after began to persecute the Guibelines again. The usual fate of the losing party in such cases was exile, with confiscation of property, and in case of armed opposition to or contravention of this sentence, torture and death were freely awarded, and the houses of the obnoxious individuals were not unfrequently set on fire or razed to the ground. The Guelphs of Arezzo being driven out of their town applied to those of Florence for assistance. This led to a war between Florence and Arezzo, in which the Guibelines of the latter place were defeated at Campaldino in June, 1289, when their bishop was killed.

Dante was present at this engagement, and soon after his return to Florence he married Gemma Donati, of a powerful Guelph family. The violence of her temper, however, proved a source of the bitterest suffering to him, and in the Inferno, where he makes one of the characters say—

"Me my wife,
Of savage temper more than ought beside,
Hath to this evil brought,"

no doubt his own conjugal unhappiness was forcibly present to his mind. It has been suggested, however, that political animosity might have had some share in his domestic quarrels; for his wife was a kinswoman of Corso Donati, one of the most formidable as he was one of the most inveterate of his opponents.

TAKING PART IN PUBLIC AFFAIRS.

He now became a candidate for civic honours and offices. The citizens of Florence were classed into three ranks:—1st, grandi, or old families, formerly feudal nobles, many of whom had still feudal estates in various parts of the country, though in the town they enjoyed by law no exclusive privilege; 2nd, popolani grassi, or substantial citizens, men who had risen by trade, and many of whom were wealthier than the nobles; 3rd, piccioli, or inferior tradespeople, artisans, etc. The last two classes, weary of disturbances created by faction, and being directed by some well-meaning men, among whom was Dino Compagni the chronicler, who is the safest guide through this part of Florentine his tory, had made a law in 1282, by which the citizens, being classed according to their trades—the higher trades, “arti maggiori”—chose six priors, or aldermen, one for each district of the city, who were called also “i signori,” and constituted the executive. They were renewed every two months. No one could aspire to office who had not his name inscribed on the register of one of the trades. Dante enrolled his name on the register of physicians and apothecaries, though he never exercised that profession.

The institution of the priors did not prevent the town being distracted by factions as before, as those magistrates often availed themselves of their brief term of office to favour their friends and court favour with the wealthier citizens. To remedy this, the popular party, led by Giano della Bella in 1293, elected a new officer, called Gonfaloniere di Giustizia, who was to enforce order and justice, and gave him a guard of 1000 soldiers; they also excluded for ever thirty-three families of the grandi, or nobles, from political office. But a conspiracy of the wealthy families drove away Giano della Bella and his adherents in 1294, and the town again fell a prey to factions.

Two powerful families, the Donati and the Cerchi, were at the head of the contending parties, and affrays between their respective partisans occurred repeatedly in the streets of Florence. Both were Guelphs, but the Cerchi were suspected of a bias in favour of the Guibelines, because they were less rigorous in enforcing the penal laws against the latter; and they had also for them the friends of the unjustly expelled Giano della Bella. The Pope, Boniface VIII., favoured the Donati as being zealous Guelphs. About this time the town of Pistoia was likewise divided between two factions, called Bianchi and Neri, which originated with two branches of the family of Cancellieri. The Florentines being applied to as arbitrators, several of the more violent partisans were exiled from Pistoia, and came to Florence, where the Bianchi became connected with the Cerchi, and the Neri with the Donati, and from these connections the two Florentine parties assumed the respective names of Bianchi and Neri. Both, as we have said above, were branches of the great Guelph party then predominant at Florence; but afterwards the Bianchi in their reverses joined the Guibelines, with whom they have been often confounded by subsequent writers.

It is necessary to bear these things in mind, in order to understand the history and the political sentiments of Dante. Dante was a Guelph, and connected in marriage with the Donati, the leaders of the Neri. But he was also connected by personal friendship, and perhaps also by a feeling of equity, with the Bianchi, who appear to have shown themselves from the first less overbearing and violent than their antagonists, and to have been in fact the injured party.

TROUBLOUS TIMES.

Dante being made one of the priors in June of the year 1300, from this exaltation our poet dated the cause of all his subsequent misfortunes in life. Dante now proposed and carried a law by which the chiefs of both parties were exiled for a time out of the territory of the republic. The Bianchi were sent to Sarzana, and the Neri to Castel della Pieve. Some of the Bianchi, however, soon after returned to Florence, and Dante was accused of having connived at it, chiefly out of friendship for Guido Cavalcanti, who had suffered from the unwholesome climate of Sarzana, and died soon after his return. The Neri, by their agents at Rome, represented to Boniface VIII. that the Bianchi kept up a communication with the Guibelines of Arezzo, Pisa, and other places, and that if they obtained the preponderance in Florence, they would make common cause with the Colonna, the pope's personal enemies.

Through these suggestions, aided by bribes distributed by the Neri at the Roman court, as Dino says, Boniface was induced to give his support to the Neri, and he sent them Charles de Valois, brother of Philippe le Bel, under the plausible title of peace-maker. Charles entered Florence in November, 1301, followed by 1,200 armed men. Affecting impartiality at first, he let all the Neri return to Florence, followed by the armed peasantry; new priors were made, all favourable to the Neri, and the Bianchi began to be openly attacked in the streets. The Medici, who were already an influential family among the people, killed one of the Bianchi, and no notice was taken of the murder.

A general proscription of the Bianchi now began, connived at by the peace-maker, Charles de Valois. “People were murdered in the street; others were dragged into the houses of their enemies where they were put to the torture in order to extort money from them, their houses were plundered and burnt, their daughters were carried away by force; and when some large house was seen in flames, Charles used to ask, ‘What fire is that?’ and those around him answered him that it was some wretched hovel, whilst in reality it was a rich palace.” The house of Dante was one of those that were plundered. Dante was at the time at Rome, whither he had been sent by the Bianchi to counteract, if possible, the suggestions of their antagonists.

On hearing the news of the proscription, he hastily left Rome, and joined his fugitive friends at Arezzo. In January, 1302, a sentence was passed condemning him to two years' exile, and a fine of 8000 florins, and in case of non-payment his property to be sequestered. By a second sentence, dated March of the same year, he and others were condemned as barattieri, or guilty of malversation, peculation, and usury, to be burnt alive. The sentence was grounded merely on the public report of his guilt, "fama publica," which in this case meant the report of his enemies. This curious document was found in the archives of Florence in the last century, and has been transcribed by Tiraboschi, Storia della Letteratura, tom. v., part 2, cap. 2.

AN EXILE FROM HOME.

Dante now began his wanderings, renouncing his Guelf connexions, and intent upon exciting the Guibelines of Italy against his enemies and the oppressors of his country. He appears to have repaired first to Verona, which was then ruled by the family of La Scala, powerful leaders among the Guibelines. But he soon after returned to Tuscany, where the Bianchi and Guibelines now united were gathering their strength in the neighbourhood of Arezzo.

The death of Boniface VIII., in September, 1303, inspired them with fresh hopes. Benedict XI., the new pope, a man of a mild and conciliatory spirit, sent Cardinal de Prato to endeavour to restore peace in Tuscany, but the cardinal was opposed by the ruling faction at Florence, who frightened him out of the town.

Florence was left a prey to anarchy, during which a fire broke out which destroyed 1900 houses, in June, 1304. The Bianchi and Guibelines thought of availing themselves of the confusion to surprise the town; and some of them actually entered one of the gates, but they were badly supported by those outside, and the attempt totally failed. Dante (Purgatorio xvii.) censures the want of prudence and concord in the leaders on that occasion. He seems soon after to have left them in disgust, determined to regulate himself in future according to his own judgment. He says himself that "it was difficult to say which of the two contending parties was most in the wrong." (Paradiso vi. 102.)

Dante appears to have been at Padua about

1306, and in the following year with the Malaspina, the lords of Lunigiana; he was also at times in the valleys of Casentino, and in the mountains near Arezzo; some say he went afterwards to Paris, and remained there some years; others believe that he did not go to France until after the death of Henry VII., in 1313. But his visit to Paris is very doubtful; though in canto x. of the Paradiso he speaks of a certain Sigieri, professor of that university, and designates the street in which he lived.

The poet made an attempt to obtain the revocation of his sentence by writing to his countrymen a pathetic letter beginning with the words, "Popule mee, quid feci tibi?" but all to no purpose. The family of Adimari, who had taken possession of his property, opposed his return. Accordingly, in canto xvi. of the Paradiso, he has launched a violent invective against them.

The mortification which he underwent during his wanderings will be best described in his own words. In his Convito, he speaks of his banishment, and the poverty and distress which attended it, in very touching terms. "Alas!" he says, "had it pleased the Dispenser of the universe that the occasion of this excuse had never existed; that neither others had committed wrong against me, nor I suffered unjustly—suffered, I say, the punishment of exile and poverty; since it was the pleasure of the citizens of that fairest and most renowned daughter of Rome, Florence, to cast me forth out of her sweet bosom, in which I had my birth and nourishment even to the ripeness of my age; and in which, with her good-will, I desire with all my heart to rest this wearied spirit of mine, and to terminate the time allotted to me on earth. Wandering over almost every part to which this our language extends, I have gone about like a mendicant; showing, against my will, the wound with which fortune has smitten me, and which is often imputed to his ill-deserving on whom it is inflicted. I have indeed been a vessel without sail and without steerage, carried about to divers ports and roads and shores, by the dry wind that springs out of sad poverty; and have appeared before the eyes of many, who perhaps from some report that had reached them, had imagined me of a different form, in whose sight not only my person was disparaged, but every action of mine became of less value, as well already performed as those which yet remained for me to attempt."

HOPES AND DISAPPOINTMENTS.

The election of Henry of Luxemburg, or

Henry VII., to the crown of Germany, revived the hopes of Dante, as Henry was preparing to come to Italy in order to assert the long-neglected rights of his predecessors as kings of the Romans. The Guibeline leaders were ready to support his claims as imperial vicars, and the Guibeline cities, such as Pisa, were likewise in his favour. In order to strengthen their zeal, Dante, about 1310, addressed a circular letter "to the kings, dukes, marquises, counts, the senators of Rome, and all the people of Italy, congratulating them on the prospect of happiness for Italy through the ministers of the pious Henry, who will punish the felons who opposed him, and bestow mercy on the repentant," etc.

It was about this time that he wrote his book "De Monarchia," which may be considered as a profession of Guibeline political faith: it asserts the rights of the emperors, as successors of the Cæsars, to the supreme temporal power, entirely independent of the popes, who are the spiritual heads of the Church. This creed was in opposition to the assumed rights of Gregory VII., Innocent III., and other pontiffs, who pretended to be above all crowned heads, and to have the disposal of thrones and principalities, an assumption which the Guelphs favoured in Italy, in order to keep themselves free of the imperial authority. Both parties in fact acknowledged an external superior, although both wished to rule in their respective communities with as little subserviency as possible to the nominal supremacy of either pope or emperor. But there was this difference, that the imperial or Guibeline party was mostly supported by the nobles, especially of North Italy, who styled themselves vicars of the emperor, and was therefore more aristocratic in its spirit, while the Guelphs of Tuscany looked upon the pope chiefly as an auxiliary in time of need, whose temporal interference was less direct, and could be more easily evaded than that of the emperor, so as to admit of a more popular or democratic spirit in their institutions.

Such at least was the theory of the two parties; for in reality the Guelph or popular families formed an aristocracy of wealth as much as the Guibelines were an aristocracy of birth and rank. Dante, in his book, "De Monarchia," is no servile advocate for despotism, for he maintains that sovereigns are made to promote the good of their subjects, and not subjects to serve the ambitious pleasure of their sovereigns. The latter are to rule so as to soothe the wayward passions of men, in order that all may live in peace and brotherly feeling. But still he derives their authority from God, and he quotes in support of his system, Aristotle, the Scriptures, and the Roman History, agreeably to the scholastic logic of his times. This book, "De Monarchia," was burnt at Bologna, by order of the papal legate, after Dante's death.

Henry VII. came to Italy in 1310, was crowned at Milan as king of Lombardy, and the following year he besieged Cremona, Brescia, and other places. It was about this time that Dante, impatient to see the emperor come into Tuscany to put down the Guelphs, addressed to him an epistle which begins thus: "Sanctissimo triumphatori et domino singulari, domino Henrico, divina Providentia Romanorum regi, semper Augusto, devotissimi sui Dantes Alighierius Florentinus et exul immeritus, ac universaliter omnes Tusci qui pacem desiderant terræ, osculantur pedes." He then entreats the emperor not to tarry any longer on the banks of the Po, but to advance south of the Apennines and put down the spirit of Guelph sedition at Florence, against which he inveighs in no moderate terms, and which, he says, strives to predispose against him the mind of the sovereign pontiff. He speaks of Florence as revolting unnaturally against her parent Rome, for Dante always affects to consider Rome as still the seat of the empire, and Rome and the empire are often employed by him as synonyms. This remarkable epistle, of which we had only an Italian version until the Latin text was discovered in the library of St. Mark, is dated from Tuscia, near the founts of Arno, April, 1311. (Dantis Alighierii Epistolæ quæ extant, cum notis Caroli Witte, Padua, 1827.)

EXTINGUISHED HOPES; PATRONS AND PROTECTORS.

Henry came into Tuscany, threatened Florence, but without effect, was crowned at Rome, and on his return died suddenly at Buonconvento, near Siena, in August, 1313. This was a terrible blow to the hopes of the Guibelines, and of Dante especially. He now took refuge at Verona, at the court of Cane della Scala, where he appears to have been before, between 1308 and 1310. Cane was hospitable and generous to the Guibeline emigrants, but Dante, with his proud spirit and temper soured by adversity, could ill accommodate himself to the flattery of courts and the flippancy of courtiers, and he is said to have had some unpleasant bickerings with the people about Cane.

With Cane himself, however, he seems to have continued on good terms; he speaks very highly of his hospitality in a passage in his writings, and there is a cordial letter from him to Cane, written probably in the latter years of his life, in which he dedicates to him his Paradiso, the latter part of his great poem, and explains the object of it. He says that he styled it a comedy, because, contrary to the style of tragedy, it begins with sorrow and ends with joy; he distinguishes between the literal and the allegorical sense of his verses, and observes that his poem may be called polysensuum, having many meanings. He tells Cane the title of his work: "Incipit Comœdia Dantis Alligherii, Florentini natione non moribus." But the title of the part which he sends to him with the letter is "Incipit Cantica tertia Comœdiæ Dantis quæ dicitur Paradisus." It is evident, from this and other circumstances, that Cane had not seen the rest of the poem; indeed, it is not likely that Dante ever communicated the whole of it to any one during his lifetime, as it would have made it impossible for him to have found refuge anywhere.

After the death of the emperor in 1313, several of Dante's biographers affirm that he made a second journey to Paris, where Boccaccio adds that he held a public disputation on various questions of theology. To what other places he might have roamed during his banishment is very uncertain. We are told that he was at Casentino, with the Comte Guido Salvatico, at one time, and at another in the mountains near Urbino, with Signori della Faggiola. At the monastery of Santa Croce di Fonte Avellana, a wild and solitary retreat in the territory of Gubbio, is to be seen a chamber, in which, as a Latin inscription declared, it was believed that he composed no small portion of his divine work. A tower belonging to the Conti Falcucci, in Gubbio, claims for itself a similar honour. In the castle of Colnollaro, near the river Saonda, and about six miles from the same city, he was courteously entertained by Rusone da Gubbio, whom he had formerly met at Arezzo.

There are some traces of his having made a temporary stay at Udine, and particularly of his having been in the Friuli with Pagano della Torre, the patriarch of Aquileia, at the castle of Tolmino, where he is also said to have employed himself on the Divina Commedia, and where a rock was at one time pointed out that was called the seat of Dante.

What is known with greater certainty is that he at last found a refuge at Ravenna, with Guido Novello da Polenta, a splendid protector of learning, himself a poet, and the kinsman of the unfortunate Francesca, whose story has been told by Dante with such unrivalled pathos.

About the year 1316 he had still a chance of his recall to Florence. It was suggested to him by a friend whom Dante in his reply calls father, probably because he was a clergyman, that he might return, provided he acknowledged his guilt, and asked absolution. His answer was characteristic of his mind: "No, father, this is not the way that shall lead me back to my country. But I shall return with hasty steps, if you or any other can open me a way that shall not derogate from the fame and honour of Dante; but if by no such way Florence can be entered, then to Florence I shall never return. Shall I not everywhere enjoy the sight of the sun and stars? May I not seek and contemplate truth anywhere under heaven, without rendering myself inglorious, nay, infamous, to the people and commonwealth of Florence? Bread I hope will not fail me."

It may perhaps, it has been suggested, be in reference to this proposal that he promises himself he shall one day return in other guise,

"and standing up
At his baptismal font shall claim the wreath
Due to the poet's temples." (Purgatorio, xxv.)

Such indeed was the glory which his compositions in his native tongue had now gained him, that he declares in the treatise, De Vulgari Eloquentia, it had to a certain extent reconciled him even to his banishment.

THE POET'S DEATH.

In 1317-18, Dante appears to have been still wandering about Italy. In 1319, he repaired again to Guido da Polenta, lord of Ravenna, by whom he was hospitably received, and with whom he appears to have remained till his death.

In the service of this last patron, in whom he seems to have met with a more congenial mind than in any of the former, his talents were gratefully excited, and his affections interested but too deeply; for by being sent by Guido on an embassy to the Venetians, and not being able even to obtain an audience on account of the rancorous animosity with which they regarded that prince, Dante returned to Ravenna so overwhelmed with disappointment and grief, that he was seized by an illness which terminated fatally either in July or September, 1321.

MIND AND MANNERS.

Dante was at all times extremely absent and distracted, and appears to have indulged too much in a disposition to sarcasm. At the table of Can Grande, when the company was amused by the conversation and tricks of a buffoon, he was asked by his patron, why Can Grande himself, and the guests who were then present, failed of receiving as much pleasure from the exertion of his talents as this man had been able to give them. "Because all creatures delight in their own resemblance," said Dante.

In other respects his manners are said to have been dignified and polite. He was particularly careful not to make any approaches to flattery, a vice which he justly held in the utmost abhorrence. He spoke seldom: but what he said derived authority from the subtleness of his observations.

"He was," says Boccaccio, "a most excellent man, and most resolute in adversity. It was only on one subject that he showed himself, I do not know whether I ought to call it impatient or spirited—it was regarding everything relating to party: since in his exile he was more violent in this respect than suited his circumstances, and more than he was willing that others should believe. . . . That which I feel most ashamed at for the sake of his memory is that it was a well-known thing in Romagna, that if any boy or girl, talking to him on party matters, condemned the Guibeline side, he would become frantic, so that if they did not be silent he would be induced to throw stones at them, and with this violence of party feeling he lived until his death. I am certainly ashamed to tarnish with any fault the fame of such a man; but the order of my subject in some degree demands it, because if I were silent in those things in which he was to blame, I should not be believed in those things I have already related in his praise. Therefore I excuse myself to himself, who perhaps looks down with a disdainful eye on me writing."

DANTE'S PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

In his "Life of Dante," the same writer, the earliest of the biographers of the poet, thus describes him: "Our poet was of middle height, and after reaching mature years he went somewhat stooping. His gait was grave and sedate. Always clothed in most becoming garments, his dress was suited to the ripeness of his years. His face was long, his nose aquiline, his eyes rather large than small, his jaw heavy, and his under lip prominent. His complexion was dark, and his hair and beard thick, black, and crisp, and his countenance was always sad and thoughtful. . . . His manners, whether in public or at home, were wonderfully composed and restrained, and in all his ways he was more courteous and civil than any one else."

Such was Dante as he appeared in his later years to those from whose recollections of him Boccaccio drew this description.

But Boccaccio, had he chosen so to do, might have drawn another portrait of Dante, not the author of the Divine Comedy, but the author of the New Life. The likeness of the youthful Dante was familiar to those Florentines who had never looked on the living presence of their greatest citizen.

On the altar wall of the chapel of the Palace of the Podestà (now the Bargello), Giotto had painted a grand religious composition, in which, after the fashion of the time, he exalted the glory of Florence by the introduction of some of the most famous citizens into the assembly of the blessed in Paradise. The head of Christ, full of dignity, appears above, and lower down the escutcheon of Florence, supported by angels, with two rows of saints, male and female, attendant to the right and left, in front of whom stand a company of the magnates of the city, headed by two crowned personages, close to one of whom, to the right, stands Dante, a pomegranate in his hand, and wearing the graceful falling cap of those days. The date when this picture was painted is uncertain, but Giotto represents his friend in it as a youth, such as he may have been in the first flush of early fame, at the season of the beginning of their memorable friendship.

Of all the portraits of the revival of art, there is none comparable in interest to this likeness of the supreme poet by the supreme artist of mediæval Europe. It was due to no accident of fortune that these men were contemporaries and of the same country, but it was a fortunate and delightful incident that they were so brought together by sympathy of genius, and by favouring circumstances, as to become friends, to love and honour each other in life, and to celebrate each other through all time in their respective works. The story of their friendship is known only in its outline, but that it began when they were young is certain, and that it lasted till death divided them is a tradition which finds ready acceptance.

As Giotto painted him, he is the lover of Beatrice, the gay companion of princes, the friend of poets, and himself already the most famous writer of love verses in Italy. There is an almost feminine softness in the lines of the face, with a sweet and serious tenderness well befitting the lover and the author of the sonnet and canzoni which were in a few years to be gathered into the incomparable record of his New Life.

When years of persecution and exile had added to the natural sternness of his countenance the deep lines left by grief and the brooding spirit of vengeance, he happened to be at Verona, where, since the publication of the Inferno, he was well known. Passing one day by a portico where several women were seated, one of them whispered with a look of awe, "Do you see that man? That is he who goes down to hell whenever he pleases, and brings us back tidings of the sinners below." "Ay, indeed," replied her companion, "very likely; see how his face is scarred with fire and brimstone, and blackened with smoke, and how his hair and beard have been singed and curled in the flames."

As nothing that related to such a man was thought unworthy of notice, one of his biographers who had seen his handwriting has recorded that it was of a long and delicate character, and remarkable for neatness and accuracy.

THE POET'S FRIENDS AND FAMILY CIRCLE.

Dante was connected in habits of intimacy and friendship with the most ingenious men of his time. Amongst these were Guido Cavalcanti, Buonaggrin da Lucca, Forese Donati, Cinoda Pistoia, and Giotto the celebrated painter, of whom we have spoken above. Besides these, his acquaintance extended to some others, whose names illustrate the first dawn of Italian literature.

The children of the poet consisted of one daughter and five sons. Two of the sons, Pietro and Jacopo, inherited some portion of their father's talents, which they employed chiefly in the pious task of illustrating his Divina Commedia. The former of these possessed acquirements of a more profitable kind, and obtained considerable wealth at Verona, where he was settled, by the exercise of the legal profession. He was honoured with the friendship of Petrarch, by whom some verses were addressed to him at Irevigi, in 1361.

Dante's daughter Beatrice—it is said that she was so called after the daughter of Folco Portinari—became a nun in the convent of S. Stefano dell' Uliva, at Ravenna.

It is but doing justice to the wife of Dante to mention that after the banishment of her husband she secured some share of his property from the popular fury; that out of this she managed to support their little family with praiseworthy discretion, and that she even removed from them the pressure of poverty by such industrious efforts as in her former affluence she had never been called on to exert. Who does not regret that with qualities so estimable, she wanted the sweetness of temper necessary for riveting the affections of the poet?

THE VITA NUOVA.

In the Vita Nuova, Dante gives an account of his youthful attachment to Beatrice. "It is," says Mr. Carey, "according to the taste of these times, somewhat mystical; yet there are some particulars in it which have not at all the air of a fiction, such as the death of Beatrice's father, Folco Portinari; her relation to the friend whom he esteemed next after Guido Cavalcanti; his own attempt to conceal his passion by a pretended attachment to another lady, and the anguish he felt at the death of his mistress. He tells us, too, that at the time of her decease, he chanced to be composing a canzone in her praise, and that he was interrupted by that event at the conclusion of the first stanza; a circumstance which we can hardly suppose to have been a mere invention."

Here is a very striking and often quoted scene from this work, showing the hush and stillness of contemplative grief after its edge had been blunted:—

"On that day which fulfilled the year since my lady had been made of the citizens of eternal life, remembering me of her as I sat alone, I betook myself to draw the resemblance of an angel on certain tablets. And while I did this, chancing to turn my head, I perceived that some were beside me, to whom I should have given courteous welcome, and that they were observing what I did: also I learned afterwards that they had been there awhile before I perceived them. Seeing whom, I arose and said, 'Another was with me.'

"Afterwards, when they had left me, I set myself again to my occupation, to wit, to drawing figures of angels; in doing which I conceived to write this matter in rhyme as for her anniversary, and to addressing verses unto those who had just left me."

The last chapter of the Vita Nuova relates how, after the expiration of a year, "it was given me to behold a wonderful vision, wherein I saw things which determined me that I would say nothing further of this blessed one until such time as I could discourse more worthily concerning her. And to this end I labour all I can, as she in truth knoweth. Therefore if it be His pleasure, through whom is the life of all things, that my life continue with me a few years, it is

Two episodes in the Inferno have fixed the admiration of mankind. One is the touching picture of the unhappy Francesca di Rimini, in the fifth canto. Here the melodious Tuscan of Dante flows in almost perfect harmony. At the sound of his voice the lost spirits float toward him like doves hastening to their nest :—

"Quali colombe dal disio chiamate
 Coll' all alzate e ferme, al dolce nido
 Vengon per aere."

Francesca di Rimini had sacrificed her soul for love, and now in endless torture laments to Dante her hopeless fate, and tells him the story of her fall.

The second remarkable episode is that of Count Ugolino. The poet discovers one of the lost in the region of ice, gnawing, as if from hunger or rage, the body of his enemy and destroyer, Ubaldini. Dante asks him the cause of his terrible enmity, when Ugolino relates the story of his death. Ubaldini and the Pisans had shut up the count, together with his three sons, in a tower, walled up the entrance, and there left them to starve. Ugolino describes to Dante the slow course of starvation, and the terrible pangs that had torn his breast as he saw his sons sink down and die before him, calling upon him for help :—

"Speechless
 I looked upon the faces of my sons;
 I wept not, for all stone I felt within.
 They wept; and one, my little Anselm, cried,
 'Thou lookest so! Father, what grieves thee?'
 Yet I need no tear."

The children now die of hunger :—

"When we came
 To the fourth day, my Gaddo at my feet
 Outstretched did fling him, crying, 'Hast no help
 For me, my father?' There he died; and e'en Plainly as thou seest me, saw I the three Fall, one by one, between the fifth day and sixth;
 Then fasting gained the mastery of grief."

THE PURGATORIO.

The Purgatorio, which follows the Inferno, is less vigorous, but still wonderfully poetical. Dante escapes through a passage that leads from the lowest sphere into Purgatory. As the Inferno was represented as a conical pit penetrating into the centre of the earth, Purgatory is painted as a tall mountain whose top ascends towards heaven. Its interior is divided into many spheres, and as the period of purgation passes, the spirits of the elect rise upward, and are led by angels to the celestial world above. When it is announced by the angels that a soul has escaped to heaven, all Purgatory rings with exclamations of joy. The characteristic trait of hell was despair, that of Purgatory is hope. The torments of Purgatory resemble those of the Inferno, but they are borne with patience, because they lead to eternal bliss. Angelic resignation sits on every countenance, and a throng of elect, slowly purging their sins away in the ages of contrition, meets the poet's eye as he ascends from sphere to sphere.

THE PARADISO.

At last the prospect of heaven opens upon him. Led by Beatrice, he views the thrones of the immortals and the seats of perpetual bliss. Paradise, too, has its ascending spheres, rising from the moon to the limits of the stars and the centre of the universe. Dante rises upward amidst the songs of rejoicing spirits and scenes of endless joy. There he sees the martyred saints who have suffered on earth, now clad in their robes of triumph; there are meek women and lowly men, who on earth were forgotten, now raised above kings and princes; there are holy anchorites and faithful monks, who on earth fed on herbs and roots, and were clothed in coarse attire, now radiant with the gems of Paradise; there are St. Mark, St. Peter, St. John, and all the holy band of the apostles, who by serving the Master so faithfully on earth have become the princes and rulers of heaven. And there at length, in the highest sphere, Dante is permitted to gaze upon the Almighty Creator, the source of love and purity, the mind by which all things are moved, the radiant centre of light, the ineffable Divine, the ruler of the heart, the victor of the skies, whose fallen foe the poet had not long ago beheld flapping his vulture wings in the icy fetters of the Inferno.

To this short summary we may add the following sketch of the contents of the Paradiso, by J. C. L. Sismondi :—

"After having traversed the seven circles of Purgatory, Dante, in his twenty-eighth canto, reaches the terrestrial Paradise, situated on the summit of the mountain. His description of this place is full of beauty, and all that can be objected to it is that he has too frequently digressed into scholastic dissertations. In this earthly paradise, Beatrice, the object of his earliest affection, descends from heaven to meet him. She appears as the minister of grace, and the organ of divine wisdom; and the passion which he entertains for her exists only in the noblest sentiments and in the most elevated feelings. It is only as a manifestation of the goodness of God that she presents herself to his thoughts after her translation to the skies. In this view she occupies the first place in his poem. From her Virgil received his orders to escort the bard on his journey; by her influence the gates of Hell were opened before him; her care removed every obstacle which opposed his progress; and her mandates are implicitly obeyed throughout the three kingdoms of the dead. Such is the glory with which her lover surrounds her, that we are sometimes inclined to suspect that she is merely an allegorical character, and that the individual object of his affections is lost in a personification of theology. Whilst she is advancing towards him, and whilst, even before he has recognized her, he already trembles in her presence, from the power of his first love, Virgil, who had hitherto accompanied him, disappears. Beatrice reproves the early errors of the poet, and attempts to purify his heart; but her discourse is, perhaps, not altogether equal to the situation. As Dante approaches near to Heaven, he aims at something beyond the ordinary language of the world; and in this attempt he frequently becomes so obscure, that it is difficult to detect the beauties which still remain. To give us an idea of the language of Heaven, he borrows that of the Church; and he intersperses such a number of Latin verses and hymns in his poetry that the difference between the prosody, sound, and turn of expression of the two languages, arrests at every moment the attention of the reader.

"In ascending into Heaven, Dante no longer avails himself of human machinery or human power; and he is, therefore, transported thither by the mere vehemence of his spiritual aspirations. It is here difficult to understand him; and whilst we are endeavouring to discover the meaning of his enigmatical words, we cease to sympathise with his feelings and to accompany him on his way. In his account of the infernal world, there is nothing supernatural, which is not in strict accordance with his own nature. He only exaggerates these forces and those evils of which we have real experience. When he issues from Purgatory and enters into Heaven, he presents us, on the contrary, with supernatural appearances like those of our wildest dreams. He supposes the existence of faculties with which we have no acquaintance. He neither awakens our associations nor revises our habits. We never thoroughly understand him; and the perpetual state of astonishment in which we are placed tends only to fatigue us.

"The first abode of the blessed is the Heaven of the Moon, which revolves with the most tardy motion, and at the greatest distance from the glory of the Most High. Here inhabit the souls of such as, after having pronounced the vows of celibacy and religious seclusion, have been compelled to renounce them. But although Dante distributes the beatified souls into distinct classes, their bliss, which is entirely of a contemplative nature, seems not to be susceptible of such a division.

"He represents one of those spirits as thus expressing himself:—

"Brother! our will
Is, in composure, settled by the power
Of charity, who makes us will alone
What we possess, and nought beyond desire;
If we should wish to be exalted more,
Then must our wishes jar with the high will
Of Him who placed us here."

PARAD., Canto III., v. 70.

This may be very true, but the stake of indifference in which these souls exist, throws an air of coldness on the remainder of the poem, the interest of which is still further impaired by frequent theological disquisitions.

"All the doubts of Dante on the union of the body and the soul, on the nature of vows, on free will, and on other intricate points, are readily solved by Beatrice; but it is not easy to satisfy the minds of his readers on these obscure topics. The most philosophical prose is not always successful on these subjects, and we cannot therefore be surprised if the poetical form of Dante's arguments and the authority of Beatrice, to whose divine mission we are not always disposed to give implicit faith, throw still greater obscurity over questions which are beyond all human comprehension.

"We find very few descriptions in the Paradise of Dante. The great artist whose sketches of the infernal realms possess such appalling sublimity, has not attempted to delineate the scenery of the skies. We leave the Heaven of the Moon with a very imperfect knowledge of its nature; and our visit to that of Mercury is no less unsatisfactory. In each successive kingdom, however, the poet excites our curiosity by assigning a prominent station to some character of distinguished celebrity. In the sixth canto, and in the second heaven, he is accosted by the Emperor Justinian, who is represented in a light as favourable as that in which the civilians have always delighted to view the great father of their science, and very different from that in which he is exhibited, with all his frailties and his vices, in the 'Secret History of Procopius.'

"In the third heaven, which is that of the planet Venus, Dante meets with Cunissa, the sister of Azzolino da Romano, who forewarns him of the revolutions of the Marca Trivigiana. S. Thomas Aquinas and S. Bonaventura are found in the fourth heaven, which is placed in the Sun; and they narrate the glorified actions of S. Dominick and S. Francis. The souls of those who have combated for the true faith are rewarded in the heaven of Mars. Amongst these, he observes his ancestor, Cacciaguida d' Elisei, who perished in the Crusades, and from whom he receives an account of the early greatness of his own family. Cacciaguida proceeds to describe the ancient severity of manners maintained in Florence in the time of Conrad the Third, and gives a catalogue, with a few characteristic remarks, of the noble houses which then flourished; of those which had, in later days, fallen into decay; and of those which had more recently risen to distinction. He then predicts to Dante his approaching exile:—

"Thou shalt leave each thing
Below'd most dearly: this is the first shift Shot from the bow of exile. Thou shalt prove
How salt the savour is of others' bread:
How hard the passage, to descend and climb
By others' stairs. But that shall gill the most Will be the worthless and vile company
With whom thou must be thrown into these straits."
—PARAD., Dante XVII. v. 55.

Cacciaguida encourages Dante to disclose to the world all that he has witnessed in the realm of shadows, and to elevate his mind above the unworthy apprehension of giving offence to those who might deem themselves disgraced by his narrations.

"The sixth heaven is that of Jupiter, in which those who have administered justice with impartiality receive their reward. The seventh is in Saturn, and contains such as devoted themselves to a life of contemplation or seclusion. In the eighth heaven Dante beholds the triumph of Christ, which is attended by a host of beatified souls, and by the Blessed Virgin herself. He is then examined by S. Peter in point of faith, by S. James in hope, and by St. John in charity, from all of whom he obtains honourable testimonials of their approbation. Adam, also, here informs him what language was spoken in the terrestrial paradise.

"The poet then ascends into the ninth sphere, where he is favoured with a manifestation of the Divine Essence, which is, however, veiled by three hierarchies of surrounding angels. The Virgin Mary and the saints of the Old and New Testaments are also visible to him in the tenth heaven. All his doubts are finally resolved by the saints or by the Deity Himself; and this great work concludes with a contemplation of the union of the two natures in the Divine Being."

Such are the three divisions of Dante's poem; they represent, in fact, three phases of intellectual life. Despair, hope, and a perfect fruition are the germs of his unrivalled pictures.

DATE OF COMPOSITION; TRANSLATORS AND TRANSLATIONS.

We may add a few remarks as to the date of the composition of the Divina Commedia. The time of the action of the poem is strictly confined to the end of March and the beginning of April, 1300. It is likely that it was begun shortly after this date. In the Inferno, xix. 79, allusion is made to the decease of Pope Clement V., an event which happened in 1314. This probably marks the date of the completion of this cantica. The Purgatorio was finished before 1318, at which date the Paradiso had yet to be written. The last cantos of the Paradiso were probably not completed till just before the poet's death.

There are numerous translations in English of the Divine Comedy. Perhaps the best known, and the one which has most steadily held its ground, is that of Carey, which, though somewhat turgid in its long strain of blank verse, and giving no idea of the triple rhyme of the original, is in the main good and faithful. Other translations, each with its excellent points, have been made by Messrs. Wright, Cayley, Rossetti, and recently by Mr. Longfellow and Mrs. Ramsay. Most striking of all is the literal prose translation of Dr. Carlyle, who unfortunately did not get beyond the Inferno.

The Vita Nuova has been admirably translated by Mr. Theodore Martin and Mr. Dante Rossetti.

THE CHARACTER OF DANTE'S GENIUS.

The character of Dante's genius has been well described by Mr. Oscar Browning, in the ninth edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." "Dante," says Mr. Browning, "may be said to have concentrated in himself the spirit of the middle ages. Whatever there was of piety, of philosophy, of poetry, of love of nature, and of love of knowledge in those times is drawn to a focus in his writings. He is the first great name in literature after the night of the dark ages.

"The Italian language, in all its purity and sweetness, in its aptness for the tenderness of love and the violence of passion, or the clearness of philosophical arguments, sprang fully grown and fully armed from his brain. The Vita Nuova is still the best introduction to the study of the Tuscan tongue; the astronomy and science of the Divine Comedy are obscure only in a translation.

"The Divine Comedy is indeed as true an epic as the Æneid, and Dante is as real a classic as Virgil. His metre is as pliable and flexible to every mood of emotion; his diction as plaintive and as sonorous. Like him, he can immortalize, by a simple expression, a person, a place, or a phase of nature. Dante is even truer in description than Virgil, whether he paints the snow falling in the Alps, or the homeward flight of birds, or the swelling of an angry torrent. But under this gorgeous pageantry of poetry there lies a unity of conception, a power of philosophic grasp and earnestness of religion which to the Roman poet were entirely unknown.

"Still more striking is the similarity between Dante and Milton. This may be said to lie rather in the kindred nature of their subjects, and in the parallel development of their minds, than in any mere external resemblance. In both the man was greater than the poet, the souls of both were 'like a star and dwelt apart.' Both were academically trained in the deepest studies of their age; the labour which made Dante lean made Milton blind. The 'Dorick sweetness' of the English poet is not absent from the tender pages of the Vita Nuova. The middle life of each was spent in active controversy: each lent his services to the state; each felt the quarrels of his age to be the 'business of posterity,' and left his warnings to ring in the ears of a later time. The lives of both were failures. 'On evil days, though fallen, and evil tongues,' they gathered the concentrated experience of their lives into one immortal work, the quintessence of their hopes, their knowledge, and their sufferings. But Dante is something more than this. Milton's voice is grown faint to us; we have passed into other modes of expression and of thought.

"But if we had to select two names in literature who are still exercising their full influence on mankind, and whose teaching is still developing new sides to the coming generations, we should choose the names of Dante and Goethe. Goethe preached a new gospel to the world, the pagan virtue of self-culture, a sympathy which almost passed into indifference. There is no department of modern literature or thought which does not bear upon it the traces of the age of Weimer. But if we rebel against this teaching, and yearn once more for the ardour of belief, the fervour of self-sacrifice, the scorn of scorn and the hate of hate, which is the meed of the coward and the traitor, where shall we find them but in the pages of the Florentine? The religion of the future, if it be founded upon faith, will demand that faith be reconciled with all that the mind can apprehend of knowledge, or the heart experience of emotion. The saint of those days will be trained, not so much on ascetic counsels of imitation, or in thoughts which base man's greatness on the consciousness of his fall, as on the verse of the poet, theologian, and philosopher, who stands with equal right in the conclave of the doctors, and on the slopes of Parnassus, and in whom the ardour of study is one with the love of Beatrice, and both are made subservient to lift the soul from the abyss of hell, along the terraces of purgatory to the sphere of Paradise, till it gazes on the ineffable revelation of the existence of God Himself, which can only be apprehended by the eye of faith."

A REAL TRIUMPH.

Looked at outwardly, the life of Dante seems to have been an utter and disastrous failure. What its inward satisfaction must have been, we, with Paradiso open before us, can form some conception. To him, longing with an intensity which only the word dantesque will express, to realize an ideal upon earth, and continually baffled and misunderstood, the far greater part of his mature life must have been labour and sorrow. We can see how essential all that sad experience was to him, can understand how all the fairy stories hide the luck in the ugly black casket; but to him, then and there, how seemed it?

"Thou wilt relinquish everything of thee Beloved most dearly; this that arrow is Shot from the bow of exile first of all;
And thou shalt prove how salt a savour hath,
The bread of others, and how hard a path
To climb and to descend the stranger's stairs!"

Paradiso xvii.

Come sa di sal! Who never wet his bread with tears, says Goethe, know ye not, ye heavenly powers!

Our nineteenth century made an idol of the noble lord who broke his heart in verse once every six months, but the fourteenth was lucky enough to produce and not to make an idol of that rarest earthly phenomenon, a man of genius who could hold heart-break at bay for twenty years, and would not let himself die till he had finished his task. At the end of the Vita Nuova, his first work, Dante wrote down that remarkable aspiration, which we have already quoted, that God would take him to Himself after he had written of Beatrice such things as were never yet written of women. It was literally fulfilled when the Commedia was finished, twenty-five years later.

TARDY JUSTICE.

Scarce was Dante at rest in his grave when Italy felt instinctively that this was her great man. Boccaccio tells us that in 1329 Cardinal Poggio (du Poiet) caused Dante's treatise De Monarchia to be publicly burned at Bologna, and proposed further to dig up and burn the bones of the poet at Ravenna, as having been a heretic, but so much opposition was roused, that he thought better of it. Yet this was during the pontificate of the Frenchman John XXII., the reproach of whose simony Dante puts in the mouth of St. Peter, who declares his seat vacant (Parad. xxvii.), whose damnation the poet himself seems to prophesy, against whose election he had endeavoured to persuade the cardinals in a vehement letter.

In 1350, the republic of Florence voted the sum of ten golden florins to be paid by the hands of Messrs. Giovanni Boccaccio to Dante's daughter Beatrice, a nun in the convent of Santa Chiara at Ravenna.

In 1396, Florence voted a monument, and begged in vain for the metaphorical ashes of the man of whom she had threatened to make literal cinders if she could catch him alive. In 1429, she begged again, but Ravenna, a dead city, was tenacious of the dead poet. In 1519, Michael Angelo would have built the monument, but Leo X. refused to allow the sacred dust to be removed.

Finally, in 1829, five hundred and eight years after the death of Dante, Florence got a cenotaph fairly built in Santa Croce (by Ricci), ugly even beyond the usual lot of such, with three colossal figures on it, Dante in the middle, with Italy on one side, and Poesy on the other.

The tomb at Ravenna, built originally in 1483, was restored in 1692, and finally rebuilt in its present form in 1780. It is a little shrine, covered with a dome, not unlike the tomb of a Mohammedan saint, and is now the chief magnet which draws foreigners and their gold to Ravenna. The ralet de place says that Dante is not buried under it, but beneath the pavement of the street in front of it.

In 1373 (Aug. 9), Florence instituted a chair of the Divina Commedia, and Boccaccio was named first professor. He accordingly began his lectures on Sunday, October 3, but his comment was broken off abruptly at the seventeenth verse of the seventeenth canto of the Inferno, by the illness which ended in his death, Dec. 21, 1375. Among his successors were Filippo Vallani and Filelfo. Bologna was the first to follow the example of Florence, and chairs were established at Pisa, Venice, Piacenza, and Milan, before the close of the century. The lectures were delivered in the churches and on feast days, which shows their popular character.

Balbo reckons (but this is guess-work) that the manuscript copies of the Divina Commedia, made during the fourteenth century, and now existing in the libraries of Europe, are more numerous than those of all other works, ancient and modern, made during the same period. Between the invention of printing and the year 1500, more than twenty editions were published in Italy, the earliest in 1272. During the sixteenth century there were forty editions; during the seventeenth, a period, for Italy, of sceptical dilettantism, only three; during the eighteenth, thirty-four; and during the first half of the nineteenth, at least eighty.

The first translation was into Spanish, in 1428. The first French translation was that of Grangin, in 1596; but the study of Dante struck no root in France till the present century. Rivarol, who translated the Inferno in 1783, was the first Frenchman who divined the wonderful force and vitality of the Divina Commedia. The expressions of Voltaire represent very well the average opinions of cultivated persons in respect to Dante in the middle of the eighteenth century. He says, "The Italians call him divine, but it is a hidden divinity; few people understand his oracles. He has commentators, which, perhaps, is another reason for his not being understood. His reputation will go on increasing, because scarce anybody reads him." To Father Bettinelli he writes, "I estimate highly the courage with which you have dared to say that Dante was a madman, and his work a monster." But he adds, what shows that the poet had his admirers even in that flippant century, "There are found among us, and in the eighteenth century, people who strive to admire imaginations so stupidly extravagant and barbarous."

WISE RESOLVE; A SUCCESSFUL MAN'S SECRET OF SUCCESS.

"WHATEVER I have tried to do in life, I have tried with all my heart to do well. What I have devoted myself to, I have devoted myself to completely. Never to put one hand to anything on which I could throw my whole self, and never to affect depreciation of my work whatever it was, I find now to have been my golden rules." Thus, speaking in the person of genial David Copperfield, in whose "personal history and experience" much is contained that happened, to the author himself, does the most popular writer of fiction of the present or perhaps any century sum up the product of his experience, concentrating into a few words the lesson of his life. With the name of Charles Dickens we are accustomed so intimately to associate the idea of triumphant and complete success, the place he won for himself in literature and in the hearts of his readers was so great and lofty, that it is good and encouraging to remember how much of this result was due to the marvellous energy, industry, and perseverance with which he threw himself into everything he attempted,—conquering fate quite as much by his indomitable courage as by his wonderful and pre-eminent genius. It is a wholesome provision of nature, that a physical faculty strengthens and develops in proportion as it is put to use; in the life of Dickens we have the no less wholesome spectacle of the rarest mental faculties made to fulfil their office, and achieve great ends, by continual and strenuous exertion. Great success in itself is wont to arouse admiration, not unmingled with envy; it is well that the means should also be made known by which such success is attained, that it may be understood how persistently and regularly the man, even gifted with genius, must work, if he would produce what is valuable and lasting. "Still achieving, still pursuing," was the motto of Charles Dickens, from that first delicious moment of triumph when, with the number of the Old Monthly Magazine in his hand, containing his earliest printed sketch, he paced up and down Westminster Hall, till his eyes, half blinded by proud, happy tears, should be "fit to appear in the streets," until that sad day, thirty-five years later, when he laid down the pen that had been a source of delight and instruction to millions in every part of the world, and came forth from his writing-room to die. Never was there an author whose heart was more entirely in his work, or one who spared himself less. Whatsoever his hand found to do, he did with his might; and, respecting himself, and honouring his vocation, he worthily won the esteem and admiration of his century.

BIRTH OF CHARLES DICKENS; HIS FATHER, DRAWN BY HIS PEN.

It was at Landport in Portsea, by Portsmouth, that Charles Dickens was born, on the 7th of February, 1812. The great struggle against Napoleon was at its height; and Dickens's birth-place was then one of the most important towns in the kingdom; for the British navy alone had until then been able to boast of definitely curbing the power of the French Empire, while on land Napoleon's eagle still soared triumphant, though the winter of the year was to bring "the beginning of the end" in the tremendous disasters of the retreat from Russia. John Dickens, the father of Charles, was a clerk in the Navy Pay-Office. In the letters of Charles Dickens to his good and trusty friend and judicious literary adviser John Forster, we have sufficient of the character of the elder Dickens laid bare to show us what manner of man he was; and some of his traits were avowedly reproduced in the inimitable "Wilkins Micawber" of "David Copperfield." A kindly, good-hearted man, with the gift that Goldsmith called "a knack of hoping," and which his son aptly characterised as a tendency to "wait for something to turn up;" easy in temper, somewhat grandiloquent in language, rejoicing in high-sounding phrases, and cheerfully, if not very judiciously, drifting onward through difficulties and straitened means, without the power of raising himself out of the slough of despond into which his affairs were gradually sinking. "I know my father to be as kindhearted and generous a man as ever lived in the world," is Dickens's emphatic testimony to his worth. "Everything I can remember of his conduct to his wife or children, or friends, in sickness or affliction, is beyond all praise. By me, as a sick child, he has watched night and day unweariedly. He never undertook any business, charge, or trust that he did not zealously, conscientiously, punctually, honourably discharge." And yet this good, kindly man was Wilkins Micawber, unable to keep his family together, unable to see the paramount importance of giving his son an education, and gravitating towards the debtor's prison.

CHILDHOOD OF DICKENS; SELF-EDUCATION:
"THE SMALL, QUEER BOY."

Charles was the second of John Dickens's children, and the eldest son. The little household incumbrances came rapidly around the hearth of the poor Navy pay-clerk, who ultimately became the father of a family of eight. When Charles was only two years old, John Dickens was removed to London, whence, after another couple of years, in 1816, he was again moved to Chatham dockyard; and at Chatham the childhood of Charles Dickens was passed; for the family remained there between four and five years. In so ne admirable papers written for Household Words and All the Year Round many years afterwards, we have various incidents of Charles Dickens's early days, told as only he could relate them. It is of himself he is speaking when he tells us of the small, queer boy, weak in health but strong in observation and marvelously retentive of memory, who, too feeble to join in rough, boyish games, sits reading odd volumes of the "British classics," a treasure-house of learning to him, that he has discovered in an unused room; taking to his very heart of hearts those doubtful and somewhat ruffianly heroes, Tom Jones and Roderick Random, that most exquisite of rascals Ferdinand Count Fathom—and filling his imagination with the adventures of Don Quixote; sympathizing with the joys and sorrows of the good Vicar of Wakefield; and accepting with unhesitating belief the marvels in the "Tales of the Genii" and "The Arabian Nights;"—a quick child, too, able to recite poetry and prose for the delectation of visitors, and making his good-natured father not a little proud of his comic singing; though afterwards he humorously professed to shudder at the recollection of "what a little nuisance he must have been to his father's friends, and declaring that these exhibitions were always forced upon him against his will. "When I think of it," he says, "the picture always rises in my mind of a summer evening, the boys at play in the churchyard, and I on my bed reading as if for life." Another remarkable picture we have, related by himself, of that early time—remarkable as showing the effect of a few chance words on the mind of a sensitive, impressionable child. His father occasionally took him for a walk to the top of a hill near Chatham, where, "as a treat," he used to be allowed to look at a house which had aroused his infantile admiration; and he was told that "if he were to be very persevering, and were to work hard, he might some day come to live in it." That hill was Gadshill, near Rochester, and the house was Gadshill House, which he bought in 1857, and where he died in 1870. In the All the Year Round articles, we are also told by him how he remembered going to a little day-school in those Chatham times, and being frightened by a hateful pug-dog, with a moist muzzle, a tightly rolled-up tail, and an inveterate tendency to fly at small boys' legs—a pug who is mysteriously associated in his mind with the idea of a fiddle; from which he conjectures the creature's name to have been Fidèle. He also tells with exquisite humour, as a recollection of these Chatham days, how he heard from the son of a Government employé of the existence of "a terrible banditti called the Radicals, whose principles were that the Prince Regent wore stays; that nobody had a right to any salary; and that the Army and Navy ought to be put down;"

whereupon he indulged in devout aspirations that the Radicals might be speedily taken and hanged. Several of the "reprinted pieces" are composed of similar reminiscences.

DEBT AND DIFFICULTY; YOUTHFUL EXPERIENCES; THE MARSHALSEA PRISON.

A very dreary chapter now commences in the life of the boy,—a time of which in later days he only spoke with reluctance and reticence to his best friend Mr. Forster, although he has described its features in some of the earlier chapters of his "David Copperfield," whose experiences in many particulars were those of Dickens himself; indeed, the author of "Copperfield" was startled when his friend and subsequent biographer pointed out to him that the initials of his hero, "D. C.," were those of his own name, "C. D.," reversed. All that little David Copperfield endured at Murdstone and Grinby's, and in the squalid domicile of the magniloquent and elastic Micawber, was undergone by little Charles Dickens when the family again came to London; at which time he was about nine years old. They lived first in Bayham Street, Camden Town, and subsequently in George Street, Hampstead Road; and that irrepressible wolf who so persistently presents himself at the threshold of struggling households, was hardly to be kept from the door. The eldest sister obtained a scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music, and afterwards gained some distinction there; the mother endeavoured to establish a school in George Street, but no pupils came; and at last poor Mr. John Dickens's affairs having come to a crisis, he was arrested and lodged in the Marshalsea Prison, while his family still remained for a time encamped in a kind of gipsy fashion in the George Street house. Little Charles had frequently to go to the prison to see his father; and his early faculty of close observation is displayed in the marvellously vivid descriptions given in several of his books of the squalid, shiftless life of the denizens of that wretched place.

THE LAMERTS AND THE BLACKING FACTORY; A FALSE START IN LIFE.

In due course the unfortunate head of the family obtained his release, and the family Lares and Penates were once more set up, though on a sadly narrow scale. Charles Dickens describes himself as degenerating at this unhappy time into a little household drudge, receiving no education, but employed in such small domestic offices as cleaning the paternal boots, running errands, and "minding" his younger brothers and sisters. But a harder trial was in store for the quiet, sensitive boy, a trial that he described long afterwards, not without bitter recollections, as going far towards breaking his spirit, and rendering him unfit for a higher vocation in life. Two cousins of the family named Lamert (one member of that family, by the way, was afterwards immortalized as Dr. Slammer, in "Pickwick"), had at this time set up a blacking warehouse as an opposition to the famous Mr. Warren's, near Hungerford Market, hard by Charing Cross. It was while John Dickens's pecuniary difficulties were at their worst, that an offer of employment in this warehouse for Charles was made and accepted; and accordingly the little lad used to trudge down every morning to this warehouse, to be employed in pasting labels and fastening string on pots of blacking,—much as little David Copperfield was made to drudge among the wine bottles at Mudstone and Grinby's,—with a feeling of shame and humiliation at his heart, as he felt himself sinking into a little hewer of wood and drawer of water. He told his friend, in later years, of the bitter and passionate tears he shed in secret, when, on the occasion of his sister's gaining a prize at the examination of the Academy pupils, he reflected how he was shut out by his dreary occupation from the chance of any such distinction; and, conscious of the power within him, felt himself sinking into the condition of a little working hi.<sup>1</sup>

RELEASE FROM DRUDGERY; WELLINGTON HOUSE ACADEMY; CHARLES DICKENS AS A SCHOOLBOY.

A fortunate quarrel between the cousin proprietor and John Dickens, having reference, it is supposed, to the exhibition of the little lad in the shop window 'tying up pots of blacking, released Charles Dickens from the ignoble task; for though a reconciliation was effected through his mother's intervention, the father declared that the boy should not return, but should go to school. How deep the impression made by these days on the proud spirit of the child was never known until long afterwards. For a quarter of a century Charles Dickens kept silence on the matter, even to his wife, so painful was the recollection to him. "Until old Hungerford Market was pulled down, until old Hungerford stairs were destroyed," he wrote, "and the very nature of the ground changed, I never had the courage to go back to the place where my servitude began;" and again, "I do not write resentfully or angrily, for I knew how all these things have worked together to make me what I am; but I never afterwards forgot, I never shall forget, I never can forget, that my mother was warm for my being sent back."

Sent back, however, he was not; for his father had evidently at length become conscious that his eldest son might have a prescriptive right to some sort of education; and accordingly sent him as a day-scholar to a classical and commercial academy, Wellington House, near Mornington Crescent, kept by a Mr. Jones, a Welshman. This worthy was remembered by Dickens as an ignorant and somewhat brutal pedagogue, far more at home at caning and "ruling" his pupils than at teaching them; the general impression among the boys being that one of the ushers knew everything, and the master knew nothing,—an opinion which Charles Dickens himself never saw cause in after life to alter or modify. He has himself given an admirable account of the humours of Wellington House and its inmates in the paper in Household Words entitled "Our School;" telling how the boys kept white mice in their desks, and trained these diminutive quadrupeds to draw triumphal chariots; and how the most sagacious and learned of the chargers fell into an inkstand, on a progress to the Capitol, and was dyed black and drowned. Traditions among his school-fellows represent him as a merry, brisk boy, full of fun, and marching along with his head well thrown back, and ready to join in any scheme of schoolboy frolic and mischief. They acted plays at Wellington House Academy, The Miller and his Men, and Cherry and Blair Star, being represented "with much solemnity in the presence of the boys and ushers," with scenery painted by Master Beverley, who, in later years, was to display his abilities in that direction on a far larger stage. A tendency towards the realistic caused them, on one occasion, to represent the blowing up of the mill of the felonious Grindoff with such exuberant and startling effects in the way of fireworks, that the police knocked vehemently at the door, under the impression that the place was on fire. The schoolroom of Wellington House was in after years sliced away bodily at the construction of the Birmingham Railway.

A SCANTY EDUCATION; A LAWYER'S OFFICE; NEWSPAPER REPORTING.

He was only two years, from the age of twelve to fourteen, at Wellington House, and thus got but a meagre education. He used afterwards good-humouredly to imitate his father's grandiloquent style in replying to the natural question: "Pray, Mr. Dickens, where was your son educated?" "Why, indeed, sir—ha! ha!—he may be said to have educated himself." And there was more truth in the answer than good John Dickens suspected. The process of self-education was continually going on, unheeded and unsuspected, in that keen, observant mind; and even the youthful trials and troubles of the blacking warehouse days contributed to it in no small measure, by awakening a warm and vivid sympathy for all the poor and oppressed, all the toilers and strugglers under disadvantage on the world's field of battle, which in subsequent years bore noble fruit of remonstrance against injustice, and sturdy vindication of the rights of toiling millions.

A junior—a very junior—clerkship in an attorney's office, at thirteen shillings and sixpence a week, though entirely short of the dignity of "articles," was, at any rate, very different from his first employment. In a couple of years we find him aspiring to something higher: like David Copperfield, he is striving to master the terrible mysteries of stenography; qualifying himself by intense application to earn his living as a newspaper reporter. True to his maxim of never doing things by halves, and of being satisfied with nothing short of thorough and practical efficiency, he became one of the quickest and most accurate and reliable of shorthand writers; and was employed successively on The True Sun, The Mirror, and the Morning Chronicle. The last-named paper was then under the able management of Mr. Black, the leading organ of the Whigs; and in those days of the first Reform agitation there was plenty of movement and excitement for the reporting staff. Dickens describes himself on one occasion as taking notes frantically of the speeches at a public meeting, with the rain pouring down upon him, and a handkerchief stretched out by way of shelter, and held up over his note-book by two good-natured speculators; on another, as writing out his notes by the light of a wax candle that guttered plentifully over his clothes, as he was whisked along, through the night at full speed in a post-chaise, in imminent danger of overturns and damage of various kinds. The Office, however, was liberal, and readily responded to charges for spoilt clothes, smashed hats, and anything short of broken heads. Speaking of those days, long afterwards, at a public dinner on behalf of the Newspaper Press Fund, he jocosely mentioned how he had worn his knees by writing on them in the old back row of the old gallery of the old House of Commons. "I do verily believe," he continued, "I have been upset in almost every description of vehicle known in this country. I have been, in my time, belated on miry bye-roads, towards the small hours, forty or fifty miles from London, in a wheelless carriage, with exhausted horses and drunken post-boys, and have got back in time for publication, to be received with never-forgotten compliments by the late Mr. Black, coming in the broadest of Scotch from the broadest of hearts I ever knew." For general ability, accuracy, and quickness as a reporter he soon gained the very highest character in the Reporters' Gallery. It was his pursuit for the time; and it was a point of honour with him to be second to none in his work.

FIRST ATTEMPT AT AUTHORSHIP; THE SKETCHES BY BOZ; DICKENS'S OBLIGATIONS TO MR. BLACK.

This was also the time at which he made his first attempt in authorship. The first sketch, dropped with many hopes and fears into the editor's box of the Monthly Magazine, having found favour in the eyes of the Editor, was followed by nine others; and now the pseudonym "Boz"—a corruption and abbreviation of "Moses" (pronounced through the nose Boses, Boz), originally bestowed on a younger brother, in consequence of a fancied resemblance to the son of the Vicar of Wakefield of green spectacle memory—began to be appended to these short articles, and to excite inquiry as to the author. Through the intervention of Mr. George Hogarth, the musical critic of the Chronicle, Dickens procured an engagement to write a number of these amusing pictures of London Life for the evening edition of the paper, with an addition to his salary of a couple of guineas a week; the Editor, Mr. Black—"dear old Black, my first hearty, out-and-out appreciator," as Dickens long afterwards gratefully called him—being quick to discern their merit, and to start their author on his new career.

FORMATION OF LITERARY STYLE; INFLUENCE OF THE ENGLISH CLASSICS.

And here we may note the advantage the writer derived from his early study of the best English authors. Addison's "Spectator," Goldsmith's "Essays" and "Citizen of the World," and in no small measure Washington Irving's "Sketch Book" and "Bracebridge Hall," had each an influence on the sketches that formed Dickens's first book; in which the humour and pathos, the keen observation and power of description afterwards developed in their author, were all discernible, and in no stinted measure.

A young publisher named Macrone now purchased the copyright of the first and second series of the sketches for the sum of £250, a sum at that time of considerable importance to the young author. A couple of years afterwards, when the fame of his next work had made the name of Dickens a tower of strength in the publishing market, the author was obliged to repurchase the copyright from Macrone (to prevent the re-issue of the sketches in monthly parts) at the price of £2,000, for Macrone would take nothing less;—a strictly commercial though hardly a liberal transaction on the part of Charles Dickens's first publisher, who nevertheless died insolvent within two years afterwards; whereupon Dickens strenuously exerted himself for the relief of the widow and children, for whose benefit the "Picknic Papers," edited by "Boz," consisting of a number of short stories by various hands, led off by "The Lamplighter," written by the Editor, were published; and the sale realized a sum which lifted the widow and children above want.

THE "PICKWICK PAPERS;" ORIGINAL DESIGN; GREAT AND BRILLIANT SUCCESS.

The work that first made the name of Dickens famous throughout England was started in the same year, 1836, that saw the publication of his sketches. It originated in the following manner: A Mr. Seymour, an artist of considerable comic talent, had made a name chiefly by the issue of a series of humorous sketches, representing the adventures of cockney amateurs with rod and gun. He proposed to the London publishing firm of Chapman and Hall to start a comic publication, describing the mishaps and trials of the Nimrod Club. Dickens, on being applied to to furnish the text, judiciously objected to the scheme as too narrow, and lacking in novelty; but suggested a wider idea, describing English scenes and characters, and in which the cuts should arise naturally out of the text. Thus arose the "Pickwick Papers," the character of Mr. Winkle being introduced to represent the sporting element. Before the first number was published, Mr. Seymour died in a very mournful way; and Mr. Hablot Browne, who for many subsequent years continued to illustrate Dickens's works, was chosen to succeed him. The name of Pickwick was taken from that of a stage-coach proprietor at Bath; the portrait from a somewhat eccentric black-gaiter wearing gentleman at Richmond. Readers of the work will remember Sam Weller's indignation when that faithful servitor found emblazoned on the back of a Bath coach "the magic name of Pickwick."

Of the success of the work it is enough to say that the binder's order for No. 1 was for 400, and, for No. 15, for 40,000. There was a general shout of enjoyment over the book; and old and young, high and low, were ready to join in the chorus of good-humoured laughter. The freshness and originality of the book, the close and accurate observation, the power of depicting scenes of the most various kinds displayed therein, the number of new characters, each with an individuality of its own, and not one appearing out of place, or interfering with the rest, and, above all, the hearty sense of hilarity pervading the whole, came upon readers like a joyful surprise. That "Pickwick" can compete with the author's later books as a work of art no one will assert; as well might we compare Schiller's Robbers to his Wallenstein, or Shakespeare's Two Gentlemen of Verona to his Merchant of Venice. Some of the characters are crudely sketched; others, like Pott and Slurk, the rival newspaper editors of Eatanswill, are violent caricatures; but Mr. Pickwick and his friends will live in English literature for all time. And even amid the wildest fun, and the most rollicking humour and extravagance of the scenes, there is displayed clearly and unmistakably that higher and deeper purpose which gave to the works of Dickens their special value, and set a fashion which found many worthy imitators—the resolve to make fiction a vehicle for exposing the abuses of the time, for unmasking tyranny, selfishness, and wrong, and for setting up before the eyes of men examples of things to be followed, and things to be avoided. The scenes in the Fleet Prison, for instance, are admirable; the exposure of the unequal working of the laws of imprisonment for debt, ineffectual to punish the dissolute and unprincipled spendthrift, but falling with terrible harshness on the struggling tradesman and petty debtor, and condemning the unhappy chancery prisoner to lifelong duration. We have here the foreshadowing of the task the author put before himself as the work of his life,—the plain setting forth, namely, of the evils of the time in their naked deformity, compelling men to look upon them as they were; and then the question, "Are these things to go on?"

LITERARY ENGAGEMENTS; "BENTLEY'S MISCELLANY;" PUBLICATION OF "OLIVER TWIST."

The renown of "Pickwick" brought the author's name very prominently before the public ; and for some time he was overwhelmed with work, arising from compacts with publishers, too hastily made, without sufficient consideration of the amount of exertion their fulfilment involved. By this time, too, he was a husband and a father, having married the eldest daughter of Mr. Hogarth in 1836 ; and on "twelfth day" in 1837, his son Charles, the first of a numerous family, had been born. Under these circumstances, he became naturally anxious to increase his income ; and this feeling, no doubt, had much to do with the kind of bondage into which he virtually sold himself for the next year or two. While "Pickwick" was still going on, he had already begun his second story, to be published in monthly portions, in a magazine published by Mr. Bentley of Burlington Street, and called Bentley's Miscellany ; and had, moreover, engaged himself to write another story to follow "Oliver Twist" upon its completion. He had also engaged to produce a new book for Messrs. Chapman and Hall, to take the place of "Pickwick," on the completion of that work. No wonder, therefore, that he sometimes stood aghast at the prospect before him, and declared that his responsibilities arose to confront him like "a hideous nightmare."

"Oliver Twist" marks a decided onward step in Dickens's career. The purpose is more definite than in "Pickwick ;" the characters are more consistently worked out, and the reality of the whole more vivid and consistent. The interest in the "Parish Boy's Progress" never flags from beginning to end. Wretched waif and stray of humanity as he is ; oppressed and down-trodden, despised and buffeted even by ill-conditioned, cringing Noah Claypole the charity boy, this poor Oliver comes scatheless through the ordeal of evil. The evils of the mismanagement prevalent in parochial workhouses when the new Poor Law was first introduced are laid bare with wonderful power and skill ; and the types of character, Mr. Bumble the beadle, and Bill Sikes the burglar, and Fagin the rascally "fence," are so true, that they have become accepted types. One great and valuable point in the book is, in fact, that here, as everywhere in his works, vice is exhibited as mean, slinking, and miserable in its very nature. There are no dashing highwaymen, in gold lace and faultlessly fitting boots, to be found here. The wretched thieves are painted as they really are, in their skulking, restless, miserable distrust of all around and of one another, their frowsy, unwholesome spells of festivity in success, their miserable, hurking lives :

"the wages of sin is death" is the moral plainly and wholesomely put forward throughout the whole work, which thus stands out in noble contrast to the books of the "Jack Sheppard" and "Paul Clifford" and "Rookwood" type, where, especially in the first-named, the career of a vulgar thief is surrounded with a false and meretricious interest. Nobody is likely to be lured from the ways of honesty by anything attractive in the career of Bill Sikes, or flash Toby Crackit, the Artful Dodger or Charley Bates. The shadow of the hulks and of the gallows is over every one of the thieves in "Oliver Twist."

GEORGE CRUIKSHANK AND "OLIVER TWIST ;" THE "AUTHOR AND ARTIST" CONTROVERSY.

Speaking of this book it is impossible to avoid mentioning the strange rumour, put about by an American author, and still more strangely endorsed in his last declining years by brave old George Cruikshank, who furnished the illustrations for the work. It was a craze of the veteran artist in his latter days to imagine that he had furnished the main idea and the incidents of the works he illustrated, and that the authors "wrote up" to his pictures. This assertion he made, or at any rate endorsed, with regard to "Oliver Twist," maintaining that a portfolio of sketches in which were included a series illustrating the career of a London thief, and which Dickens accidentally looked through, gave the idea of "Oliver Twist," and that especially, after seeing the picture of the Jew in the condemned cell," Dickens declared his intention of altering the whole plan of his book, and bringing his hero to London. Mr. Forster, in his "Life of Dickens," demolishes this very remarkable story by printing in facsimile a letter of the author, written hurriedly to the artist within a few days of the publication of the last number of the book, in which appears the cut of "Fagin," and also the last plate of all, "Rose Maylie and Oliver," to the execution of which Dickens (not unnaturally) objected. "I returned suddenly to town yesterday afternoon," he writes, "to look at the latter pages of 'Oliver Twist' before it was delivered to the booksellers, when I saw the majority of the plates in the last volume for the first time." So much for the portfolio, and the writer as an illustrator of the artist's story. An appeal to Mr. Bentley from the harassed and wearied author at length led, after long delay, to the withdrawal of the claim for a work to succeed "Oliver Twist," and Dickens handed over the editorship of the Miscellany to his friend Mr. Harrison Ainsworth, and felt himself at liberty to throw all his energies into his next long story which was to consist of twenty numbers, like "Pickwick." The new book was completed and published in 1838 and 1839.

"NICHOLAS NICKLEBY;" CHEERFUL AND HEALTHY TONE OF THE WORK; YORKSHIRE SCHOOLS AND THEIR INIQUITIES.

Its title was "Nicholas Nickleby." The number of copies sold soon reached 50,000, an unprecedented success in those days. The book, besides being full of character,—Mrs. Nickleby, with her profound knowledge of the world and sage aphorisms, is inimitable,—goes straight to the reader's heart, in its cheerful toleration of small faults and eccentricities, and its manly avowal of detestation for meanness and fraud. Especially charming is the chapter that tells how the sunshine of home is once more diffused round the poor family, who have tasted the bitterness of poverty and dependence among strangers, when they are installed in the modest little cottage at Bow, "all the peace and cheerfulness of home restored, with such new zest imparted to every frugal pleasure, and such delight to every hour of meeting, as misfortune and separation alone could give;" and "the poor Nicklebys were social and happy, while the rich Nickleby was alone and miserable." In this book, too, the special purpose Dickens loved to associate with each of his works vividly appeared, in the masterly exposure of the infamous Yorkshire school system, then flourishing greatly, and to which the work dealt a fatal blow. Many a Mr. Wackford Squeers had reason, in diminished profits and a woeful falling off of clients, to curse the energetic young novelist, who travelled down into Yorkshire armed with an introduction to a local worthy, the John Browdie of the story, that he might himself see with his own eyes, and hear with his own ears, the truth concerning those precious establishments. "We have been very friendly like," said Dickens's interlocutor, when reluctantly brought to speak upon the subject; and proceeded to show his friendliness by entreating his visitor never to send a boy to a Yorkshire school while there was a horse to hold or a crossing to sweep in London.

FAMILY ARRANGEMENTS; "MASTER HUMPHREY'S CLOCK;" "THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP."

An expedition into Devonshire at this time made a break in the young author's regular work. His father had become superannuated, and had given up the reporting work in which he had been for some years engaged. Dickens went down to the west, and secured a cheerful cottage, a short distance from Exeter, for the old people and his youngest brother. In a humorous and kindly letter he tells Forster of the long and complicated negotiations necessary to secure the cottage from a landlady suffering from an attack of the nerves, which has nevertheless left her "in her debilitated state something sharper than the finest lancet;" and of his "coming over the upholsterer's daughter with many virtuous endearments, to propitiate the establishment, and reduce the bill." "I am sure they may be happy there," he heartily says, "for if I were older, and my course of activity were run, I am sure I could, with God's blessing, for many and many a year."

The continual activity of Dickens, and the astonishing amount of energy and vitality he infused into each new undertaking, his way of identifying himself with his characters until they seemed to become living beings in whose fortunes he was personally concerned, was doubtless one great cause of the intense interest they excited in his readers. His versatility was now shown in an entirely new direction, in the composition of the work ultimately published, with the strengthening element of the illustrations of Cattermole, added to those of Hablot Browne, under the title of "Master Humphrey's Clock." That he had some difficulty at first in settling upon the plan of the book is evident by the various starts he made in the earlier numbers,—some of them evidently false starts,—and the doubtful expedient of reintroducing Mr. Pickwick and the two Wellers; but all uncertainty vanished when once the "Old Curiosity Shop" was fairly started; and the whole nation was interested in the sorrows, wanderings, and heroic endurance of little Nell. Here, again, we are struck by the marvellous originality and truth of the characters and the wealth of fancy and imagination in the various scenes. Dick Swiveller and the marchioness, Kit Nubbles and Mr. Chuckster, tigerish Quilp and crawling Sampson Brass, Mrs. Jarley of the waxworks, and the partners in the Punch theatre, Codlin and Short, are as real as anything he had produced; while in little Nell, moving in the purity of her innocence and the strength of her childish heroism like a being from a better world amid the sordid surroundings that are unable to cast even the shadow of evil upon her life, we have a conception far beyond any of his former creations. It was this character that especially won him a host of admirers in America.

"BARNABY RUDGE;" GRAPHIC DESCRIPTION OF THE GORDON RIOTS; GRIP.

In "Barnaby Rudge," on the other hand, we have an entirely different tale; and here the author appears at his best in the portraiture of the scenes of terror and confusion in the famous riots of 1780. Here again the healthy hatred of wrong and injustice appears, in the indignant exposure of the horrible recklessness with which, in "the good old times" a hundred years ago, the punishment of death was inflicted alike on the murderer and the pilferer, the slayer of a whole family and the passer of a bad coin. The lesson that cruel and savage punishments tend to brutalize a nation, rather than restrain crime, is admirably put forward; and in Dennis the hangman, the most degraded villain of the whole Gordon mob, we have a graphic picture of the result and outcome of the hanging system. It was a bold experiment to choose an imbecile for the hero of the book; but there is nothing repulsive in the weakness of poor light-hearted Barnaby; while the author has here again vindicated his theory of "good in everything,"—the existence of "a soul of goodness in things evil, if men observingly distil it out." Barnaby's weakness of mind does not prevent him from being happy in his own way. The existence of good in a latent or undeveloped state is also graphically shown in the poor savage ostler, Maypole Hugh, utterly reckless and without care as to his own fate, but with a kindly pity and regret for the imbecile lad who loves him, and whom he has involved in his own doom of death; clinging with "faith and strong belief" to the idea that Barnaby's life will be spared, even while he ferociously exults over the abject, condemned, miserable hangman, whining out his wretched terror, and clutching frantically at the lessening chance of reprieve as the hour for execution approaches. There is deep pathos, too, in Hugh's endeavour at the last moment to find an owner for his dog, "but not unless he intends to use him well;" the dumb creature being the only living thing that has shown affection for him. The minor character of Grip the raven was taken from the life; for the original Grip was an inmate of his household, much valued by his master for his cleverness and oddity, but looked upon with terror by the children, whose ankles he was always menacing with his iron beak. The bird died in 1841, during the time "Barnaby" was appearing. Dickens, in a letter to Forster, from Devonshire Terrace, New (now Marylebone) Road, where he was then residing, describes the circumstances of the bird's decease. "I am not wholly free from suspicions of poison." He adds: "A malicious butcher has been heard to say that he would 'do for him;' his plea was that he would not be molested in taking orders down the mews by any bird that wore a tail. Other persons have also been heard to threaten; among others, Charles Knight, who has just started a weekly publication, price threepence; 'Barnaby' being, as you know, fourpence." Grip was stuffed, and ultimately fetched £80 at the sale of Dickens's effects at Gadshill, many years afterwards.

VISIT TO AMERICA IN 1842; "AMERICAN NOTES FOR GENERAL CIRCULATION."

Free from the literary engagements and contracts that had harassed him for years, Dickens now resolved to give his mind a rest, and procure an entire change by a visit to America. This intention he carried out in 1842, starting from Liverpool in the steamer Britannia at the beginning of the year. His wife accompanied him. In the United States he was received with enthusiasm, and with only too eager hospitality. But the visit was not in every respect a success. He felt strongly on the subject of the law, or rather the absence of law, respecting British copyright in America; and felt aggrieved that his books should be reprinted and circulated throughout the States by any publisher who chose to lay hands upon them. Accordingly, in the cause of his English literary brethren as well as his own, he spoke strongly on the subject, perhaps in season and out of season; and no little irritation was produced. The time, too, to which he had to restrict himself in his visit was also manifestly too short for a fair examination of America and its institutions; and thus, in many instances, he saw only the surface features of the things he described and generalised on insufficient data. The result of the tour he gave in a book called, "American Notes for General Circulation." It could not be other than lively and amusing; but here and there it is open to the charge of flippancy; and the blemish of overhaste appears throughout. The best parts are the very practical and useful chapters on the solitary system of imprisonment, which he saw in full work in Philadelphia and elsewhere, and which, on apparently sufficient grounds, he condemns as cruel in practice, and deplorable in its results on the prisoner; and the remarks on emigrant ships and emigration, pointing out the necessity of regulations and measures of protection for helpless and ignorant emigrants, which were afterwards adopted. The strictures on some American institutions caused great offence in certain transatlantic circles. On the question of slavery and its abominations he spoke out nobly, strengthening his arguments by extracts from advertisements, etc., in United States newspapers.

"MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT;" HOSTILITY IN AMERICA; "PICTURES FROM ITALY."

The feeling that he had been hard in his judgment upon a people who had welcomed him with enthusiasm, was increased by the chapters in his next work, "Martin Chuzzlewit," in which America and its institutions are described. The Elijah Pograms, Hannibal Chollops, Colonel Divers, and Scadgers, the poisonous fungi of transatlantic civilization, with their libellous papers, fraudulent land companies, and bowie-knife swagger, though admitted to be correct portraits of existing types, were vehemently repudiated as giving altogether an unjust idea of the bulk of American society; and it was many years before the soreness thus engendered entirely passed away. The humour and pungency of the satire increased the indignation with which it was regarded; though at last our transatlantic cousins became conscious how much of it was to be taken "in a Pickwickian sense;" rather as an outbreak of exuberant fun, than as a seriously intended criticism on a great nation. In the end the reconciliation was complete, as was proved by the welcome extended to Dickens on his later visit to the United States many years afterwards. As a work, "Martin Chuzzlewit" is more complete in design than its predecessors; and the design of the author is more thoroughly seen throughout. Selfishness is here the vice that is exposed; with the greed of gain, and the abuse of the forms of outward piety and morality for mean and sordid ends, as seen in the arch-hypocrite Pecksniff. The reformation of the selfish hero Martin, by means of suffering in the dreary swamp of Eden, and the various phases of the vice of selfishness in the Chuzzlewit family, each of whom is conscious of it in the rest, but has no idea of his own shortcomings, is capital. Sarah Gamp and Betsy Prig, types of a race now happily almost extinct, and merry Mark Tapley, jolly "under creditable circumstances," are also famous. That the book introduced the author to a new and even more appreciative because a more discerning, class of readers than had laughed and wept over his previous works, there is no doubt; but as a pecuniary success, there was a considerable falling off. The number of copies disposed of was far short of the sale of "Nickleby;" and the author, with a growing family and increasing responsibilities round him, was alarmed at the prospect of an insufficiency of income. Accordingly he resolved to remove to the continent for a time; and for the next two years we find him residing with his wife and children at Genoa. His Italian experiences furnished the materia for his "Pictures from Italy," a pleasant and instructive book, in which much information and many useful reflections are given in unconventional, friendly style, the author entirely avoiding, as he justly observes, the guide-book manner.

THE "CHRISTMAS CAROL," ITS GENIAL TONE; "THE CHIMES," A SECOND CHRISTMAS BOOK.

Before his departure from England, he had written the glorious "Christmas Carol," which was received, as it deserved to be, with acclamation: for "peace and good will" is the key-note of the work; and the manner in which the reader's sympathies are enlisted for the Cratchet family—from poor homely, simple Bob the clerk, "carrying home on Saturdays only fifteen copies of his Christian name, to the crippled child, Tiny Tim, thinking in church on Christmas morning of that unchanging Friend of the poor, who made lame men to walk, and blind men to see—is admirable throughout. The profit, however, on the book disappointed him entirely. The work had been too expensively got up for the price at which it was to sell; and this helped in determining him to carry out his scheme of foreign residence. It was at this time that Messrs. Bradbury and Evans became his publishers.

At Genoa he wrote the second of his Christmas books, "The Chimes." In this his expressed intention was not only to advocate the cause of the poor and needy in general, but of that serf and pariah of forty years ago, the agricultural labourer. It was a time of windy oratory; and absurd remedies were proposed for great social wants and evils. A Duke had recently made the remarkable discovery that a pinch of curry powder in a labourer's soup would answer all the purposes of solid food; and a portentously stupid alderman was boasting from the bench that he had "put down suicide." "The Chimes," therefore, though far inferior to the "Christmas Carol" as a literary production, came in good time to ring in the new year with renewed hope for the poor man, by setting before the world his claims for more generous and kindly consideration at the season when all hearts are supposed to be most open to kindly influences. The author made a flying visit to England, staying in London only a few days, that he might have the pleasure of reading the proof sheets of the completed book to a small circle of literary and artistic friends.

A LITERARY AND ARTISTIC GATHERING; RENEWED VIGOUR FROM CHANGE OF SCENE;
"DOMBEY AND SON."

They were a remarkable company who assembled in Mr. Forster's chambers, in Lincoln's Inn Fields, on the 2nd of December 1841, to hear "The Chimes" read by its author. Besides Dickens's friend and biographer, there were present Douglas Jerrold, Layman Blanchard, Carlyle, Fox, Dyce the Shakspearian scholar, Harness, Maclise and Stanfield the famous painters, and the author's brother Frederick. Writing in 1871, Forster observed how of all that friendly gathering, only Carlyle and himself remained alive. A few years afterwards they too were gone. Changes of scene and change of climate, with the brain rest consequent on a withdrawal from the whirl of London, had the best effect on Dickens's health. There had long been rumours in general circulation, to the effect that the great novelist's power was exhausted; "he had written himself out," was the favourite phrase; and certain papers gravely advised him to take to the stage for a career, as his talents as an actor were well-known. This idea of Dickens's genius as a worked-out mine was brilliantly disproved by the appearance of his next work, "Dombey and Son," with an entirely new set of characters, as sharply drawn and as typical as any of his earlier efforts,—Captain Cuttle, and his friend Joe Bunsby, the philosophic commander of the cautious Clara; Mrs. Pipchin, in whom a real personage of the dreary Bayham Street days may be recognized; and the lachrymose Wickham and the beaming Polly Toodles, Susan Nipper and Toots, heavy Doctor Blimber with his wife and daughter, always digging away at the dead languages "like ghouls;" poor, pretty little Paul, and his sweet, unselfish sister Florence, and sullen and frowning amid them all, in his blind, stiff-necked pride and arrogance, the hero of the story himself,—all are admirable, and not one of them is in the way. The curse of pride is here exposed as that of selfishness was in "Martin Chuzzlewit." The author's design was at first to have made Walter Gay a good-natured, easy-going youth, gradually going astray from want of self-sustaining power; but he subsequently changed his mind, and bestowed a better fate on the instrument-maker's nephew.

CONTINUATION OF THE CHRISTMAS BOOK SERIES; "THE CRICKET ON THE HEARTH;" "THE BATTLE OF LIFE;" "THE HAUNTED MAN;" DICKENS'S RETURN TO LONDON.

The series of Christmas books, commenced so auspiciously with the glorious "Carol," was continued for some years. After the "Chimes," appeared successively the "Cricket on the Hearth," "The Battle of Life," and "The Haunted Man." Of these, the first-mentioned had a brilliant success, the sale at first starting doubling that of the "Christmas Carol." Like "The Chimes" and some of the larger books of the author, it was dramatized, and had a good run on the London stage; but though little Dot is delightful, there was a general impression that John Peerybingle was too etherealised a carrier to pass muster among low-life personages; while in "The Battle of Life" and "The Haunted Man" there is at times a painful appearance of effort in the humorous parts, the fun being somewhat forced. Indeed, these last two Christmas books are about the only works of Dickens which contain no characters that have become famous, and have remained proverbial in the mouths of men.

After some years of residence in Italy and Switzerland, with a shorter stay in France, the effect of all of which was destined to appear with advantage in his latter works, we find Charles Dickens once more established in London. The later period of his activity may be said to commence with the book which has generally been considered as the best of his novels, the "History of David Copperfield."

"THE HISTORY OF DAVID COPPERFIELD;"
PERSONAL INTEREST OF THE AUTHOR IN HIS HERO; THE CHARACTERS.

It has already been mentioned that much of the author's life is interwoven in the experiences of the hero of this book; and hence, probably, the lifelike reality of the descriptions. In poor little neglected David, trudging through the streets in shabby clothes from his mean lodging to his sordid and uncongenial employment, his heart sore and heavy with the knowledge that his work can lead to nothing in the future but nameless drudgery, his own experiences and feelings in the days of the blacking shop employment are portrayed; as are the outlines of a later time in the description of David's employment as a reporter, and his efforts and successes in literature. Here again we have a number of personages who have become familiar to all, and hold their own in virtue of their reality: brave, simple-hearted old Peggotty and his nephew Ham; the "lone and lorn" Mrs. Gummidge; the fawning scoundrel Uriah Heep, the natural outcome of the detestable cant of "false humility," the "very 'umble" formula continually in his mouth, and craft and meanness and hatred of his superiors rankling at his heart; then that awkward, kindly Traddles, with his irrepressible hair and his inexhaustible good nature; the inimitable Micawbers; good, angular, short-mannered and golden-hearted Miss Betsey, with her perennial feud against the donkey-drivers; stolid Mr. Barkis and his excellent wife, the good and faithful servant; savage Mr. Creakle the schoolmaster, whom the little oppressed boy knows in his heart of hearts to be an incapable brute, utterly incompetent to fulfil the duties he has undertaken, but mellowing down in his old age into the fussy magistrate, petting and coddling interesting criminals; then Agnes and Dora, so different from each other, and yet both so lovable; those grim, hard Murdstones, with their hard and hateful "firmness" and gloomy tyranny, their cant of "duty" as detestable in its way as Uriah Heep's humility, meaning that everybody and everything is to yield to them; James Steerforth, brilliant, talented, and fascinating, but a villain at heart, selfish and unscrupulous; Mr. Mell, shabby of attire, and deplorable as to his boots, but a gentleman notwithstanding; Mrs. Crupp, with her house-keeping book and her spasms, a relative evidently of Sarah Gamp, or perhaps of Betsy Prig; little Emily and poor Martha, and proud, passionate Mrs. Steerforth, and fiery Rosa Dartle,—what a number and what a variety of personages are drawn here together within the compass of one book, each helping to work out a part of the story! In the narrative, too, there is a great improvement on the former works of the author—more unity of design, a clearer working out of a leading idea from the beginning; nor could a healthier or a more useful moral be displayed than is shown in the wasted career of the gifted villain, whose life is violently ended amid the wreck of the home he has laid desolate; while the "unfortunate" boy of the school, without influential friends or special talent or any stroke of luck, works his way, in the person of Traddles, to honour and happiness by the sheer force of perseverance, honesty, and truth. It is this continual recognition of what is really high and noble and worthy of effort in life, that gives their chief value to Dickens's works; and nowhere is the lesson of manliness, self-reliance, and honest effort more clearly set forth than in "David Copperfield."

It is impossible to read this—and, indeed, any of the books of Dickens—without seeing how fully he carried out in his own works his idea of strenuousness and exertion. Nothing is partly or incompletely done; every personage, every incident, is the result of deep thought and carefully elaborated design. Indeed, he himself said that he could hear his characters speak to him, and so thoroughly realized them in his mind that to him they became realities, from whom it grieved him to part when the work was concluded. His energy was enormous. Never was there so persistent an opponent, both in preaching and practice, of the detestable doctrine of laziness that advocates letting things alone, with the idea that they will manage themselves and "come right." They will not come right, he persisted; they must be pulled right, brought right, hammered right. When a wrong, or an injustice, or error came under his notice, his first question always seems to have been, "How came it there?" his second, "How was it to be removed?" The reply to the first question often led to a solution of the second.

At this time the prosperity of his life was interrupted by two misfortunes that came upon him within a few weeks of each other,—the death of his father, to whom he was tenderly attached, and that of his youngest daughter Dora, which took place very suddenly.

"BLEAK HOUSE;" EXPOSURE OF CHANCERY DELAYS; PORTRAITS FROM THE LIFE.

In "Bleak House," his next novel, the reputation gained by "Copperfield" was not altogether sustained. Esther's diary, and Esther herself, are not quite natural; and the miserable Smallweed family, from Grandfather Smallweed downwards, are eminently disagreeable. But the book did yeoman's service in putting forward, in the most telling way, the shameful practices and condition of that great manufactory of misery and wretchedness, that impersonation of the law's delay, "the Court of Chancery." The evidence against that remarkable institution had been got up with singular care and completeness. Gridley, with his wrongs, poor little Miss Flite with her madness, are not imaginary; both had a real existence; and the latter personage especially is remembered by many frequenters of the Court in Lincoln's Inn. Harold Skimpole, the "child" who knows nothing of money matters, and yet so shrewdly manages to evade his responsibilities, and get others to take them up, was taken from that genial man of letters, Leigh Hunt; and it may be questioned whether the proceeding in thus giving his portrait was quite fair. Dickens himself had misgivings on the subject, and changed the name, which was at first to have been Leonard Skimpole, to Harold, to prevent identification; but the sketch was too like the original for any doubt. Laurence Boythorn, with his tremendous discharges of blank cartridge denunciations, and his homeric bursts of laughter, is Walter Savage Landor. In the wretched career of Richard Carstone, Dickens carried out the idea he had originally intended to associate with Walter Gay in "Dombey."

JOURNALISTIC WORK; "THE DAILY NEWS;"
"HOUSEHOLD WORDS;" "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

By this time Charles Dickens had associated himself with another branch of literary activity. Already in 1846, when the Daily News was started as a morning journal, in a most complete and costly style, he had for a time undertaken the editorship; but the duties were irksome and uncongenial to him, and interfered with his regular pursuits, and he soon gave up the post. In 1850, however, he started a weekly periodical on his own account, with his friends and publishers Messrs. Bradbury and Evans. Under the title Household Words, his journal became exceedingly popular; and in it, and its successor All the Year Round, some of his later works made their first appearance; besides a number of detached articles, and a series, "The Uncommercial Traveller," containing some of the very best and most amusing descriptive sketches he ever wrote. The most important of these form the "Reprinted Pieces" included in his works.

Of the books published in his periodical, the first was "Hard Times," intended as a protest against the system of education that admits no play of fancy or imagination, but would "teach these children nothing but facts." Mr. Mac Choakumchild the schoolmaster, and Mr. Gradgrind, the matter-of-fact M.P. and magnate of Coketown, are the apostles of this creed; while in the blatant humbug Josiah Bounderby, with his braggart egotism and laudation of himself as a "self-made man," and his wholesale denunciations of the class from which he has risen, we have a graphic, if somewhat exaggerated, picture of a phase of real life. A far more important work, and one that called into play some of the highest qualities of the author, appeared in the same journal under the title "A Tale of Two Cities,"—the cities being London and Paris, and the period that preceding and comprising the great French Revolution. Not since he painted the Gordon riots in "Barnaby Rudge," had Dickens had such an opportunity of describing a great popular tumult; and the descriptive scenes, taken apart from the story, are enough to stamp the book as a work of the highest class of merit. Carlyle himself did not paint more vividly the fever heat of 1789, or the fall of the Bastille. The picture of London, too, and the two trials of Charles Darnay in the two cities, are among the author's masterpieces; while the characters of Sydney Carton and Jarvis Lorry are two excellent pieces of painting. In the graphic delineation of the Bastille prisoner, we recognize some of the effects of solitary confinement, as detailed in the "American Notes" from the writer's personal observation many years before.

"GREAT EXPECTATIONS."

But of the works of Dickens published in his periodical, the most powerful was certainly "Great Expectations." Here we have the author, in many respects, at his best. The wholesome lesson, not obtruded upon the reader, but present, nevertheless, from first to last, is inculcated, that before condemning the black sheep of this world, it behoves us to consider how many of them have had a reasonable chance of remaining white. "What's done we partly may compute; but know not what's resisted." From first to last we are never without sympathy and pity for poor Provis the convict, fierce and dangerous ruffian though we know him to be; when he describes himself to his protégé Pip as "a warmint, dear boy," giving that singular designation "as if it were a kind of trade;" when he tells how he first "remembers himself thieving turnips for a living;" and how, when he was locked up as a little pilferer and vagabond he was exhibited to visitors by the turnkeys as a "regular bad 'un," until it became accepted as an indisputable fact that his destiny in life was to be a thief, and to run through the appointed series of punishments by statutes in such cases made and provided,—to wear out his appointed quantity of key-metal, and at last to make his exit in the regulation way, through the trap beneath the gallows,—we are seized with a very wholesome doubt whether the fault is entirely his, or whether a part of the blame does not lie with those pastors and masters, temporal and spiritual, who allowed him to grow up like a young wolf, and then hunted him for being wolfish. Pip, too, is admirable, with his quick observation, his ability, his ambition, and his uneasy sense of inferiority from his birth and position; loving and honouring brave, manly Joe Gargery the blacksmith in his heart, and yet weakly and caddishly ashamed of the poor good fellow's uncouthness before his friend Herbert; learning to estimate things at their true value in the hard school of life, and recognizing at last that "tis only noble to be good." "God mend all," says good Queen Catherine in Shakespeare's Henry VIII., when the offences of Buckingham are harshly dwelt upon by the vindictive cardinal. And that is the feeling awakened in the reader by the book. Here are a number of human beings, weak, selfish, erring, sinful; but in nearly every instance with a capacity within them for better things—each with a human heart, if only one had skill to touch it. Wemmick, the clerk of the Old Bailey lawyer, living in a kind of perpetual haze and fog of crime, cultivates kindly affections, and tends an "aged parent" at Walworth. Provis the convict determines to make a gentleman of the little lad who has fed him when he was starving; even uncle Pumblechook, humbug and impostor though he is, has a furtive satisfaction in the success of Pip, for which he takes credit, though having nothing on earth to do with it; and Mr. Jaggers the criminal lawyer, who has lived and breathed and had his being year after year among the worst of thieves and murderers,—people "with whom trouble meant Newgate," still has not had the belief in humanity entirely knocked out of him. And here again we wonder at the entirely new set of personages with whom we are brought in contact. They are real men and women; we are interested in them at once; and yet they are utterly apart and distinct from any the author has presented to us before.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO FELLOW-WORKERS.

One of the best traits in the character of Charles Dickens was shown in the hearty and genial encouragement he was always ready to give to any of his literary brethren and sisters, by the expression of cordial approval of their efforts, wherever that approval could be conscientiously given. Many a young author was able to look with pride and satisfaction on words written by him, that cheered him at the beginning of the arduous and exhausting struggle for success. A letter to Miss Harriet Parr, who, writing under the pseudonym of "Holme Lee," had sent him a tale, "Gilbert Massinger," for Household Words, may be adduced as an instance. He writes from Folkestone on August 14th, 1855: "I read your tale with the strongest emotion, and with a very exalted admiration of the great power displayed in it. Both in severity and tenderness I thought it masterly. It moved me more than I can express to you. I wrote to Mr. Wills" (his friend and coadjutor in Household Words) "that it had completely unsettled me for the day, and that by whomsoever it was written, I felt the highest respect for the mind that had produced it. It so happened that I had been for some days at work upon a character externally like the aunt. And it was very strange that the two people seemed to be near to one another at first, and then turned off on their own ways so wide asunder. . . . Experience shows that a story in four portions is best suited to the peculiar requirements of such a journal (as Household Words), and I assure you it will be an uncommon satisfaction to me if this correspondence should lead to your enrolment amongst its contributors. But my strong and sincere conviction of the vigour and pathos of this beautiful tale, is quite apart from, and not to be influenced by any ulterior results. You had no existence to me when I read it. The actions and sufferings of the characters affected me by their own force and truth, and left a few sound impressions on me." With regard to other stories by young authors he expressed himself with equal warmth and kindness. Thus he says: "If you will read 'Kissing the Rod,' a book I have read to-day, you will not find it hard to take an interest in the author of such a book."

DOMESTIC TROUBLES; A "DISMAL FAILURE;" AN ILL-ADVISED PUBLICATION.

But while he was delighting thousands with his genius, and every succeeding year brought an increase to his popularity and fame, he had to write to his friend Forster of "a dismal failure" in his life; a failure in which the man who admired him and loved him above all the world was compelled sorrowfully, yet deliberately and emphatically, to pronounce him in fault. Grave unhappiness had invaded the precincts of his home; and between himself and the lady who had been his wife for twenty years there was disunion, ending at last in separation. "It is not with me a matter of will, or trial, or sufferance, or good humour, or making the best of it, or making the worst of it any longer," he writes; "it is all despairingly over. Have no lingering hope of or for me, in this association: a dismal failure has to be borne, and there an end." Some false reports that were spread relative to the reasons for the separation so stung him, that most unfortunately he caused a statement, headed "Personal," to be inserted in Household Words, in which, with a lamentable indiscretion quite at variance with his usual strong sense, he made his most private affairs public property. His biographer mournfully records these unhappy facts, adding with equal justice and good taste, "Such illustrations of grave defects in Dickens's character as the passage in his life affords, I have not shrunk from placing side by side with such excuses in regard to it as he had unquestionable right to claim should be put forward also."

The publication of the article in Household Words led to a dispute with its publishers, resulting in his purchasing their share, and stopping the publication, substituting for it All the Year Round, a publication of a similar character. The refusal by his old friend Mr. Mark Lemon, editor of Punch, to permit a personal statement in that periodical, led to a break in the long and intimate friendship.

DICKENS AT GADSHILL; "LITTLE DORRIT;"
"OUR MUTUAL FRIEND."

By this time Dickens had purchased Gadshill House, near Rochester, the object of the childish dreams of many years before; and here he principally dwelt until the end of his life. His mind had often been occupied with a scheme by which he confidently hoped to gain much money; and the idea of providing liberally for his numerous family was always present in his mind. He now carried that scheme into effect. It was to give public readings from his works, "Pickwick," the "Christmas Carol," scenes from "Dombey," and some of his shorter pieces (generally from the Christmas numbers of Household Words and All the Year Round), in London and the provinces. One of his favourite selections was "The Boots at the Holly Tree Inn," in which the romantic loves of two children are related with infinite sympathy and humour. These readings he began in 1858, and continued at intervals until the last year of his life. They were an amazing success, both in themselves and financially; but apart from the fortune they brought him, it is a question whether they were not a mistake. The time necessary for preparation was considerable; for here, as in everything he undertook, Dickens threw himself thoroughly into the affair, learning the whole chapters he was to read by heart, and practising the emphasis, intonation, and delivery of each sentence over and over again; and the readings themselves, with the journeys they involved, were a source of such exertion and fatigue, that they must have seriously weakened him, both physically and in the freshness and vigour of his mind; in truth, he at last broke down under the strain. In England, Scotland, and Ireland he was received with equal enthusiasm; indeed, the very warmth of the greetings, and the eagerness of his audiences to welcome him, caused him to persevere when he should have paused, and frequently to tax himself quite beyond his strength.

Two more books, in the form that had long been a favourite one with him, that of twenty shilling numbers, require a few words of notice, that of "Little Dorrit" and "Our Mutual Friend." The former of these portrays the devotion of a dutiful, unselfish daughter for a foolish, self-indulgent, and dreadfully weak and helpless father. It is, moreover, remarkable for the capital satire on the manner in which the science "How not to do it" was successfully cultivated in the public service of England. The Circumlocution Office and the aristocratic families of the Barnacles and Stiltstalkings, are among the best things Dickens produced; and many of the characters are drawn with great power and humour. The chief personage, however, Arthur Clennam, was certainly not one of the author's successes; and here and there the humour appears somewhat forced. The second, "Our Mutual Friend," undoubtedly shows a great falling off; the situations are unnatural; and even to the most persistently optimist view, the vision of gentle Lizzie Hexam must appear as an impossible outcome of the surroundings of "waterside characters," and riflers of drowned men. The characters also are, in most instances, either strangely exaggerated or very unsympathetic, and the fame of the author will certainly not be increased by "Our Mutual Friend." The only personage likely to live and to become proverbial, as so many of the author's characters have done, is the purse-proud, self-sufficient Mr. Podsnap, persuaded that everything goes well because he is prosperous, and "waving off" all unpleasant subjects.

DICKENS AS A PUBLIC READER; SECOND.
VISIT TO AMERICA; RETURN TO GADSHILL; HIS DEATH.

In 1867, he was tempted by a number of pressing invitations to cross the Atlantic once more, for the purpose of giving a number of readings in the principal towns of the United States. Before his departure he was entertained at a banquet at Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen Street. Almost every literary celebrity in London was present, and Dickens delighted his hearers by delivering one of those happy, half biographical speeches, brightened up by touches of humour, in which he had no rival. It may be said that he was probably by far the best chairman that ever presided at a public festival. Several times he took the chair at the annual dinners of benevolent associations connected with the press, and his speeches were admirable, in matter and delivery; and he presided at the dinner given to his friend and rival in popularity, Thackeray, previous to the latter's visit to the United States. It may be mentioned, too, that so great was his dramatic talent, exhibited in many amateur performances, that there can be no doubt he would have achieved eminence on the stage.

There had been some doubt in his mind as to his reception beyond the Atlantic; for the "American Notes" and the "Chuzzlewit" of many years before had made an uncomfortable impression. But he had no cause for apprehension. The greeting that awaited him was tumultuous in its heartiness. "Even in England, Dickens is less known than here," said a New York Journal; "and of the millions here who treasure every word he has written, there are tens of thousands who would make a large sacrifice to see and hear the man who has made happy so many hours. Whatever sensitiveness there once was to adverse or sneering criticism, the lapse of a quarter of a century, and the significance of a great war, have modified or removed." The visit was a triumph; but most of the friends who had held out the hand of good fellowship to him at his first visit twenty-five years before had passed away. In speaking of "America revisited," he professed his surprise at the astonishing progress and improvement in every particular since 1842.

After his return to England, he again undertook a series of readings, though his health had suffered so severely by his exertions in America that he could only go through his work with the greatest difficulty, and was at one time compelled, by peremptory medical order, to suspend the series for a time. He had definitely relinquished reading as a source of income; "from these garish lamps I vanish from evermore," he said to his audience on the last night of his public appearance, and had settled down to a new work, which promised to equal his earlier efforts in interest. His friends looked forward to a long continuance of activity for him; but the end had come. On the 8th of June, 1870, he had been at work on "Edwin Drood" (of which only three parts were completed) all day in a little chalet sent him in pieces from Paris by his friend Mr. Fechter, and set up in his shrubbery at Gadshill, where he often used it as a study. At dinner that day a strange expression of pain came over his face, and he said that for an hour he had felt very ill. Suddenly he attempted to rise from his seat; and sank down in an apoplectic fit. He never regained consciousness; and after twenty-four hours he died, at six o'clock on the evening of the 9th of June.

BURIAL IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY; CONCLUSION.

The event was so sudden, that when the placards of the London papers came out with the fatal words, "Death of Charles Dickens," in large capitals, startled men, pausing to read, could hardly believe their eyes, or realise the fact that the hand that had for so many years toiled indefatigably, was cold and powerless, and that the great writer whose very life had been in his vocation, and whom hundreds of thousands who had never seen his face still looked on as a friend, had spoken the last word he was to utter on earth. A sentiment of grief as at a near and personal loss pervaded every class of society, from the Queen, who telegraphed her regrets from Balmoral, to the artisan who remembered how nobly the great author had always stood up in defence and vindication of the toilers in the land. Dickens himself held very decided ideas concerning the futility of any funeral honours, and detested the idea of an epitaph, but it was felt that Westminster Abbey was the fitting resting-place for one who had a right to be received among the great literary Worthies of that temple of silence, reconciliation, and grateful memory. "Westminster Abbey," says a writer in the Times, a few days after Dickens's death, "is the peculiar resting-place of English literary genius: and among all those whose sacred dust lies there, or whose names are recorded on the walls, very few are more worthy than Charles Dickens of such a home. Fewer still, we believe, will be regarded with more honour as time passes and his greatness grows upon us."

In America, the feeling was wide-spread and deep. Bret Harte, whose genius Dickens admired and appreciated, led the way in some noble lines of simple and touching verse. Many others followed; indeed, the face of the great writer had been so recently seen among them, that to the Americans hardly less than to the English, his death brought the impression of one taken suddenly from their midst; and nothing could be more thoroughly expressive of the national sorrow than the "spray of Western pine," laid metaphorically on the coffin of Charles Dickens by him, who told how the turmoil and riot of "Roaring Camp" had been hushed, while the rugged miners sat listening as one of them read to the rest the story of "Little Nell." ## GEOFFREY CHAUCER.

"That thee is sent receive in burownness;
The wrestling of this world asketh a fall;
Here is no home, here is but wilderness;
Forth, pilgrim, forth, O best out of thy stall!
Look up on high, and thank thy God of all."

THE FATHER OF ENGLISH POETRY.

MANY a title of honour, and not a few of shame, have been attached to the names of historic characters, on slender and insufficient grounds; and in some cases, indeed, the title of honour has become, from its incongruity, a reproach clinging with bitter irony to the memory of a pinchbeck hero; while the epithet of traitor has been hallowed when cast by envy and malice at the fame of a patriot strong in determination and earnest in the desire for good. What a depth of satire is there in the title "The well-beloved," applied to the worthless Louis XV. of France!—what a commentary in the footsteps of the courtiers sounding like thunder along the gallery at Versailles, as they hurried to offer their congratulations to the successor of the miserable sensualist lying dead of a loathsome disease, "with not a friend to close his eyes." On the other hand, has not the perhaps ill-considered line of a poet in search of an antithesis, for more than two centuries done wrong to the memory of the great chancellor, libelled as the wisest, greatest, meanest of mankind?—But no shadow of doubt or uncertainty rests upon the right of Geoffrey Chaucer to bear the title of the Father of English poetry. At a time when Latin was the language of the learned, and when even Dante had hesitated whether he should write his great work in Latin, and at length reluctantly determined to clothe it in the Tuscan, which has prevented it from being consigned to the oblivion in which mediæval Latin poetry was destined to moulder, Chaucer, a man of learning, a "clerke," and doubtless a member of one university, perhaps of two, found in the language of the English people enough of beauty and strength to render it a worthy vehicle for the highest flights of verse. Well may old Occleve, in his work, "De Regimine Principum," call Chaucer "the honour of English tonge," "the first finder of our faire language," the "flower of cloquence," and "universal fadir in science." Spenser, who was born a century and a half after Chaucer's death, calls him "a well of English undefiled." The "inventive Skelton," tutor to Henry VIII., in his garland of laurelle, gives due honour to—

"Maister Chaucer, that nobly enterprysed, How that our Englysshe might freschly be enued;"

and Samuel Daniel, the old Elizabethan metrical chronicler, speaks in his "Musiphilus" of the merits of Chaucer, as having rescued his own period from oblivion, and held it up to the contemplation and study of posterity. "Yet what a time hath he wrested from time," says the old historian, "And won upon the mighty waste of daies, Unto the immortal honour of our clime, That by his means came first adorned with bayes;" and rightly does the old sixteenth century worthy acknowledge the obligation of England to Chaucer, declaring that we are still bound "in seal to offer praise" to the sacred relics of the rhyme of the first poet who raised the English to the dignity of a literary language. And as in the days of Elizabeth, so in our own, the works of Geoffrey Chaucer have been most prized by those best qualified to judge of literary merit. "Age cannot wither him, nor custom stale his infinite variety." "I take unceasing delight in Chaucer," wrote Samuel Taylor Coleridge. "His manly cheerfulness is especially delicious to me in my old age. How exquisitely tender he is! yet how perfectly free from the least touch of sickly melancholy or morbid drooping!"

THE TIMES OF CHAUCER.

The career of Geoffrey Chaucer commenced just after a new and remarkable page had been opened in the history of his country. In the year 1328, the date usually accepted for his birth, the long and important reign of Edward III. had just commenced; and the life of the father of English poetry was prolonged through the reign of the victor of Crécy and that of his weak and unhappy grandson. It was the first period that can be called emphatically English; for until then the distinction between Norman and Saxon had been maintained in the country; and the animosities inseparable from difference of race, embittered by many a remembrance of oppression and endurance, had kept up the distinction between the conquerors and the conquered for centuries after the fight of Hastings.

At first, and indeed for a considerable period, the proud Normans held it a point of honour to keep aloof from the nation they had subdued. The scornful question, "Do you take me for an Englishman?" was among them equivalent to "Do you suppose I am a slave?" And, in truth, there were in the Saxon character defects that gave only too many opportunities for Norman satire; for gluttony, drunkenness, and sloth formed a wretched set-off against the acknowledged Saxon virtues—stubborn bravery, loyalty, and truthfulness. Where the Saxon had been contented with rough plenty, the more fastidious Norman required elegance. He derided as clownish and rude the feasts at which there was abundance of food displayed, but scant skill in cookery. The national garb of the Saxons, their architecture, their method of fighting, all excited in him a contemptuous surprise; and their language, especially, seemed to the ear of the Norman harsh and untunable, while of their literature he neither understood nor desired to understand anything. French was the language of the court, and in French the king's justice was dispensed. The Norman and the earlier Plantagenet kings did not even understand the speech of the nation they governed. Robert of Gloucester, the rhyming chronicler, writing in the west-country English, so late as the reign of Edward I., bears testimony to the slight esteem in which the native language was held. In his reproduction of the "History of Geoffrey of Monmouth," he says—

"Vor bote a man conthe French, me tolth of him well lute,
As lowe men holdeth to Englyas, and to her kunde specho sute;"

which in modern English signifies, "For unless a man know French, one talketh of him little; but low men hold to English, and to their natural speech yet."

This state of things continued so long as the Norman and Plantagenet kings held sway in France as well as in England, and regarded the former country as their natural home, and the latter as a conquered province. Not more than a tenth part of the decade to which his reign extended was spent by Richard I. in England; and the splendid appanage brought by Eleanor of Guyenne to his father, Henry II., must have caused that astute monarch to bestow his cares upon his French territory at least as much as upon his English possessions.

But this divided sway had its inconveniences for the rulers, and as the event proved, great advantages for the governed. The title of the Norman kings was weak, and their great vassals were turbulent. Sons of kings who rebelled against their fathers in those days never lacked followers to share their fortunes, in the hope of reward if the revolt proved successful; as William the Norman and Henry II. found to their cost. Moreover, it was difficult to keep a numerous and valiant people permanently in a state of slavery; and thus as early as the reign of Henry I. we find the usurping king seeking to gain the suffrage of his Saxon subjects, by extolling his own virtues, and depreciating his brother Robert, whom he malignantly describes as a hard and cruel tyrant, while for his own part, as a proof of his benevolent intentions towards the nation for whose allegiance he is bidding, he offers to restore the laws of the good King Edward the Confessor, and grants various charters to towns, the precursors of that great charter of John's reign, which in itself includes all the essentials of a constitutional government. The loss of the French provinces under the wicked and incapable John, detached England from continental interests, and did much towards making Englishmen of the descendants of these Norman barons who fought at Hastings. In the long reign of the weak Henry III. the Parliament was set up, wherein the people of England beheld with pride something akin to the Witenagemote of the good old days; for were not burgesses called to serve, and knights of the shire, in addition to the nobles and high clerical dignitaries who had formed the great council of the feudal kings from William the Conqueror downwards?

REVIVAL OF THE ENGLISH INFLUENCE.

Thus gradually the Anglo-Saxon triumphed over the Norman element in England. When Henry I., with a view of conciliating his Saxon subjects, married the good Princess Matilda of Scotland, the niece of Edgar Atheling, the Norman nobles were full of bitter jests at the union of a Norman king with a Saxon maiden, though of the royal house of Alfred. They seem to have thought that Henry should first have asked, like Cloten in Shakespeare's Cymbeline, "Is there no derogation in't?" and scornfully nicknamed the royal pair, Godric and Godiva, as though a Saxon appellation were in itself a disgrace. But the Plantagenets were sufficiently wise in their generation to understand that their power could be firmly built up only on the suffrage of the stubborn unconquerable English people, in whom the instinct of freedom seemed not only ineradicable, but manifestly grew and increased the faster for every attempt made to repress it; and by the time the young Prince Edward, by consigning the "gentle Mortimer" to a richly deserved doom of death, and by the incarceration of the wicked Isabella of France in the fortress of Castle Rising, had asserted his right to be king of England in fact as well as in name, three separate and solemn confirmations of the Great Charter had emphasized the right of the English people to invoke against tyranny the protection of the law.

A thoroughly English king, perhaps the first of his line, who could rightly be called English as distinct from Norman, was Edward III.—essentially a strong man, with just those qualities that would endear him to a rough and turbulent but loyal-hearted people. The armies he led into France were very different from the motley crowd, of various nations and languages, that thronged after the feudal banners of France with "Bohemia's plume, and Genoa's bow, and Caesar's eagle shield." There was a feeling of nationality and fellowship among the archers and billmen of Edward, who fought for a common cause and a common country, with the additional enthusiasm inspired by devotion to a great leader. Old Froissart, the chronicler, stared and marvelled at the prowess and pertinacity, the sedate valour and imperturbable perseverance of these men fighting shoulder to shoulder against fearful odds. He seems hardly to have realized what an increase of power had resulted from the merging of Saxon and Norman into the common nationality of Englishmen, or to have understood how men could be at once so loyal and so independent. Le peuple le plus orgueilleux et le plus outrecoquant, the proudest and most arrogantly self-asserting of nations, is the character he gives to the English people; for in the eyes of the worthy Fleming the assertion of popular rights and liberties by the commonalty must have appeared as savouring of insolence towards the knights and seigneurs whose deeds of valour he extols so highly. Edward III. understood the English well, and was content, while gaining fame and honour in the battle-field, to allow to the Commons of England that right of the purse which they in later times so pertinaciously defended. In religious matters, also, England stood in a position differing from that of continental Europe. The papal power never established itself in this country, with the complete ascendancy over the minds of men which it acquired throughout Europe generally. A far greater freedom of thought and speech, and a more extended power of the king as compared with that of the Church, had long been the characteristic of England in matters ecclesiastical; and in the reign of Edward I. arose the dauntless Wycliffe, to denounce to a nation ready and willing to hear him, the abuses and errors of the priesthood, and point out, with honest indignation, the glaring contrast between principle and practice in many of the religious orders.

THE AGE OF EDWARD III.

It was an exceptionally outspoken age; and satire, with tongue and pen, strove boldly against imposture. Thus honest Robert Langlande, in his Vision of Piers Plowman, complains loudly of the degeneracy of the ecclesiastics, their luxury and pride, and their forgetfulness of their holy calling. He says in outspoken fashion, and not without a touch of humour:—

"And now is religion a rider, a romer by the streets,
A leader of love-deyes, and a loud beggar,
A pricker on a palfrey, from manor to manor,
An bespe of boundes at his 'back' as he a lord were.
And if but his knave knele, that shall his cope bring
He loured on hym, and asked who taught hym courtesye."

King Edward himself was most tolerant and liberal in matters of faith, and favoured Wycliffe as a man who worked in a good cause; and not the least among the merits of this renowned king must be ranked the enlightened policy that extended the royal protection to the first great apostle of the Reformation, the morning star that heralded the brighter day soon to scatter the darkness of the mediæval world.

The long reign of this remarkable monarch, comprising half a century full of activity and movement, and largely filled with pomp and circumstance of glorious war, had just begun when Chaucer was born; and the poet could say with the hero of the Trojan war, "Quorum pars magna fui," in reference to the stirring events of his time. For though a scholar and a man of undoubted literary genius, Geoffrey Chaucer was no recluse, no bookworm poring over musty tomes in cloistered solitude. He was a man of the world, a poet whose mind had been enlarged and imagination quickened by foreign travel and the society and converse of great and distinguished men. In the glories of the struggle against France he had his share, and also came in for one of the least agreeable of the chances of war, being taken prisoner by the enemy. High in honour with kings, and connected by marriage with "old John of Gaunt, time-honoured Lancaster," he was familiar with the ways and manners of courts, and was more than once employed on state business of importance. Nor was the other side of the picture unfamiliar to him. For he took part in the great religious controversy of the time, as a Wycliffite and a partisan of John of Gaunt; and suffered exile and imprisonment; to be afterwards restored to his former honours, and invested with new ones, in the green old age in which the grand old poet's genius shone brighter than ever.

CHAUCER AND SHAKESPEARE.

In some points Chaucer strongly resembled Shakespeare. We have the same wonderful power of description, the same exquisite insight into character, the same power of indicating by a few masterly touches the whole character of the man; like Shakespeare also, Chaucer was eminently a large-hearted man, tolerant of the failings of his fellow-men, ready to find good in everything, and with an intense appreciation of the beautiful in nature. He revels, as it were, in the sunshine of spring, "When that April with his showers soft, The drought of March hath pierced to the root," as he tells us in his Canterbury Tales, or, when, as he writes in "The Flowe," and the Leaf," "Every plaine was clothed faire, with new green, and maketh small flowers to spring here and there in field and in mead;" and in the same poem he paints his delight at the sight of the forest, the "okes great, streight as a line" with the new leaves bursting out, bright green and red in the merry month of May; when "Eke the birdes song for to hear, Would have rejoiced any earthly wight." To Shakspeare he may be likened, moreover, in the sturdy manliness of his religious belief—his honest reverence for all things truly sacred and holy, with an outspoken contempt for counterfeits and hypocrisy. And to sum up his resemblance to the greatest of English poets, it may be said that while he at times displays infinite pathos and tenderness, he is never more thoroughly at home than when delineating with the richest comic humour some whimsical scene of cross purposes, or painting the portrait of some eccentric character of his own day.

BIRTH; YOUTH AND COLLEGE DAYS.

Though there has been much controversy regarding the exact time of Chaucer's birth, the year 1328 is the generally accepted date. Leland the antiquarian, writing about a century after the poet's death, represents Chaucer as a member of a noble family. Pitts declares him to be the son of a knight, and other authorities state him to have been a merchant's son. Regarding the place of his birth there is no such uncertainty. In one of his later works, Chaucer speaks of "the citey of London, that is to me so dere and swete, in which I was forth growen;" and he goes on to observe that every man has a natural liking for his birthplace, and wishes it to prosper, "as every kindly creature hath full appetite to that place of his kindly engendure, and to wilne reste and pece in that stede to abide" (Testament of Love, Book i., section 5).

Of the earlier youth of Chaucer we have absolutely no particulars. There was a contemporary poet who might, it is supposed, have furnished some records, old John Gower, somewhat Chaucer's senior, and certainly during some period his friend, and claiming to be his teacher; for did not Gower write in the "Confessio Amantis"—

"And greete wel Chaucer when ye mete
As my dysciple and my poete"?

But whether from subsequent cooling of the friendship, or whatever other reason, the author of the "Confessio Amantis" left us no record of his more illustrious brother.

That Chaucer visited one of the two great

English universities is more than probable; and, perhaps to solve the difficulty of assigning to either of these seats of learning the honour of producing the first English poet, Godwin, in his life of Chaucer, has ingeniously supposed him to have visited both universities. For his residence at Cambridge the only authority is the signature, "Philogenet of Cambridge, clerk," to a poem; his dedication of "Troilus and Creseide" to Gower and Strode, two Oxford men, is the principal fact relied on in support of the theory that pronounced him an Oxonian; and certainly it seems that the delineator of the "Clerke of Oxenford" was speaking with personal local knowledge. On the other hand, the local touches in the tale of the miller of Trompington point to a knowledge of Cambridge.

THE COURT OF LOVE; TROILUS AND CRESEIDE, ETC.

But soon after his college days, wherever they may have been passed, were ended, Chaucer appears as a not unimportant actor on the grand warlike stage of the reign of Edward III. In his college days he already produced his poem, "The Court of Love," the work in which he describes himself as "Philogenet of Cambridge." The work represents the poet as visiting the Mount of Cithere, or Citheron, where Citherea, "goddess and queen," is enthroned in a splendid castle, with her son Cupid. Here the poet meets a lovely lady, his superior in birth, and at first inclined to treat him with disdain; but, overcome by his importunity, she accepts his admiration; whether this lady Rosial was an entirely imaginary being, or a real personage who excited the youthful admiration of the poet, is a questionable point. The poem is in some respects an imitation of Ovid's "Art of Love," and in others is framed on a work by William de Lorris. The plot is meagre, and the descriptions are in many respects faulty; while the manifest indelicacy of many of the verses makes us marvel at the state of manners in an age that could tolerate such expressions in the domain of art. But there is enough of merit in the production to give a very decided impression as to the poetical power of the writer, especially as regards the flow of the verse and pleasant and humorous delineation of character and habits. These points, which afterwards became paramount in the later writings of the poet, are here already seen to advantage. The stanza, too, the verse of seven lines of ten syllables each, is happily turned to account. It is said to have originated with Chaucer, and was adopted by various later poets of distinction. Spenser, for instance, wrote his two hymns of Love and Beauty in this verse, which was long known as the "rhythm royal." Among the statutes of love on which the poet is sworn, one especially enjoins the fairest construction of his lady's conduct under all possible circumstances:—

"But thinke that she so boniteous and faire
Coud not be false; imagine this algate,
And think that tonges wicked would her appaire,
Slandering her name and worshipful estate,
And lovers true to setten at debate;
And though thou seest a faute, right at thine eye,
Excuse it blive, and glose it pretilye."

Whether, as has been asserted, Chaucer left Cambridge to sojourn for a time at the sister university of Oxford, is open to doubt; at least, there is nothing improbable in the supposition, many scholars of distinction having not only studied at the two great English seats of learning, but supplemented their academical course by a visit to the no less famed university of Paris. Godwin, in his exhaustive and erudite life of the poet, confidently asserts that it was at Oxford Chaucer wrote his juvenile poem, "Troilus and Creseide." This poem is a translation, the author states, from a Latin author, whom he calls Lollius; but the learned Tyrwhit conjectures the poem to have been taken from an Italian source, namely, the "Philostrato dell' amorose fatiche de Troilo per Gio Boccaccio." It is the same story, in the main points, that Shakespeare dramatised two centuries and a half later; though Chaucer idealizes the character of the faithless maiden, and does not, like Shakespeare, represent her as untrue to Troilus almost without excuse for what old Urry calls "her great untruth in giving herself to Diomedes." Like the "Court of Love," Troilus and Creseide is written in the stanza of seven lines. In many respects it stands higher than its predecessor. In this "littell tragedie," as its author or adapter calls it, we have many touches of true pathos, and some exquisite pieces of description of character. The idea of good coming after evil is well put forth in the following stanza, by the association of contrasts:—

"For thilke ground that beareth the weedes wick, Bear'th eke these wholesome herbes as full oft,
And next to the foul nettle rough and thiek
The rose ywaxeth sote (sweet), and smooth, and soft,
And next the valley is the hill aloft,
And next the darké night is the glad morrow,
And also joy is next the fine of sorrow."

The natural tendency to humour in Chaucer's genius is seen in the following lines. Pandarus has been pressing the lovelorn Troilus to disclose the name of his goddess, promising to do his best to serve him.

"Were it eke for my syster all thy sorrow,
By my good will she should be thine to-morrow," says this zealous gentleman, and he continues his exhortation thus:

"Look up, I say, and tell me what she is,
Anon, that I may go about my need.
Know I her aught? For my love tell me this,
Then would I hope the rather for to speed.
Then 'gan the vein of Troilus to bleed,
For he was hit, and waxed all red for shame—
Aha! (quoth Pandare) here beginneth game."

The author dismisses his "little book" with a pious aspiration that whereas "there is so great diversity in English, and writing of our tongue," none may miswrite or mismetre (wrongly scan) it "for default of tongue," but that it may be understood wheresoever it comes to be read "or ellés sung."

CHAUCER RISES TO EMINENCE.

Chaucer next appears as a law student of the Middle Temple in London; and there is a tradition mentioned by Speght, that he was amerced in the sum of five shillings for assault and battery on the person of a Franciscan friar in Fleet Street. Before this he had already travelled in France and Flanders; and we afterwards find him in the honourable position of a page to Edward III. himself; a brilliant start in life, and one that would introduce him to scenes which could not fail to draw forth to the utmost the poetic powers of which he had already given brilliant evidence. The king's poetical page soon receives important promotion; he becomes a gentleman of the king's privy chamber, and afterwards shieldbearer, an office of high trust and dignity. Nor are these honours unaccompanied by substantial benefits; for liberal gratuities are bestowed upon the poet, who is evidently a favourite with the illustrious master, with whom he is destined to take part in stirring and important scenes.

The chief foundation of the poet's prosperity, however, seems to have been his connection with John of Gaunt, the son of Edward III., the "time-honoured Lancaster" of Shakespeare's Richard II. The third wife of John of Gaunt was Catherine Swinford, daughter of a Flemish noble, and widow of an English knight, Sir John Swinford. A sister of this Catherine Swinford, Philippa Pickard, a maid of honour to the English queen, became the wife of Chaucer, who thus became connected with the royal family by no remote tie ; and either in consequence of the connection, or from respect for the poet's character, the powerful duke accorded to Chaucer his constant and cordial protection. The acquaintance of the poet with court life and manners, the habit of conversing with the great men of the time, and the wider views of the world he obtained in comparison with the clerical and monastic writers who preceded him, gave to Chaucer's writings an infinite freshness and vitality. His descriptions of pageants, spectacles, and feastings, especially in his later works, have the reality and distinctness to be found only in the works of one who portrays what he has himself seen ; and we cannot doubt that Chaucer's noble knights and ladies were in many instances portraits drawn from the life.

Foreign travel also contributed in no small measure to enlarge the scope of the usefulness of our "Father of English poetry." That he was high in favour at the court of Edward III. is proved by the most substantial of tests—gifts of money from the royal hand, bestowed on him in recognition of his merit. In 1367, Geoffrey Chaucer was made the recipient of a pension of two hundred marks, worth about £240 of our present money. In the patent by which this annuity is secured to the poet, "the services he had performed to the crown" are stated as the reason for the grant ; and that these services must have been considerable, the amount of the benefaction appears to indicate. In 1373 we find Chaucer chosen as one of three envoys on a highly important mission to the then powerful Duchy of Genoa. The object was partly diplomatic, partly commercial, having chiefly reference to the establishment of a factory for the Genoese merchants in England ; John de Muri, a citizen of Genoa, and Sir James Pronan, a vice-admiral and knight, were his condjutors ; the rank of the latter of these is a sufficiently significant proof of the position of both the men associated with him in the mission. That Chaucer, after concluding his diplomatic task, made a tour throughout northern Italy, is more than probable. The beautiful story of "Patient Griselde," originally written in Latin by Boccaccio, had just at that period been translated into Italian by the veteran Petrarch, then concluding at Padua his eventful and chequered career. Warton, in his history of English poetry, asserts that Chaucer was introduced to the venerable poet at the wedding of Violante, daughter of Galeazzo, Duke of Milan, and adds, "It is not improbable that Boccaccio was of the party"—adducing the authority of Paulus Jovius for the anecdote. He certainly speaks of such a meeting in the prologue to the story of Griselde, told in the Canterbury Tales by the Clerke of Oxenforde, who says :

"I wol you tell a tale, which that I Learned at Padowe of a worthy clerk,
As preved by his werdes and his werk ;
Fraunceis Petrarch, the laureate poete,
Highte this clerk whos rhetorike swete
Enlumined all Itaille of poetrie,
As Lynnan did of philosophie."

And as the genial clerke of Oxenford exhibited some of the characteristics of Chaucer himself, we are warranted in believing that the meeting with "Fraunceis Petrarch" had its origin in fact.

More important than the question of the actual meeting between the poets is certainly the fact that Chaucer studied with great advantage the literature of Italy, then already enriched with masterpieces far transcending anything that had been produced since the classic days of Greece and Rome. Dante had given to the world his matchless "Divina Commedia." Boccaccio had written his "Decamerone," and Petrarch, in another field, had set up a model for the nations to imitate. Like all true men of genius, Chaucer was no servile imitator. He did not copy these great Italian writers. He caught their spirit, and infused it into his own works. If we would estimate the extent to which he profited by the models thus brought under his cognizance, we have only to compare his earlier poems, written before the visit to Italy, with his later productions.

THE "ROMAUNT OF THE ROSE," "HOUSE OF FAME," ETC.

The earlier works of Chaucer, though they have been eclipsed by the glory of his immortal "Canterbury Tales," contain many remarkable passages, and are well worthy the attentive perusal of the student. We see in them how the poet built up his earlier works on the rigid lines of the old romances. He at first appears merely as a translator, and, indeed, as a literal one. But gradually he seems to feel his own power, and to break away from his fetters ; indulging himself, especially in the comic portions of his works, with flights of fancy and imagination. His native humour and his good-natured irony show themselves more and more plainly. One of his earlier works, composed during the time when he was actively engaged in public duties, was the "Romaunt of the Rose," a translation, with alterations and improvements, of the allegorical

French poem, the first part written by William de Lorris, who died in 1260; and the latter, and by far the longer portion, by John of Meun, near Orleans, early in the fourteenth century. The story, as taken literally, tells the adventures of a lover in his endeavours to obtain a rose growing in an inaccessible garden. Various explanations have been given of the allegorical meaning; one interpretation representing the allegory as religious—the rose signifying a state of grace, and the efforts of the lover the striving of man after holiness; the chemical interpretation declares the rose to figure the philosopher's stone. Of the two original authors of the "Romaunt of the Rose," Lorris was far superior to John of Meun. Chaucer seems to have made a just estimate of the comparative merits of the writers, for he has translated the whole of Lorris, and but a portion of John of Meun.

On the embattled walls of the garden wherein grew the mystic rose are painted a number of allegorical figures, recalling to the reader's mind Gray's "Fury Passions," with "Envy, War, and faded Care, grim-visaged, comfortless Despair," and the rest as described in the famous "Eton College" ode. In the "Romaunt of the Rose," Envy is pictured graphically enough as yellow with spite. "Her seemed to have the jaundice." Hate stands "grinning with despitous rage." Within the garden, where Idleness acts as portress, dwells the God of Love, leading by the hand Beauty; "Ne was she darke ne browne, but bright and clere as is the mone light," and "her chere was simple as birde in bowre;" while "Richesse" flaunted in a robe of purple, the like of which was not to be found in the world. In the palace of Old Age dwell Sickness, Pain, and Melancholy, ever reminding their entertainer "that Deth standith armid at her gate." Here we have again a reminiscence of Gray's poem, where, "in the vale of years," the "painful family of Death" are depicted, the various forms of sickness that rack the joints or fire the veins, or "in the deeper vitals rage," with Poverty and slow-consuming age to fill up their number. The style of the "Romaunt of the Rose" has much of the stiffness of the old romancers, but here and there we have the striking power of personification and description in which Chaucer afterwards excelled, and which, early in his career, made the original poem a favourite with him.

A fine original poem belonging to this period of Chaucer's activity is his "House of Fame." Warton is of opinion that the idea was suggested by a Provençal composition. The poet is supposed to be caught up by an eagle, who carries him to the House of Fame, a grand gothic temple reared in mid air. It is vast beyond all conception, this grand hall, and is filled with a gallant company of famous authors of all ages, with magicians, sorcerers, harpers and minstrels, and a motley assemblage, including many heralds, with the armorial bearings of renowned champions blazoned on their coats. At the upper end of the hall Fame sits enthroned, with Alexander and Hercules as supporters. Josephus, Homer, Livy, Ovid, Lucan, Claudian appear among the company; while Æolus is summoned from his cave in Thrace, and ordered to bring with him his two clarions, Slander and Praise. In this work Chaucer uses the octosyllabic verse; the chief characteristics of the poem are exuberance of imagery, and a wonderful fertility of description. There is a considerable amount of humour in various passages; and in the description of the house, or rather the cage, of Rumour, where pilgrims, pardoners, and sailors are continually employed in disseminating reports, the majority of them false, the poet seems to revel in a task peculiarly congenial to him. The value placed upon classical writers in the fourteenth century can be pretty accurately estimated from this poem. The idea was modernised by Pope in his "Temple of Fame," but various writers have thought the little bard of Twickenham ill-advised in his endeavour to make Chaucer speak "by measure and by rule;" and prefer the freedom of the old poet, though he draws for a large sum upon our powers of credulity, when he bids us imagine a house sixty miles in length. Warton declares that Pope, while displaying his skill and elegance in the diction and versification of his "House of Fame," has spoilt it and marred its character. "An attempt to unite order and exactness of imagery with a subject formed on principles so professedly romantic and anomalous," he says, "is like giving Corinthian pillars to a Gothic palace. When I read Pope's elegant imitation of this piece, I think I am walking among the modern monuments unsuitably placed in Westminster Abbey."

"THE LEGEND OF GOOD WOMEN," "THE FLOWER AND THE LEAF."

The "Legend of Good Women" contains the histories and misfortunes of heroines of various times. The female character is here placed in a most favourable light. The work is in the form of a dream, or vision, experienced by the poet. Chaucer sees Cupid, the god of love, coming towards him, in his vision, with Alcestitis as his queen. Reproached by Cupid for having calum-niated women in his "Romaunt of the Rose," and in "Troilus and Creside," the poet is defended by Alcestis, who makes excuses for him, and mentions other of his works, such as "Palamon and Arcite" and the "House of Fame," in which he has done justice to the feminine character. It is decided that Chaucer shall atone for his offences against the sex by writing a poem in praise "Of Gode Women, both maidens and eke wives, that weren trewe in loving all their lives." Thisbe, Dido, and Ariadne are among the heroines, the list being closed by the story of Alcestis herself. The perjuries and treasons of "false men," on the other hand, are to be set forth in the poem in their native turpitude; and there seems a touch of irony in the exaggerated manner in which this part of the task is carried out.

Another of Chaucer's works, and one in which instruction is conveyed under the form of allegory, is "The Flower and the Leaf." Here again we see Chaucer's love of the country and the woodland minstrelsy of the birds. It is early morning, in the month of May, the poet's favourite season; and Chaucer represents himself as going forth into a pleasant grove to listen to the songs of spring. The goldfinch and the nightingale carolling from a medlar tree and a laurel first attract his attention; but speedily he sees a noble company of ladies richly attired, decked with jewels, and wearing chaplets of laurel and other green leaves on their heads; they are speedily joined by a troop of men-at-arms, likewise wearing leafy coronets, and numbering among them the paladins of Charlemagne, the knights of Arthur's Round Table, and doughty champions of Chaucer's own time. These all, by dance and song, do honour to a fair laurel tree. And now, from the opposite side, advances a procession of knights and ladies, bravely clad, and wearing coronets; but these are not of leaves, but of flowers. They pay their homage, not to the laurel tree, but to a flowery plot, singing a song in praise of the daisy—"Si douce est la Marguerite."

But presently a storm comes on; and the grassy plot offers no shelter like that afforded by the spreading laurel, nor can the flowers themselves long endure the pelting rain and hail, but are speedily withered up and destroyed. Then the flower worshippers are compassionated and succoured by the party of the laurel, and the lady of the leaf rides away at the head of the whole company, to entertain them, the nightingale perching on her hand. The allegory represents the triumph of perseverance as symbolized in the leaf, "whose lusty grene may not appaired be, but keepeth her beauty," over idleness, as shown in the flower which

"Within a litel space
Wollen be lost; so simple of nature
It be, that it no grievance may endure,
And every storme wol blow it sone away."

Among Chaucer's works are "The Complaint of the Black Knight," the subject being founded on the misfortunes and troubles of John of Gaunt; "The Book of the Duchess," written on the occasion of the death of Blanche, Duchess of Lancaster, and in which John of Gaunt is introduced in the character of a mourning knight, who, clad in black armour, bewails the loss of his consort; "Chaucer's Dream," on the marriage of John of Gaunt with the Princess Blanche; "The Parliament of Birds," also called "The Assembly of Fowls," written to commemorate the courtship of John of Gaunt and Blanche; and "The Cuckoo and the Nightingale," in which the poet's love of nature and of the beauties of woodland scenery is admirably displayed. The poet is at Woodstock, his favourite residence, and a place with which memories of his name are indissolubly interwoven. He thinks, as he lies wakeful on his couch, that he would love to hear the nightingale sing, and he rises early in the morning and walks forth to fulfil that purpose; for, like all true admirers of nature, Chaucer loves to go forth when the day is yet young, and the freshness of morn is not yet sullied by the burning rays of the noonday sun. The description of the scene is full of enjoyment of woodland sights and sounds.

The prosperity of Chaucer at court did not end with the reign of Edward III. The new king, Richard II., was only eleven years old at his accession; and the influence of John of Gaunt, Chaucer's great patron, was paramount in the state. The poet's emoluments under Edward III.'s rule had been considerable. Besides the pension of twenty marks, the chivalric king had bestowed upon Chaucer, whom he designated "our beloved squire" (delectus armiger noster), a daily pitcher of wine from the royal table: and had appointed him to the office of comptroller of the customs for wool and hides. Moreover Chaucer was made guardian of the young son of Sir Edmond Staplegate, of Kent, a minor; and in those days the custody of the lands and person of an heir was always a lucrative source of profit to the guardian. Chaucer received a hundred and four pounds in virtue of this office; and thus he appears at the commencement of the reign of Richard II., when he was confirmed in the possession of all these advantages, as a wealthy, honoured, and fortunate man.

Indeed, new offices were added to those he already held; for soon after this time, according to Warton, we find him "appointed clerk of the king's works, in the palace of Westminster, in the royal manors of Shene, Kensington, Byfleet, and Clapton, and in the mews at Charing. Again, in 1380, of the works of St. George's chapel at Windsor, then ruinous."

MISFORTUNE AND EXILE.

But the fair day of Chaucer's life was to be overshadowed by misfortune as its evening approached. John of Gaunt, his friend and patron, was a man of great, even inordinate ambition; and after the death of his brothers, the Black Prince and Lionel of Clarence, he even hoped to gain the crown of England. Failing this, he had sought in other quarters to increase his influence, and to open a prospect of a regal title in the future; as is seen in his alliance with Peter the Cruel of Castile, and his marriage with the daughter of that worthless prince. In England he had always looked upon the clergy, who were zealous for hereditary succession, and who probably regarded with complacency the prospect of a long minority of the crown, as tending to increase their own power, as his especial enemies; and this may probably have been one, if not the chief, motive of the constant support and protection he afforded to Wycliffe and those bold advocates of religious reform, afterwards known by the nickname of Lollards. When the undaunted parson of Lutterworth was summoned to London by haughty Bishop Courtenay, to answer an accusation of heresy, in 1377, it was the support of the powerful Duke of Lancaster, in conjunction with the assistance of Lord Percy, that saved him certainly from a dungeon, probably from the stake; and again, when summoned to Lambeth Palace in the following year, the popularity of the Reformer among the citizens, and the weakness of the papacy, whose power was seriously damaged by the schism of the west, would have been insufficient to carry him through the danger, but that the powerful arm of Gaunt was again stretched forth to protect him. Whatever may have been the Duke of Lancaster's reasons for professing Wycliffite opinions, it is certain that in those opinions Chaucer cordially concurred. Even in his earlier works we may see occasional and unmistakable indications of zeal for the Reformer, and of indignation, generally expressed in satire, concerning the abuses of the Church and the arrogance of the clergy. Their method of engrossing the great offices in the state, in itself formed a sufficient cause of popular discontent, and even excited the secret anger of kings and princes against them. Urry points out how, at the time of which we are writing, almost all the places of trust and honour were held by ecclesiastics; the Archbishop of Canterbury being Lord Chancellor; the Bishop of Bath and Wells, Lord Treasurer; the Archdeacon of Lincoln, Privy Seal; while the offices of chancellor of the exchequer, privy purse, master of the rolls, master of the jewel house, treasurer of Ireland, and a host of other appointments, were all held by priests. "If," says Froude, "the Black Prince had lived, or if Richard II. had inherited the temper of the Plantagenets, the ecclesiastical system would have been spared the misfortune of a longer reprieve."

At length the popular discontent culminated in the rebellion of Wat Tyler. The anger of the people against the churchmen is significantly shown in the excesses committed during that ill-starred enterprise—the murder of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the slaying of a number of clerks, the burning of books. That neither Chaucer nor his patron had any share in this movement may be inferred from the fact that the rebels, in their impartial hatred of all dignities, sacked the Savoy Palace, the residence of the Duke of Lancaster. Like the revolt of the peasants in the German "Bauernkrieg," early in the sixteenth century, and the "Jacquerie" in France, this desperate effort of ignorant and headstrong men labouring under a passionate sense of injury had its source in tyranny long endured, and at length grown insupportable; nor was there in the demands they made in the first instance anything but what the common sense of justice would acknowledge as fitting and right. The violence and crime which stained their cause, however, gave a convenient reason for revoking the concessions made to the insurgents by the Government in the moment of danger.

The power of the great Duke of Lancaster had for some time been waning. The king hated and feared him, and his enemies were not slow to take advantage of the tide that had now set in strongly against him. An accusation was brought forward against the Duke by one Latimer, a friar, who declared he had conspired to kill the king. The death of the accuser, who was himself assassinated before the affair could be investigated, did not stop the proceedings against the Duke, whom

Richard resolved to bring to trial. But John of Gaunt, too wary to trust himself in his enemies' hands, fortified himself in Pomfret Castle, and the proceedings against him were dropped. His influence, however, was gone, although few believed there was any truth in Latimer's accusation. The Duke quitted England; and when his powerful countenance was withdrawn, his party felt the full weight of the vengeance of its foes. The opposing factions ran high in the city of London, and, naturally enough, broke out into open violence on the question of the election to the mayoralty. A certain John Combermere, better known as John of Northampton, a Wycliffite and a Lancastrian, had been once mayor of London, and strove to secure re-election by promising to reform the various abuses in municipal government. This was "the way to kindle, not to quench." Accordingly a riot broke out, in which the party of John of Northampton was defeated. One of the leaders of the tumult was beheaded, and John himself was imprisoned. The partisans of the fallen candidate took flight in dismay, and among them was Chaucer. He first passed over to Hainault and France, and thence, deeming himself not safe from pursuit, proceeded to Zeeland. Of this part of his life, with its trials and sufferings, we have some indications in his "Testament of Love," written during a woful imprisonment; for while the poet, the whole tenor, of whose life speaks him a warm-hearted, liberal man, was, out of his own straitened means, ministering to the necessities of his poorer fellow-exiles, there was evil work going on against him in England. His enemies, backed, there is reason to believe, by those who had been his friends and the partakers of his prosperity, did their best to ruin him. "Les absents ont toujours tort," says the French proverb, and many of the partisans of Chaucer made their own peace with the Government by throwing all the blame of the late transactions on him. His supplies were stopped; the rents due to him not being remitted to his place of refuge. His wife and sons, as well as himself, were threatened with ruin; and he was compelled, as the lesser evil, to risk all and return home, in the hope, probably, that the affair of John of Northampton had been partly forgotten, and that a voluntary act of submission might build up his fortunes anew.

CHAUCER'S IMPRISONMENT AND RELEASE.

He returned, but it was to be arrested and shut up in a prison fortress, in all probability the Tower of London, where he endured a captivity that seems to have extended over three years. "It was behind the bars of a gloomy window in the Tower," says the author of the "Amenities," "where every hour appeared to be a hundred winters," that Chaucer, recent from exile, and sore from persecution, was reminded of a work popular in those days, and that had been composed in a dungeon, "The Consolations of Philosophy," by Boethius, and which he himself had formerly translated. He composed his "Testament of Love," substituting for the severity of an abstract being the more genial inspiration of love itself. But the fiction was a reality, and the griefs were deeper than the fancies. In this chronicle of the heart the poet mourns over "the delicious hours he was wont to enjoy," of his "richesse," and now of his destitution, the vain regret of his abused confidence, the treachery of all that "summer brood" who never approach the lost friend in "the winter hour" of an iron solitude. But he at length yielded to necessity, and made some sort of submission, accompanied by a confession which is said to have incriminated certain of his former friends, and the poet complained that he was exposed to much malevolence, and suffered the extremity of all that slander could inflict, on this occasion. He himself acknowledges having made certain "disclosures for the peace of the kingdom," but what these disclosures were, and how far Chaucer implicated those who may be said by their ingratitude to him to have shut themselves out from every claim to his consideration, can never be more than mere matter of conjecture. Chateaubriand, without supporting his assertions by a scrap of evidence, puts down Chaucer as "Courtier, Lancastrian, Wycliffite, unfaithful to his convictions, a traitor to his party, at one time banished, at another a traveller, now in favour, presently in disgrace." Isaac D'Israeli, on the other hand, with far better judgment, refuses to accept these unsupported assertions for more than they are worth. "No! thou eloquent Gaul!" he heartily exclaims, "Chaucer was never out of favour, however he may have been more than once dismissed from his office;" nor can we know whether the poet was ever "infidèle à ses convictions." It must also be remembered that, during the whole time of Chaucer's self-exile, his duties were fulfilled by deputy, a fact that gives colour to the conjecture that he may have left England partly to avoid giving evidence against those partisans who acted so treacherously by him; and, indeed, he himself speaks of having "concealed their privities longer than he should;" and it was

Thomas of Woodstock, for some time paramount in England, after the fall of John of Gaunt, and the bitter enemy of the king, who at last dismissed the poet from his employments. That he had been a member of some "conjunction" is certain; and it is equally undeniable that he made certain disclosures, and at the price of these procured his liberty. But in the obscurity in which the whole affair is involved, it is impossible to decide upon the nature or the extent of these revelations, or to judge in how far they were justified by the treachery and ingratitude of former partisans and associates. The accusations against the poet would have been forgotten in the course of time, but for his own laboured apology for his conduct, and passionate vindication of his motives in the "Testament of Love." The very anxiety of the writer of that remarkable work to stand well with his countrymen and with posterity argued the righteous ambition of a lofty mind. Where circumstances are dark and doubtful, a man has a right to be judged according to the general tenor of his life; and in Chaucer's case, where the whole direction is towards honour, benevolence, and truthfulness, there is the less reason for putting the worst construction upon what may have come about in a very natural manner. After five years of adversity and misfortune a man can hardly be accused of tergiversation or instability for trying, by any reasonable concession, to relieve himself from intolerable misery and persecution.

That Chaucer, though involved for a time in the downfall of his party, never entirely lost the favour of the king, is shown by the fact that soon after his liberation he was appointed clerk of the works to the king, through the intervention, Mr. Godwin says, of Richard's queen, Anne of Bohemia, at whose command Chaucer had written his "Legend of Good Women," and who had always been a generous and consistent friend to the poet. This was in 1389; and from this time till his death the days of Chaucer were prosperous and happy. Especially after the return to England of his patron, John of Gaunt, —who, though he did not succeed in establishing himself as king of Castile, saw his two daughters seated on the thrones of Castile and Portugal respectively—the fortunes of Chaucer rose rapidly; and how little the gallant spirit of the man had been crushed by the evil chances, or puffed up by the good hap that had befallen him, is shown in that wonderful work in which, at the age of nearly sixty years, he shows the vigour, the freshness, and the versatility of youth. It was in his favourite house at Woodstock, a place rendered illustrious by his residence for nearly thirty years, that he sat down to give to the world that marvellous fruit of his ripe genius and varied experience, that has become famous throughout the world under the title of "The Canterbury Tales."

CHAUCER'S "CANTEBURY TALES."

This work, apart from its great poetical merits, forms a most interesting and valuable historical record of the manners, customs, dress, and mode of speech of the people of various classes in England, in the reign of Richard II.; all the more valuable, indeed, because it deals with those matters of detail, and with those personages, generally considered to be below the dignity of history. Chaucer gives us each of the characters "in his habit as he lived." A wonderful series of pictures is placed before us, of a company comprising members of almost every class, the highest and the lowest, nobles and serfs, being the only ranks unrepresented; and in his cheery gossiping way the author points to some peculiarity, some personal trait in each of his characters, which stamps an individuality upon it in a manner at once quaint and witty. It is a bit of fourteenth century life, exquisitely natural and unaffected in description, telling us in a plain, outspoken way, what kind of folks they were who made up the English community in the days of the third Edward.

The idea of the work is taken from Boccaccio in so far as regards the machinery employed for bringing in the story. Chaucer had read the Decameron, wherein a number of Florentines are represented as taking refuge in a villa, to escape the pestilence that rages in the city; and for ten nights they beguile the time by relating stories. Afterwards these were reproduced in various languages and in different forms, and in spite of the glaring licentiousness of many of them, became highly valued under such names as "Les Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles," the hundred merry tales, etc., in the various countries of Europe; and were even considered good reading for ladies. Thus saucy Beatrice in "Much Ado about Nothing" is highly incensed against the disguised slanderer who has audaciously asserted that she gets her good wit out of the hundred merry tales. But Chaucer is no servile imitator of Boccaccio. He has adopted the idea of the Italian, as Shakespeare took the material for his dramas wherever he found it; but like Shakespeare he has by his original method of treatment made the subject his own.

The description with which the poem opens is eminently picturesque. April has come with its soft showers to pierce to the root the "drouth" of March, and the earth bursts forth into renewed verdure and freshness. The small birds "sleepen alle night with open eye, so pricketh nature them in their courages;" and now is the time for the fulfilment of vows of pilgrimage, made when, on the bed of sickness, the intercession of the saints had been invoked, according to the custom of the times.

Thus in the great common room or kitchen of the Tabard Inn, situate in Southwark, on the Surrey side of London Bridge, a goodly company of nine-and-twenty pilgrims are one evening assembled, the author being one of the number. They are all bound to the shrine of Thomas à Becket at Canterbury, and intend to ride on the morrow along the old Roman road leading from London to Dover. Very various ranks and both sexes are represented in this goodly gathering. Chivalry is there in the person of the knight, who is looked up to with considerable respect by all the rest, and in that of his son the gallant squire; landed property by the jovial Franklin of Kent; learning by the "clerke of Oxenford," the poor scholar; commerce appears in the persons of the merchant and the shipman, the master of the good ship Magdalen; trade, handicraft, and agriculture send to the company the haberdasher, the carpenter, the weaver, the dyer, the tapissier or upholsterer, with the miller, the ploughman, and others; while the doctor of physic, the sergeant of the law, the reeve or steward, the cook, the manciple, or caterer, for the commissariat of an inn of court, with various others, swell the number assembled to do justice to the substantial supper served upon pewter platters and wooden trenchers by mine host, to be washed down with good old Saxon drinks, ale and mead, and pigment, and even with claret and strong wines. For the journey before them is long and toilsome; and with the "devout courage" which inspires the pilgrims to wend to Canterbury is mingled not a little of the spirit that prompts men to enjoy the good things of this life upon occasion. The Church is very fully represented, both the regular and secular clergy having contributed members to the gathering, in the person of a monk, a friar, an abbess with her attendant nuns, a parson of a parish, a pardoner or seller of indulgences, and various others.

THE COMPANY AT THE TABARD INN.

Chaucer introduces his company, in the prologue, with some amount of elaboration; a few most characteristic lines being devoted to the description of each personage. In the portraiture of the knight we recognize the respect paid to chivalry in the age that witnessed the institution of the order of the garter, and a reign when a king considered it right and fitting that his son should "win his spurs." The "very parfit gentle knight," to whom all the rest look up, has fought in the Holy Land, has been in many battles, and has everywhere borne himself like a very Bayard. It is pleasant to see how his presence acts as a kindly restraint on the rest, who are naturally impressed with the sedate bearing of the famous warrior, who for all his fame and renown is yet modest and quiet, "in his port as meek as a maid," and who never in his life said "no villainy" "unto no manner wight," and who while his horse was good was above the cock-combry of fine clothes, wearing a "gipon" or short cassock of fustian, soiled and stained with travel.

His son the young squire, is a strong gallant of twenty years, not above the little vanities of the time, gaily attired in an embroidered coat, and with curled locks; a poet and musician too, able to turn a love-song, and anxious to distinguish himself in the athletic sports and knightly pastimes of the day, "in hope to standen in his lady's grace;" a good carver, "courteous, lowly, and serviceable."

In the Kentish Franklin we have a portraiture of the Saxon character admirably given, with a few graphic touches. "Saint Julian he was in his cuntrye"—the saint especially associated with hospitality and the entertainment of strangers. The table always covered with good fare, with a hearty welcome to all comers, in the house where "it snewen," or snowed meat and drink—the interest taken by the worthy man in all that appertained to his dinner—his hearty John Bull-like enjoyment of the good things of this life, and the important position he occupied in his county, being chosen "knight of the shire," and thus taking rank among the gentry—all these points are touched with the hand of a master. Again, in the sturdy yeoman, the only attendant the knight considers necessary on his pilgrimage, we have another most interesting historical sketch. With his bullet-head and sun-embrowned face, sturdy and strong, half-huntsman, half-soldier, the latter profession indicated by his sword, dagger, and buckler—the former by his green coat and hood, the sheaf of peacock arrows in his belt, and the mighty bow grasped in his stalwart fist, his horn, and the Christopher badge on his breast, this good fellow is the type of the sturdy men who formed the chief strength of the armies at Crécy and Poitiers, and later at Agincourt. Of the same breed is that stout churl the miller in his white coat, with a blue hood; furnished like the yeoman with a serviceable sword and buckler—a formidable champion at wrestling matches, where he had often won the ram, the usual prize on such occasions; and he could burst open a door by the heroic method of running at it with his head, bull-fashion. Much given to steal corn, and to take toll three times over, was the worthy miller; a jangler and a reveller, moreover, with an abnormally wide mouth; rude in his speech, and under scant restraint of modesty and delicacy; a performer on the bagpipe, with one of which earsplitting instruments he is furnished, and with the melodious strains whereof he plays the company out of the town.

In the description of the clerical part of the company, the Wycliffite propensities of the poet, and his wonderful gift of covert satire, are happily shown. The Church had gained greatly in wealth during the century preceding Chaucer's time; but this dubious advantage had been more than counteracted by loss of respect. The monastic orders were in many points in glaring need of reform. Idle and luxurious, in some cases addicted to fopperies and extravagance in dress, very inconsistent with their vows of poverty, in many cases stained with the vices of the debauchee, and given up to feasting, hunting, and other pursuits very detrimental to their clerical pretensions, they had to a great extent forfeited the influence their predecessors had wielded over the community in days when a Henry II. had found it necessary to submit to scourging at their hands, preferring humiliation to probable dethronement. The strong English common sense of the poet rises in revolt against the false pretences, the venal compromise with evil, "the curse that money may buy out," the whole elaborate fabric of false pretence in a system of lip-service. But he is careful to point out where may be found the Abdiels of the priesthood, those "among the faithless faithful only found;" and where he has to write of faults and evils, he works for reform rather by playful irony and satire than by fierce denunciations. What a picture of the self-indulgent worldling in clerical garb is presented to us in the hunting monk "to been an abbot able"—an abbot after the fashion of Scott's Prior Aymer de Valence in "Ivanhoe"—the man vowed to poverty, but who has many a dainty horse in stable—who fastens his fine fur-embroidered gown with a brooch of massive gold—who understands far more of woodcraft than of church-lore, and scoffs at the strict rule of St. Maure and St. Benedict, and smiles scornfully at the notion that he should "swinke" or drudge and labour with his hands, and pore upon a book in his cloister, because St. Augustine has declared that it should be so. "Let Austen have his swink to him reserved." Let Austen work, and study, and drudge, if it seemeth good to him; this monk "let olde thinges pass"—he let the old maxims and rules go by as obsolete, and was a "prickasour" or hard rider, keeping greyhounds, and hunting the hare—vowed to religion, and living a life of self-employment.

In the friar we see portrayed the same contradiction between profession and practice—"a full solemn man," who is at the same time "wanton and merry;" a notable character is Hubert the friar, one who squares his precepts and penances according to the purses of his hearers, always ready to grant absolution and to take repentance for granted when he was well paid.

"He was an easy man to give penance
There where he wist to have a good pittance."

Very popular was he among the women, to whom he made little presents; a merry man withal, and able to sing a good song to the rote or psalter. The best beggar in all his house was he, very deft at opening the purse-strings of the rich Franklins and their wives, among whom he had an extensive acquaintance, and not scorning the hostlers and gay tapsters, but suawning the sick and the needy as below the notice of so dainty a man as himself. He lisped, to make his English sweet upon his tongue. His chief doctrine, continually impressed upon his flock, was embodied in the very unmistakable precept that the Church's benefits must be paid for. Therefore, "instead of weeping and prayers, Men must give silver to the poore friars."

Madam Eglantine the prioress is described with subtle irony, in the terms of praise beneath which censure lies hidden. Her smiling "full simple and coy"—her talent in singing "the service divine, Entuned in her nose full sweetly"—her exaggerated sensibility gushing forth over the captive mouse or the dead puppy dog—her outward reluctance to receive homage and respect, all give the impression of one playing a part to gain popularity. The sumptuous, or summoner of offenders before the ecclesiastical courts, is painted in coarser colours. A fiery-faced angry man is this, the terror of children wherever he shows his pimply face, with its black brows and "knobbes" sitting on his cheeks, and the few words of parrot-Latin, continually reiterated, that compose his stock of learning. A great tippler of fiery wines is he, and for all his fierceness not inaccessible to bribes, if these take the form of strong drink. The pardoner or seller of indulgences, his friend and companion, is represented as a rank impostor, carrying counterfeit relics, and selling out of a wallet he carries before him indulgences or pardons "come from Rome all hot"—very skilful, like his compeer the sumpnour, at gaining money. From Berwick to Ware there was not so skilful a pardoner to be found as he, while "with piqued flattering and gapes, He made the parson and the people his apes."

But not all the ministers of religion were thus self-seeking and venal. There were yet true shepherds in the fold, men who did their duty vigilantly, not fleeing as hirelings who care not for the sheep, nor given, like the false shepherds pictured in Milton's "Lycidas," to tug and scramble at the shearer's feast; but good servants of their Master, ready to work at all seasons, and with zeal and wisdom to turn many to righteousness. Such a character is portrayed in the poor parson, in whom Chaucer depicts those qualities which have been similarly portrayed by subsequent poets in picturing a zealous, truthful clergyman; for Cowper, Goldsmith, and Wordsworth seem alike to have drawn their descriptions from Chaucer.

The model pastor's life is given to his work. He teaches gospel truth; and his preaching and his practice are in accordance with each other. The presentment of the good parson is perhaps the best of all these mediæval character pictures; but other members of the company all are sketched with almost equal felicity. There is the merchant, a substantial man and a worshipful, somewhat touched with purse-pride, solemn and impressive of speech, and fond of discoursing of the profits he made, "Sounding away the increase of his winning;" the Oxford scholar or Clerke of Oxenford, thoughtful, reticent of speech, threadbare in garb, riding a horse lean as a rake; for those were the days when colleges were really charitable foundations, and the student depended on the contributions of the rich and benevolent for the means to study or "scholaye;" the reeve or bailiff, a thin, anxious-looking man, much feared for his keenness by his lord's tenants; a cook, who could make "blanc manger" with the best; a sergeant of the law, "wary and wise;" and various others; a motley crew, but all joined together for the time in the fellowship of a common purpose.

The host, who acts as a kind of chorus in the work, proposes that the company shall keep together on their way to Canterbury, and on the homeward road, for mutual solace and protection. Each is to tell two stories, one on the road to Canterbury, and one on the return journey; the traveller who is considered to have told the best tale is to be entertained at the expense of the rest, and the host himself is to be the umpire and general manager on the journey; any man who disobeys his behests being subject to a fine. When they quit the inn on the following morning, although it was first proposed that they should draw lots to decide who should tell the first tale, the priority is given naturally enough to the knight, as the chief in the company, to whom the jovial host and all the other travellers pay especial respect. The knight thereupon tells the story of Palemon and Arcite, the subject of which is to be found in the "Teseide" of Boccaccio. So well does the "parfit gentle knight" acquit himself, telling his story with a kind of courtly eloquence thoroughly in keeping with his character, that the host is delighted with this favourable commencement of their entertainment. "This goeth aright," he exclaims; "unbocked is the mail," and all the company applaud the tale and the narrator. The regular order of proceeding is now interrupted by that lawless and bibulous rascal the miller, who, regardless of the curt rebuke of the host, roars out that "he can tell a noble tale." He has been drinking hard overnight, the graceless knave, and has renewed his homage to god Bacchus in the morning; and a notable affair his "noble tale" proves to be, spiced with wit of the broadest and coarsest kind. What must that exquisite lady, Madam Eglantine, have thought of it? But as a literary device, this rough bit of buffoonery of the unlettered churl, following on the courtly refinement of the knight, produces a happy and dramatic effect by its contrast; it is like those familiar passages of citizens and clowns interspersed here and there as a foil to the lofty scenes in Shakespeare's tragedies. For all his ribaldry and want of manners, the jovial miller is as pleasant a character in his way as the decorous folks with whom chance has thrown him together. And so, the ball once set rolling, the stories succeed one another in amusing variety. The miller finds his match in the reeve, who tells a tale, "The Miller of Trompington," in which one of that profession is held up to ridicule. The merchant gives the story of January and May, which Pope has modernised. A well-told incident is the overtaking of the procession on the road to Canterbury by a canon and his yeoman, the latter of whom contributes a tale in which alchemy is ridiculed. The number of the stories altogether is twenty-four, two of them being in prose. The squire relates the legend of the "Tartar King Cambuscan and his fair daughter Canace."

The wife of Bath, a very self-asserting dame, who has in her time married "five husbands" at the church door, and whose method of riding is indicated by her riding boots being furnished with a pair of sharp spurs, tells a tale which has also been related but in a different form by Gower, who places the scene of the action in Sicily, while Chaucer anglicises the story by transferring it to Cornwall and the court of King Arthur.

The good parson is the last of the travellers whose voice we hear; and most graphically and appropriately has Chaucer placed in the mouth of this his best drawn character, a pious rebuke of the levity of many of the other stories. He discourses to them earnestly and boldly of high and holy things; and with simple and truthful piety expresses a hope that he may be enabled to point out to his fellow-travellers the safe but narrow path on the journey of life that leads to a better hereafter.

"To knitte up all this, feste, and make amendo;
And Jesu for his grace wit me sende
To shewen you the way in this viage
Of thilke parfit glorious pilgrimage,
That hight Jerusalem celestial."

THE CLOSE OF CHAUCER'S LIFE.

Chaucer retained to the last the favour he had won, or rather regained, at the court of Richard II. In February, 1394, an additional £20 yearly was awarded to him by the crown. It has been conjectured, not without probability, that this additional benefaction was obtained for him by the good Queen Ann, who died a few months afterwards. In 1396, the connection between the poet and the patron became closer than ever; for in that year the duke married Catherine Swinford, the sister of Chaucer's wife. A grant made in the next year of a pipe of wine annually also attests the favour of Chaucer with the government. Donnington Castle and park, a princely gift from John of Gaunt, was also bestowed on him in 1397; and here Chaucer passed much of his time during the closing years of his long life. The name "Chaucer's oak" long distinguished a great tree under which some of the last poems of the author of the "Canterbury Tales" are said to have been written. "In this pleasant retreat, wandering and musing under the oak trees at Donnington, the evening of that eventful life passed quietly on." Chaucer is described as going down towards the grave "living in honour, and esteemed by all,—famous for his learning, not only in England, but in foreign countries." The death of John of Gaunt, in 1399, must have been a severe blow to the old man; and in the same year the deposition of the unfortunate Richard of Bordeaux and the accession of Henry Bolingbroke threatened to deprive him of his emoluments and pensions; for all the grants made by Richard during the last two years of his reign were rescinded by the new king.

But the son of John of Gaunt was not likely to let Geoffrey Chaucer suffer by the event whereby he himself was lifted to the summit of his ambition. Within three weeks of his accession, Henry IV. had not only confirmed the poet in the possession of all his emoluments, but had added a benefaction in the shape of an additional pension. About a year afterwards, on the 25th October, 1400, having emerged once more from his rural retirement, and come to Westminster, where he had a house in Palace Yard, after a short illness he died, having passed by two years the allotted threescore and ten. His mind must have remained clear, while his body was failing; for he was on his deathbed that he wrote those noble verses in which, apostrophising himself, he sums up at the supreme moment the sources whence spring the consolations of the Christian, exhorting to humility and thankfulness and hope. "Weivé (forsake) thy lusts, and let thy ghost (spirit) thee lead," says the dying poet, "and trouthe thee shall deliver, it is no drede."

Chaucer had two sons, who both survived him. Of the fate of the younger, Lewis, nothing is known. The elder, Thomas Chaucer, held various high offices, and became sheriff of Oxfordshire, and ultimately speaker of the House of Commons. Thomas's daughter, Alice Chaucer, made a splendid marriage, becoming the wife of William de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk.

The durability of Chaucer's work has been well judged by Campbell, who remarks of him that "after four (now nearly five) hundred years have closed over the mirthful features which formed the living originals of the poet's descriptions, his pages impress the fancy with the momentary credence that they are still alive."

A WRITER OF COMEDIES.

"I PERHAPS ask you to come to me too often ;
I interfere with your writing ; but I shall hope that whenever you have a leisure hour you will come to me of your own accord. Tell one of my people to let me know you are arrived, and I shall leave all other engagements to be with you."

These words were spoken by no less important a personage than Armand de Bourbon, Prince de Conti, brother of the distinguished soldier who, under the title "le Grand Condé," figures as one of the chief heroes surrounding that most magnificent and unscrupulous of despots, Louis XIV. of France. And the person thus pointed out as the object of the particular regard of one of the proudest among the French nobility, the man for the sake of whose society a prince expressed himself ready to "leave all other engagements," was not a minister of state, or an ambassador, but simply Jean Baptiste Poquelin, known to the metropolis and in the provinces of France by his assumed name of Molière, as one of the wittiest and most intellectual men in Paris, and destined to take high rank among the literary worthies of a period illustrious by letters.

Remarkable as one whose position and career were full of whimsical contrasts was this Jean Baptiste de Molière. A man of letters, and an erudite one, he still knew the Court and fashionable society thoroughly—one of the most illustrious ornaments of his century, he still was obliged to depend on patronage for subsistence—one of the most keen and subtle of philosophers, he had to get his living by writing and acting comedies.

HOW TO RIDICULE FOLLY.

Of all the writers of Louis the Fourteenth's time, the theologians, historians, philosophers, poets, and dramatists, who contributed to render the French model and the French taste predominant in the European literature of the close of the seventeenth and the greater portion of the eighteenth century, none can be compared to Molière in the influence he exerted alike in his own country and abroad. It is not too much to say that he was the creator of the French comedy; and of French comedy, moreover, in its highest sense,—the didactic form, whose object is to teach as well as to amuse, and which, far from aiming at merely exciting laughter, aspires to "show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image," to "hold the mirror up to nature" in such fashion as to expose to merited ridicule the jargon of the pedant, the snobishness of the wealthy vulgarian, and the arrogance of pretentious ignorance; and to paint in their true colours the horror and turpitude of vices like avarice, that reckons all other things as nought as compared with the possession of all-conquering gold; and hypocrisy, working with holy implements for base and infamous ends. At a time when the artificial in style and idea reigned supreme, Molière made a vigorous stand for the natural in dramatic art. Racine and Corneille, and even Boileau, gave their readers and hearers plenty of stilted heroics and fine sentiments, dealt out with tolerable impartiality among their characters, each of whom had something grand put into his mouth. Corneille painted men "not as they are, but as they ought to be," said Napoleon, unconsciously using the words Goldsmith had applied, thirty years before, to Cumberland, the writer of "genteel" comedies. Incident and situation were the chief points attended to in comedy, or rather, in the farcical buffooneries that preceded Molière's time; and in tragedy, heroic sentiment, however incongruous with the character in whose mouth it was placed, was the one thing considered indispensable. Quoting the words of his own "Mock Doctor," Molière might have said with truth, "Nous avons changé tout cela." He chose for the feature of each of his principal plays the delineation of some folly or vice; and by the development of character in a natural way, he kept up the interest of his audiences, and enforced the lesson it was his object to teach. "Bravo, Molière! that is the true vein of comedy writing," exclaimed a judicious old gentleman in the pit, at the close of the representation of "Les Précieuses Ridicules," the first piece in which he had, with exquisite wit, held up the conventional affectations of fashionable exquisites to the laughter of his audience.

VICE EXPOSED IN MOLIÈRE'S PLAYS.

But to raise laughter at fashionable folly was only one part, and the smallest part, of Molière's object. He made satirical war upon vices as well as weaknesses. In his "Avare," the sordid wretch, Harpagon, who would sacrifice the happiness of his daughter rather than open his purse, and who forfeits the esteem and respect of his children by clearly showing that he prizes money more than them, teaches a lesson in such fashion that he who runs may read; and in "Tartuffe," the impostor, was held up such a picture of the abominable, but by no means unfashionable, hypocrisy of the day, such an exposure of the Jesuitical casuistry that confused the limits of right and wrong, that many a sermon might convey the lesson with less force and directness. No stronger proof could be given of the importance of Molière's work than is found in the malignant fury with which the Tartuffes of his time, mostly clerical, attacked him. They strove vehemently to "burke" his pieces, and prevent their representation; they circulated horrible and utterly baseless scandals concerning his private life; they strove to prejudice against him the king himself, who, to his honour be it spoken, had sense enough to perceive Molière's merit, as rough Henry the Eighth appreciated Holbein's, when he declared he could make six noblemen out of six carters, but not one Holbein out of six noblemen. To Louis XIV. the persecuted poet had to appeal on several occasions. Among his works are printed the "Placets," or memorials addressed to the king, appealing to his Majesty's protection. Some of these were sent to Louis when engaged in his campaigns; but the prayer of the poet, which was generally for the removal of a veto on a play, was always promptly and readily granted. They contrived, however, the aggrieved Tartuffes, to embitter Molière's life; and when he died, the Archbishop of Paris, the most hypocritical among them, refused to his remains the rites of Christian burial.

In his own department of the drama Molière was unsurpassed, and even unapproached. Boileau, the critic, who, caustic and severe as he was, could yet pay honour where it was due, gave emphatic testimony to our author's merits. Louis XIV. asked him one day who was the greatest writer of his century. "Sire," replied the satirist, "it is Molière." "I did not think so," rejoined Louis, who, indeed, was not the most competent of literary judges, "but you know more about it than I do." Indeed, Boileau prided himself greatly on his critical acumen; and on one occasion did not scruple to tell the king that his Majesty knew nothing of poetry, and was in the habit of praising abominably bad verses.

INJUDICIOUS FRIENDS.

But some of the French writers, with indiscreet zeal, have claimed for Molière a place beside our own Shakespeare, and have even asserted that Molière could do some things that Shakespeare could not. Molière himself would have been the first to laugh at the absurdity of a comparison between himself and the greatest dramatic genius the world has ever seen. He would never have undertaken such tasks as were achieved by the magnificent powers of the son of the Warwickshire yeoman. A Hamlet, a Macbeth, or a Lear were not dreamt of in his philosophy; but he truly and faithfully, and with infinite humour and wit, and an abundance of healthy genial satire, depicted the world such as he saw it around him, with its virtues and its follies, especially the latter, and tried to make it better by pointing out the foolishness of brainless pretension and the emptiness of unideal wealth; to show "how vain, how little are the proud, how indigent the great." But his satire had in it none of the withering scorn or burning hatred of Swift or Churchill. Sharp-sighted enough to see with those bright eyes of his the faults of his time, he was tolerant of the weaknesses of society, and ready to give a generous recognition to its good points; conscious, perhaps, that a humorous exposure of a fault, by making it ridiculous, will often go further towards effecting a cure than a fiery denunciation. He could say with good-natured Philinte in his own comedy, "Le Misanthrope," "Je prends tout doucement les hommes comme ils sont;" and while quietly taking men as they were, he was always ready to pursue the same Philinte's recommendation, "Faisons un peu grâce à la nature humaine;" to look upon human nature as one who was to its virtues very kind, and to its faults a little blind. He has his lesson to teach; and he inculcates it, often impressively, and always plainly and agreeably.

MOLIÈRE'S FAMILY; HIS YOUTH.

The family of the Poquelins has been represented as occupying a very humble position in Paris, and by more than one writer, notably by Voltaire, Jean Poquelin, the father of the poet, is described as a "friper," or dealer in clothes. This is a mistake. Jean Poquelin was an upholsterer and dealer in tapestry; and the latest biographer of Molière has well observed that it is only necessary to examine some of the fragments of the furniture of that period, and of the hangings which decorated the walls and the beds, to understand that an upholsterer followed no mean or ignoble trade in the seventeenth century. In his father's house in the Rue St. Honoré, Jean Baptiste, the future dramatist, was born on the 15th of January, 1622. His mother, Marie Cressé, who had been married to his father nine years, belonged to the same rank in life. Jean Baptiste was the eldest of a family of six. Some years afterwards, Jean Poquelin received a piece of Court patronage, in the shape of an appointment as upholsterer-valet to the king, Louis XIII., with the reversion of the post to his son; and accordingly, in 1637, young Poquelin, being then fifteen years of age, was nominated as the successor of his father in the king's service. This office involved the duty of accompanying the king on his progresses through the country; and there is a tradition to the effect that young Jean Baptiste, in 1641, accompanied the king, as the deputy of his father, who was ill, on that memorable journey that witnessed the vengeance of the inreplaceable Cardinal Richelieu on the conspirators, Cinq Mars and De Thou, ending in the execution of the unhappy culprits. The later biographers of Molière, however, have not failed to point out that this supposed journey rests upon tradition alone; and that the general reason put forward for the substitution of the youth for his father as the king's "tapissier," namely, the great age and infirmity of his father, is utterly untenable; for Jean Poquelin was only forty-six years old in 1642, and continued to exercise his functions in the king's service for more than twenty years after. His death did not happen till 1669.

Though Molière was not born until some years after Shakespeare's death, the records of his youthful days are almost as meagre and unauthenticated as the events recorded of the great English poet. The popular account, spread abroad by Voltaire and others, records that the father of the future dramatist was vehemently opposed to giving his son anything beyond a "reading, writing, and arithmetic" education; but that a grandfather, who better estimated the genius and promise of the ardent boy, insisted on his receiving more than mere elementary instruction; that this relative, who had a fancy to his grandson, sometimes took the boy to see the representations at the Hôtel de Bourgogne, where some very extravagant, but no doubt laughable, farces were acted by men of undoubted ability, for the delectation of laughter-loving audiences. The Gross Guillaumes, Gautier Gargonilles, and Turlupins then constituted the great attraction. That the boy was charmed by these performances is more than likely; but it can hardly be believed that in those early days, already, as some of his biographers assert, he had seriously made up his mind to effect a thorough reform in the French drama, and to found a school, equally removed from the buffoon drolleries of farce, and the stilted tragic absurdity of Seuderi. Unwillingly or not, it is certain that Jean Poquelin sent his son to the Jesuits' College, where he was taught "the humanities," and became a classical scholar. It was there, no doubt, that he read in the original those Roman comedies which he turned to such excellent account when he became an author.

Long after Molière had made himself famous as a dramatist and actor, when his successes had been sufficiently decided to set the dogs of envy and calumny at his heels, a comedy of extraordinary dulness appeared, written by a certain Le Boulanger de Chalussay, long since gone down to oblivion among the ineptitudes. This wretched production was entitled "Elonire Hypochondre, ou les Médecins Vengés." The name Elonire is an anagram, the letters that form "Molière" being transposed; and "the avenged doctors" points to the rough treatment the medical faculty had received at the hands of the dramatist. The work, a coarse satire upon our art, is nevertheless of value as giving a few particulars, by a contemporary, of the earlier and obscure part of his career. It appears that Molière, on leaving the college, took to the study of the law; whether he was actually admitted as an advocate, is doubtful. Certain it is, however that at the age of twenty three years he became an actor, from inclination, and not from necessity. A contemporary writer describes him as devoting himself to a player's life, though he might very well have done without that occupation, having property enough to live respectably in the world. This property had no doubt been bequeathed to him by his mother, who died in 1632.

BEGINNING OF HIS CAREER.

Thus in 1645 young Poquelin began his dramatic career by getting together, with some friends, a company who acted in the Faubourg St. Germain, their establishment taking the somewhat unpromising title of the "Illustrious Theatre." It was at this time that he adopted the pseudonym of Molière, partly, it is said, in deference to the feelings of his family, who were scandalized that one of the Poquelins should appear on a public stage, partly in accordance with a custom among the actors of that time to adopt some euphonious or "taking" name, likely to gain the public favour. Why the name of Molière was chosen, except that, as one of the biographers observes, it sounded well and was easily remembered, does not appear. The bearer himself seems to have been at various times questioned on the subject, and always refused to explain his reasons, if he had any, for the adoption. Various villages in France are so called, and a Sieur de Molière had not many years before acquired some fame as the author of two romances, entitled respectively "Polixêche" and "La Semaine Amoureuse."

Several writers have expressed a considerable amount of indignation at what they term the fatuity of the young actor's family, in insisting, as they are said to have done, upon this change of name. "Who knows or cares anything about the Poquelins now," is their argument, "while the name of Molière, assumed to save the immaculate Poquelins from a discreditable association, is famous throughout the world?" All this is very true; and yet the view taken by the family was perfectly rational, and in accordance with plain common sense. The life of an actor was in those days that of a wanderer, dependent on the caprices of patrons for the means of subsistence,—now caressed, now scouted, his life often made up of alternate profusion and misery, his calling stigmatized as fraught with profligacy and irreligion; nor can it be denied that the vagabond nature of the actor's life, his continual dependence on a fickle audience, the hand-to-mouth nature of his existence, and the paramount necessity of "pleasing that he might live," rendered this the most dangerous of professions. It must be remembered, moreover, that there was as yet no national drama in France, and that the actors, consequently, were mere farceurs. How were the respectable Poquelins to know that this young scion of their family, apparently born "his father's soul to cross," or to "strut and hector," when he should engross, would one day produce works destined to become classics in French literature? The creation of these works was yet in the far future, and nothing had been seen that gave any indication of their coming.

REALITIES OF AN ACTOR'S LIFE.

And here, let us allow Molière himself to speak in his own plain, straightforward way on the subject. Years afterwards, when his adventures as a stroller were over, and he was the favourite of the "Great Monarch," and praised and applauded by a magnificent court, he gave emphatic testimony as to the difference between appearances and reality in an actor's life. A young man came to him one day, with the usual story of an uncontrollable predilection for the stage, and a petition for an opportunity to carry his aspirations into effect. Nor was this a case of a mere stage-struck youth. The young aspirant astonished Molière by the talent and grace exhibited in his recitations, and had evidently worked with earnestness and intelligence to qualify himself for his intended career. Highly commending his performance, Molière asked him if he had any fortune. "My father is a well-to-do advocate," was the reply. "Then," rejoined Molière earnestly, "I advise you to adopt his profession; ours will not suit you; it's the last resource of those who can do no better, or of good-for-nothings who want to escape from work. Besides, it's striking a dagger in your relatives' hearts, going on the stage; and you know why. I have always reproached myself for giving this annoyance to my family; and I confess to you, that if it were to do again, I should never choose that profession. You think perhaps," he added, "that it has its charms; you are mistaken. It is true that the great seigneurs appear to seek us out; but they make us minister to their pleasure, and it's the most miserable of all positions, to be the slaves of their whims. The rest of the world looks upon us as lost men, and despises us accordingly. Therefore, sir, abandon a design contrary alike to your honour and to your peace of mind. If you were in want, I could be of service to you; but as it is, I don't deny that I would rather hinder than assist you. Picture to yourself the difficulties we have to encounter. Whether it be convenient or not, we have to be ready to march at the first order, and to give pleasure to others, when we may be often full of sorrow; to bear the boorishness of the majority of the people with whom we are obliged to associate, and to win the good graces of a public who have the right to browbeat us, because they have paid us money. No, sir, believe me, once more, don't persevere in the design you have taken up."

Here we have an insight into the real feelings of the successful author-actor, such as is seldom obtained through the glare of dazzling success. For at the time when Molière gave this staid, sensible counsel, which, it is pleasant to record, was successful in inducing the young aspirant to abandon his hazardous design, he himself had thoroughly made his name and position, and enjoyed the all-powerful patronage of the king; and yet he felt the unreality of stage triumphs, and the very vivid reality of the humiliations and trials that underlie the tinsel glories of the actor's life. In those days the bitterness of dependence was largely mingled in the actor's cup. Like the literary man, he depended on the patron as much as on the public, and was bound to please "Monsieur" at all hazards; and in the year 1646, when Molière had just begun his dramatic career, the Duc de Guise was made the subject of poetic laudation for "les présents qu'il avait faits de ses habits aux comédiens de toutes les troupes." He had caused a distribution to be made of his cast-off wardrobe, among the different companies of actors in Paris, who were too happy to "strut and fret" in borrowed ducal plumes.

Molière and his company for a series of years led a kind of romantic life in the provinces, giving representations with more or less success, but gaining an immense amount of experience, which he afterwards turned to good account. The wonderful skill he frequently showed in delineating for the stage the characters of society as it existed in his day must have been owing in no small degree to the stores of observation laid up during these vagabond years, when the provincial noble, the wealthy but ignorant citizen, the pedantic medico, and the sturdy peasant, the supple valet, and the macaroni marquis passed in motley review before him.

COMMENCEMENT OF AUTHORSHIP.

The year 1653 is remarkable in Molière's life as the epoch in which he added the more durable profession of dramatic author to the somewhat precarious occupation of manager of a troop of strolling players. In that year he brought out his first comedy, "L'Étourdi; ou, les Contretemps;" which so rendered into English would be represented by "The Scatterbrain; or, Cross Accidents."

It is supposed, and with good reason, that this first dramatic work of the actor-author was performed before his old patron and schoolfellow, the Prince de Conti, who, after a somewhat troubled youth, including a participation in the "fronde" riots, and consequent imprisonment, had married a niece of the cardinal against whom he had taken up arms, and was now in Languedoc, holding a commission from the king to preside over the session of the estates to be opened at Montpellier. He was thus in the south at the time Molière's company was travelling through that region; and the two friends can hardly have failed to have met; nor would the prince, a sincere admirer of Molière's genius, have allowed the first representation of his friend's initial effort, at Lyons, to pass ungraced by his presence.

"L'Etourdi," like the generality of "first pieces," is to some extent an adaptation; the plot and the situations, on which latter the play chiefly depends for success, being taken from the Italian. The story turns on the embarrassments and cross-purposes consequent on the ill-fortune of the hero, an unlucky blunderer, who always manages most ingeniously to baffle all the efforts of his clever valet, Mascarille, to aid him in obtaining the mistress he worships. It is a lively, merry work, with abundance of incidents, and many startling and even extravagant situations. The best character, that of the clever Mascarille, was played by Molière himself; and the work had a complete success, alike in Lyons, where it was first produced, and in Paris, where it was played some years later, before a more polite audience, and in the presence of critics far more difficult to please. It laid the foundation of Molière's fame as an author.

Of these strolling days there exists one curious relic in the shape of an antique armchair, at Pezenas, where Molière and his company established their head-quarters for some time. This antique piece of furniture, to which the name Molière's armchair has been given, and which is looked upon with unquestioning faith and reverence by its proprietors, is said to have stood, in the poet's time, in the corner of a barber's shop; and in this armchair, tradition says, did Molière ensconce himself on a Saturday, market day, to observe and make notes upon the busy throng of customers who resorted to the barber for tonsorial purposes; and many a trait of manners and character must the quiet, indefatigable observer have there picked up.

The next play of Molière's, "Le Dépit Amoureux," or the Love-tiff, produced in 1654, is a great improvement on "L'Etourdi." Here the author begins to find where his strength lies, in the development of character: and he has given then, two sets of lovers, master and man, and mistress and maid, a capital picture of the pretty follies that lovers commit. The best part of the play is that where the young ardent lover and his faithful valet valiantly make up their minds to utterly discard and cast off their mistresses, whose coquetry and fickleness they will endure no longer. Friend Grosréné, the valet, is much stronger on the point than even his master; for his indignation extends to the whole of what the laird of Monkbarns calls "femininity," and he will have nothing to do with women; and as for the general conduct of love-sick swains, he would "reform it altogether." So he puts before his master, in the strongest terms, the necessity of firmness and resolution, and the duty of opposing an unshaken front to the blandishments of the fickle fair one, in the final interview, in which these intentions are to be announced. Marinette, the waiting-woman, and sweetheart of the thorough-going Grosréné, has meanwhile been impressing the same lesson upon her mistress, whose courage she imagines she has screwed to the sticking-point, when the fateful interview takes place. But what a falling off is there! "Amantium iræ amoris reintegratio." The lovers' quarrel but leads to the renewing of love; and after mutual recriminations, gradually softening down into tender reproach, and ending with reconciliation, the lady and gentleman find they are better friends than ever, and that the summer storm has but cleared the air, and made the day more charming to them. Grosréné grows his disgust, as his master walks off with his fair betrothed. "O la lâche personne!" exclaims Marinette, when she finds how ignobly her mistress has surrendered; and Grosréné begins his interview with the saucy Marinette by giving her to understand that she must not expect to find him forgiving and compliant, like his weak master. Marinette retorts with an expression of pert contempt for Grosréné; and the pair proceed to return the love-tokens each had received from the other, the only part of this proceeding that forces a sigh from Grosréné being the necessity of giving back a piece of exquisite cheese that the false fair one had bestowed upon him, as a fragrant token of affection. But when it comes to the final act, and the two are about to break a straw between them, in sign that their compact has ceased and determined, both hesitate, just as their betters had done; and in the end, love is lord of all, and Marinette the wayward and the determined Grosréné walk off as thoroughly pleased with each other, as if they had never meditated such a thing as parting or separation. The play does not pretend to any depth of feeling or grandeur of language. It has been well called by a critic, "an intellectual bottle of champagne," and it certainly has enough of sparkle and spirit about it to justify the designation.

MOLIÈRE ESTABLISHED IN PARIS.

The ambition of a provincial manager naturally points towards the capital as the ultimate goal to be reached; and Molière, after eight years of strolling, succeeded in obtaining the patronage of the young King Louis XIV., and permission to establish his company in Paris in 1658. He was by this time thirty-six years of age, and had worked hard and persistently for the position he had at last gained. His "Dépit Amoureux" and "Etourdi," played for the first time before an audience composed of royalty, nobility, and the first critics of the age, had a greater success than ever; and the actor-author, now permanently established in Paris, was encouraged and confirmed in his resolution to produce "things unattempted yet" in the dramatic literature of France.

His early comedies had been adaptations—clever and judicious, it is true, but yet adaptations—from the Latin, Spanish, and Italian drama. Henceforth he was to study in the school of life, and to find in the society of his own times the subjects and the characters on which his fame should rest. In 1659, on the 18th of November, he produced, before a laughing, wondering, admiring Parisian audience, "Les Précieuses Ridicules."

In this capital bit of comedy-satire, Molière levelled the shafts of his wit at a fashionable Parisian folly of his own day. At the Hôtel Rambouillet a most exquisite company was accustomed to meet, representing the very élite of the Parisian haute volée in literature, fashion, science, and dilettantism. There were to be seen Vaugelas the grammarian, the acute Bussy-Rabutin, Cottin, the most aggressive of society poets, Balzac savant en beaux mots, with Ménage, and many others; for the fair Marquise de Rambouillet wished to raise in her home an altar to the Muses. The fashionable airs and graces with which literature and art were surrounded in this blue-stocking coterie, the grave extravagance of expression which veiled natural and honest thought in far-fetched and ambiguous phrases, the exaggerated refinement, degenerating into puerility and feebleness, rendered this society a legitimate subject for the ridicule of all sensible critics. "Not long since," said La Bruyère, "we have seen a society of persons of both sexes, united together by conversation and by interchange of ideas. They used to leave to the vulgar the art of speaking in an intelligible way. By dint of what they called delicacy, sentiment, and fineness of expression, they had succeeded at last in being no longer understood, and in ceasing to understand one another. Neither good sense nor memory, nor the slightest capacity, was necessary for these conversations; wit alone was wanted, not of the best kind, but that which is false, and for the most part imaginary." The ladies were accustomed to address each other as "ma chère" and "ma précieuse," and talked affected jargon in the prettiest way. The country naturally took its tone from the capital, and provincial "précieuses" soon appeared, exaggerating the follies and affectations of their Parisian models.

It is a pair of these village blue-stockings that Molière exhibits with a grave drollery that is inimitable. Madelon and Cathos, the country ladies in question, are fooled to the top of their bent by a rascally lackey from the metropolis, whom they take for a marquis, and whose coxcombries serve to call forth their affectation and their pretended raptures and ecstasies of admiration. Mascarille's modesty certainly does not stand in the way of his preferment. He has written, according to his own account "two hundred ballads, as many sonnets, four hundred epigrams, and more than a thousand madrigals, besides enigmas and rebuses,"—and is indeed at work upon a version of the whole of the Roman history rendered into madrigals. Whereupon Madelon declares herself to be "furiously charmed" with rebuses, which she considers "gal-lant and intellectual." Mascarille also volunteers to read an impromptu that he made the day before at the house of an acquaintance of his, a duchess. Cathos pronounces an impromptu the true touch-stone of genius. Whereupon Master Mascarille regales the ladies with the following exquisite effusion:—

"Oh, oh, I was taken, my guard I forsook,—
I dreamt of no danger, and risked but a look,—
Your roguish bright eye stole my heart, to my grief;
Ah, stop thief! ah, stop thief! ah, stop thief! ah, stop thief!"

The epigram of Sir Benjamin Backbite on the "beautiful ponies that were macaroonies" as compared with other cattle, was not received with warmer applause in Mrs. Candour's drawing-rooms than these previous lines obtained from the fair Cathos and Madelon. Indeed, Molière's satire was as complete as it was delicate. He professed to ridicule not the précieuses, but their imitators; but the meaning was too well expressed to escape the cultivated audience. "We shall have to burn what we have adored, and adore what we have burned," was the witty remark of one of the frequenters of Rambouillet, in happy paraphrase of Bishop Remigius' words to the heathen Clovis. And the first performance of the piece gave a death-blow to the superfine ultra-gentilities of the Hôtel de Rambouillet, and the name "précieuse" became henceforth vested with a new and satirical meaning.

TWO EXCEPTIONAL FAILURES.

Some amount of feeling against the "Précieuses Ridicules," chiefly, we may suppose, set on foot by galled jades, whose withers were not unwrung by the witty allusions of that satirical comedy, had been increased by the tone of the next of Molière's productions, "Sganarelle," a piece in which the author seems inclined to fall back upon farce; and for the first and only time in Paris a play by Molière was hissed, not entirely without reason, it would seem; for Molière had made a double mistake, in the style of the piece, for which his genius was unfitted, and in playing the chief character, that was not at all in his line. The serious comedy, that encountered so serious a mishap, and soon disappeared from the list of Molière's acting pieces, was entitled "Don Garcia of Navarre, or the Jealous Husband," and represents, not without considerable power, the ill plight of a man devoured by the "green-eyed monster."

A MAGNIFICENT MINISTER ; SUCCESS.

The partial failure of "Don Garcia" was followed by a complete and most brilliant success, in the next piece written by Molière; and this success is associated with the name of one who might have stood side by side with Wolsey in Johnson's poem, as an example of the vanity of human wishes, the finance minister Fouquet. That ambitious, magnificent, and most unfortunate man had been relieved from a formidable rival by the recent death of Mazarin, that strange mixture of astute cunning and worldly frivolity, who had departed from the stage of life just when his influence had begun to wane. Fouquet, rapacious and profuse, like Mazarin, had not the caution of the wily cardinal; nor did he discern in the superb young monarch whom he thought to hoodwink a tyrant determined to engross in himself all power and authority—to be himself "the state," and to be his own prime minister. A magnificent fête given by Fouquet to Louis XIV. was, according to an eminent French writer, the proximate cause of the disgrace of the aspiring minister. Like the jealous Henry VIII. in Shakespeare's play, the young king may have thought, on seeing the unbounded profusion, the splendid luxury of his host—

"What piles of wealth hath he accumulated
To his own portion! and what expense by the hour
Seems to flow from him! How, in the name of Thrift,
Does he rake this together?"

But a deeper cause of anger was found, in the apartment of the luckless dependant on royal favour, in the shape of a portrait of Mademoiselle de la Vallière, whom the king had already distinguished with his particular regard; and so angry was the jealous tyrant at the rivalry of his subject, that he would have had him arrested there and then, but for the forcible remonstrance of the queen-mother: "Quoi! au milieu d'une fête qu'il vous donne!" The necessity of maintaining appearances towards his host restrained the vindictive rage of Louis for the moment; but Fouquet was a doomed man. He was presently flung into the Bastille, accused of malversation and embezzlement of public money, and after a lengthy process condemned to banishment for life, a sentence which the sinister mercy of Louis commuted to perpetual imprisonment; and at Pignerol, nearly twenty years after his first arrest, the unhappy Fouquet was released by death from a rigorous and cruel captivity.

At the magnificent but ill-omened fête given to the king and the court by Fouquet, at his splendid estate of Vaux, was represented an admirable play of Molière's that had already won the suffrage of the Parisian public: "L'Ecole des Maris," the School for Husbands. In this play the higher aim of Molière, his intention to convey useful lessons of life by means of the stage, is followed up with admirable art. Two brothers, Ariste and Sganarelle, represent two classes of husbands. The former is wise, moderate, and just, an admirable character, consistently carried through to the end. Sganarelle, on the other hand, narrow-minded, obstinate and dictatorial, is just the man who would put even duty in so disagreeable a light as to render it utterly distasteful. Each of the brothers has a young ward, and in the end the concealed pragmatical Sganarelle is grievously outwitted by his charge, Isabella, whom he tries to rule by menaces and harshness; while Leonor, the ward of Ariste, cheerfully acknowledges and duly appreciates the kindly and judicious guidance of her guardian and friend.

LES FÂCHEUX; MOLIÈRE'S MARRIAGE.

Another comedy, noticeable as having been written for a fête given by Fouquet to the king, was entitled "Les Fâcheux," the bores, and gives some portraits of that Protean class of humanity. La Fontaine, the fabulist, in a poetical epistle, describes this production wittily enough, as giving the go-by to Terence and Plautus, and marking the commencement of an epoch when it will not be allowed to deviate a foot's breadth from nature. If "Les Fâcheux" had no other merit, it would be valuable for having given a rebuke to the absurd practice of fighting duels for trivial causes. A man of honour and of approved bravery is represented as showing that higher and more difficult form of courage that consists in refusing the hasty challenge of a hot-headed opponent. Edicts of successive kings had failed to check this sanguinary folly, and a choleric word or a caustic jest was still enough to set nobles and gentles cutting each other's throats; but when the practice was turned into ridicule, it fell into disfavour, and the number of foolish duels was considerably lessened.

Strange it was that this man, whose calm clear eyes were so quick to see, and whose ready pen would chronicle with such graphic power, the weaknesses of the brilliant society around him, should himself have been a "warning example" of one of the most deplorable forms of weakness—a living illustration of Portia's "wise saw," that it is easier to teach twenty (in Molière's case we might read thousands) what were good to be done, than to be one of the twenty to follow his own teaching. If there was one thing Molière must be supposed to have known thoroughly, it was the character of women, whom he could sound from the lowest note to the top of their compass; for not a phase of the feminine heart and mind is unrepresented in his comedies. And yet, like his own Alceste in the "Misanthrope," he was led to and fro, and made to suffer tortures at the hands of a woman altogether unable to understand his devotion to her, and utterly unworthy of him. "C'est pour mes péchés que je vous aime ainsi," cries poor, bewildered, honest-hearted Alceste to that imperturbable and irresistible flirt, Célimène; and certainly Molière might well have employed the same language towards the fascinating but light-minded and frivolous actress of his troupe, Armande Gresinde Béjart, whom he followed with a doting attachment and devotion for which he scorned himself, and whom in an evil hour he made his wife.

Mademoiselle Molière, as she continued to be called,—for the title "Madame" was then only accorded to ladies of high degree, and its assumption by the wives of citizens had caused no little sneering among the well-born,—Mademoiselle Molière caused her husband many a sleepless night, and by her incurable frivolity and ravenous appetite for admiration, gave her husband the gravest reasons for dissatisfaction. At times, driven almost to desperation by her ill conduct, he thought of adopting rigorous measures, such as shutting up his recalcitrant wife until she should learn to behave herself; but his feelings were too violent for his reason. "Her presence makes me forget all my resolutions," he said to his friend

Chapelle, who had been remonstrating with him on his infatuation: "the very first word she says to me in her own defence leaves me so convinced my suspicions were unfounded, that I ask her pardon for having been so credulous. . . . If you knew what I suffer, you would pity me. My passion has reached such a point, that it actually takes her part against myself." Truly it may be said of Molière, that he loved "not wisely, but too well."

It was on the 20th of February, 1662, that the marriage took place, from which he hoped for a life's happiness; and never was an affectionate, warm-hearted man more cruelly deceived in his expectations; for his wife, Armande Béjart, was a thorn in his side to the end of his days.

MOLIÈRE AT COURT.

A new era now begins in the life of the author and actor; a brilliant period during which triumphs followed each other quickly, and works destined to be looked on as masterpieces of comedy were produced with marvellous rapidity. Besides the King, the Dowager-Queen Henrietta Maria of England, the Duke of Orleans, brother to the King, and his charming young English wife, Henrietta, the daughter of Charles I., had been present at the famous representation of the "Ecole des Maris" at Vaux; and Louis, though Boileau afterwards told him that he did not understand poetry, had yet sufficient discernment to see the deeper meaning in Molière's work, was delighted with the play, suggested a new character for the "Fâcheux," in the person of the hunting bore, and from that time took the poet under his especial protection. The office of valet-upholsterer to the king, which we have seen was to a certain extent hereditary in the Poquelin family, now fell to the poet, by the death of his brother, Jean Poquelin, who had held it for some years. Molière dropped the tapisserie, and was called "Valet de Chambre du Roi"—an office, it would appear, somewhat analogous to that which at a later period Miss Burney held with worthy snuff-taking Queen Charlotte. One of Molière's duties was to help in making the king's bed. By virtue of his office Molière had a place at the table of the king's gentlemen-in-waiting. They, however, thought their dignity compromised in sitting down with a play-actor; whereupon their master, the king, gave them a practical lesson, which showed that he could do a sensible thing in a gracious manner. On rising one morning, Louis summoned Molière, ordered that the "en cas de nuit," a collation always kept ready in case his Majesty were hungry in the night-time, should be served up, sat down to table with the poet, and helping him to a chicken's wing, took another for himself. Then, the doors were thrown open, and the privileged courtiers admitted to the "petit lever," saw with astonishment the spectacle of the king sitting at breakfast with the actor. "You see me occupied in making Molière eat," said Louis. "My officers don't think him good company enough for them." This was quite enough; from that time forth Molière was overwhelmed with invitations, and had no need to come to the mess-table of his colleagues, who were above writing or acting comedies.

THE SCHOOL FOR WIVES.

The next dramatic work of the poet, "L'Ecole des Femmes," the School for Wives, is in many respects an advance on the School for Husbands. The piece is a satire on the folly of keeping women in ignorance, and depriving them of education, and of social intercourse, under the idea that ignorance and innocence are synonymous, and that Satan will not enter the chamber of the mind that he finds swept and garnished and empty. "Epouser une sotte est pour n'être point sot," "To marry a fool is the way not to be made a fool of," is the maxim of Arnolphe, who, like Sganarelle of the School for Husbands, in the general features of his character, is drawn with a much finer pencil. He fancies that he makes himself safe by surrounding himself with stupid servants; and that by bringing up his ward, Agnes, whom he intends to make his wife, in utter ignorance, he will attach her wholly and solely to himself, and be her lord and master in the fullest sense of the term. But he is sorely deceived. The womanly instinct of Agnes tells her that Arnolphe is a noodle, and will probably be a tyrant. Her natural good sense and healthy impulses to a certain extent supply the place of the training that has been denied her; and with consummate skill the writer has developed the character. The apparently inane and silly Agnes of the first act, bound to her guardian by a sort of mechanical attachment, looking out for him when he is expected home, and as the servant Georgette declares, fancying that every horse, mule, or ass that appears in sight must be he, gradually changes as she becomes conscious of her position, and understands the feeling that makes her draw a comparison, or rather a contrast, between Arnolphe and her admirer Horace; and Arnolphe himself, at first a mere dictatorial crochety noodle, is roused first into admiration, and finally to a sense of mortification and rage, as he sees the character of Agnes asserting itself with her womanhood, in spite of his narrow precautions and mean devices. The obvious and healthy moral of the piece is a protest against the fashionable "inferior animal" theory with regard to women. Nor was it inappropriate in a time like that of Louis XIV., when marriages were "arranged" with such sublime indifference to the feelings of one of the parties chiefly interested, that the anecdote recorded of a fashionable lady of the period is scarcely an exaggeration. "Mademoiselle," said this affectionate parent to her daughter, an ingenue fresh from a convent-school, "you are to be married next week." "O Madame, if I might venture to ask, to whom?" wistfully observes the young lady. "Comment, Mademoiselle, est-ce que cela vous regarde?" "Pray Miss, is that any business of yours?" is the rejoinder.

The "Ecole des Femmes" was too new and original to escape comment; and too many felt themselves unpleasantly touched to permit the comment to be entirely laudatory. A strong clique was formed against Molière, and the cry of undue licence was raised. His work was declared to have offended against the proprieties, and his portraits were said to be far too much like certain originals. But Molière did not lack defenders. "Let the envious growl," wrote De la Croix, in some spirited verses in praise of the "School for Wives;" "let them snarl everywhere that your lines only chafe the vulgar, and are destitute of wit. If you had pleased others a little less, you would not have displeased them so much." The author himself defended his work with exquisite skill and commendable good temper in the "Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes," a charming little one-act piece, in which the "School for Wives" is analysed by a fashionable company. Three detractors appear to pull the play to pieces; they are the fashionable poet Lysidas, a very proper lady indeed, Climène, and a very fop of a marquis, all embroidery and affectation. On the other hand, a sensible man, Dorante, and two ladies, Uranie and Elise, judiciously defend the piece. The marquis, the beribanded and belaced coxcomb, whose dignity has been ruffled by the crowd that flocked to see this piece, declares it "Detestable, to the last degree detestable—what you call perfectly detestable;" and on being asked his reason, sapiently declares, "Oh, it's detestable, simply because it is detestable." Lysidas, the poetaster, has some pedantic jargon about the "rules" which he declares to have been disregarded in the "School for Wives." "When the protasis," he says, "the epitasis and the peripatosis—" but Dorante interrupts him, protesting against being drowned in this flood of learning. "Don't you think," he somewhat sarcastically observes, "it be quite as well to say 'the development of the subject' as the 'protasis'—the 'progress of the plot' as the 'epitasis,'—and the 'crowning incident' as the 'peripateia'?" The wit, judgment, and good sense displayed in this unpretending little protest against hypercriticism are excellent.

A muddle-brained nobleman, the Duc de la Feuillade, conceiving himself caricatured in the fopling marquis, was coarse enough to attempt personal violence on the offending poet; for which, it is said, the king rated him soundly, promising Molière a continuance of his royal protection, and encouraging him to gibbet foplings and pedants to his heart's content. It was at the especial desire of the king that Molière, finding envious tongues not silenced by the "Critique," wrote a second piece in the same vein. It was called "L'Impromptu de Versailles," and represented a rehearsal at which Molière and his company discuss various points of dramatic writing and acting. "The abuse of fools is a pill one can swallow," observed Molière, sententiously; "but one can't chew it without pulling a wry face." The rival company of actors of the Hôtel de Bourgogne joined their "most sweet voices" to the outcry against the innovator; but a general shout of ridicule put them to silence.

FAVOUR OF LOUIS XIV.

The position Molière had achieved in the regard and consideration of the king is proved by the fact that Louis himself did not disdain to be godfather to the poet's eldest child; and the Duchess of Orleans was godmother. This was in 1664, to which year belong two of the minor pieces of Molière, written to order, for representation at royal fêtes, interspersed with ballet scenes or divertissements, introduced by royal command, and which must have sorely tried the patience of the dramatist. The king himself did not disdain to take the part of one of the dancers; but was led to discontinue the somewhat derogatory amusement by a not unapt allusion in the "Britannicus" of Racine, where the great tragic poet censures a Roman Emperor, who, forgetting the dignity of his high office, exhibits himself in ignoble guise to his subjects in the public arena. The two pieces in question are "Le Mariage Forcé," or marriage on compulsion, a humorous farce; and "La Princesse d'Elide," a graceful comedy, adapted from the Spanish, in which the disdain of a haughty princess, the heroine, is overcome by the stratagem of feigning indifference; by which the proud beauty is piqued first into interest, then into an assertion of her power, and finally into hearty affection. The Spanish original has also been made the subject of a German play, entitled "Donna Diana." A capital character is that of the Fool, who prefers the practical to the ideal in life; and, like the boy in Shakespeare's Henry the Fifth, would give any amount of warlike glory that may be coming to him, for "a pot of ale and safety." "For my part," says this matter-of-fact gentleman, "I would rather live two days in the world, than a thousand years in history." To those who twit him with the exceeding speed wherewith he effected his retreat from a wild boar, this philosopher coolly replies, "It might not be heroic to run, but it was perfection of good sense."

MOLIÈRE'S MASTERPIECE, LE TARTUFFE.

Majora canamus. This same year is associated with the beginning of the work always considered the masterpiece of Molière, the immortal "Tartuffe." In this play the author had undertaken a very difficult and delicate task; that of exposing the hypocrisy of those dangerous impostors who would make use of the outward forms of piety and religion to advance their fortunes in the world,—whose vindictive malice is the more to be feared in that they fight with weapons which in themselves command respect. Of such men there were but too many at the court of Louis XIV.; and the time was to come when the king himself would give ear to the false teachers on whose tongues the words "les intérêts du ciel" were a formula under which they worked out their own evil designs of bigotry, intolerance, and pride. "Estimer le fantôme autant que la personne, et la fausse monnaie à l'égal de la bonne"—the confounding of appearance with reality, the circulation of the false coinage of cant, for the true metal of honest striving after virtue in life and action—fanaticism and hypocrisy quoting Scripture for a purpose, and pursuing vile and selfish ends under the cloak of holiness—such was the vice that Molière dared to drag into the daylight in this his greatest work.

The first three acts were written early in 1664, and first played in May of that year; and so startling was the effect, and so many were the remonstrances addressed to the king himself, on what was considered by the Tartuffes of the day the unwarrantable licence of the writer, that Louis thought it best to avoid scandal by prohibiting the piece, which was accordingly "shelved" for a time. In another piece, "Le Festin de Pierre," the plot of which was afterwards used for the book of Mozart's "Don Giovanni," Molière takes occasion to speak his mind against the hypocrites who moved heaven and earth to prevent the theatrical exposure they feared. "At the present day," says Don Juan, the cynical vicious hero of the "Festin de Pierre," "the profession of a hypocrite has marvellous advantages. It is an art whose imposture is always respected; and though it may be found out, no one dares say anything against it. All other vices of mankind are exposed to censure, and every one has full licence to attack them boldly; but hypocrisy is a privileged vice, whose hand shuts every one's mouth, and which therefore enjoys a sovereign impunity." But in the same year the piece was privately played before the king and several of the royal family at the Prince de Condé's. Louis had far too much discernment not to see through the selfishness that animated the violent faction against the piece and its author. Gradually the interdiction was removed, after several appeals by the author to the prince, and the opponents of the piece had the mortification to find, when the "Tartuffe" was at length represented in public, in 1667, that the delay, and the difficulties they had thrown in the way, had only made the Parisians more eager than ever to see it. "Tartuffe," or the "Impostor," brings before us a group of thoroughly lifelike personages. There is the cheat himself, supple, wary, and sanctimonious; sour and starched of aspect towards the dependants such as Dorine, on whom he thinks he can easily make an impression; but assuming an appearance of pious resignation and unmerited suffering in the presence of his patron, Orgon, whom he dupes most egregiously. "Il faudra donc que je me mortifie," is his pious ejaculation, when he is called upon to accept the nomination as heir to all his patron's property; the son of Orgon, Damis, having been disinherited through his means. To Elmire, the cool-headed and sensible wife of Orgon, he appears in a different character. Here he seems to know that all his art will be required to "make the worse appear the better reason," and pours his poisoned sophistries into her ear with the subtlety of Belial himself. "All was false and hollow, for his thoughts were low." And when his disguise will avail him no longer, but he stands detested for what he is, he flings it off as a man would drop a cloak, and stands forth in his true colours, brazen, vindictive, and a reprobate. Then at the very last, when justice has overtaken him, and he is to be carried off to prison, he accepts his fate without a word, like the astute rascal he is. He has played his miserable game to the end, has lost it, and has doubtless too often contemplated the penalty, to be surprised into outcry when it comes.

The other characters are drawn with wonderful skill and truth. There is M. de Pernelle, the old mother of Orgon, opinionated and obstinate, a thick-and-thin supporter of Tartuffe, her partisanship sharpened by the difficulty she finds in replying to the scornful remonstrances with which her injudicious praise of her hero is met by those about her. There is Orgon, the dupe, so infatuated with the shameless impostor, who speaks of him in private as "un homme à mener par le nez," a man to be led by the nose, that the coarsest imposture of Tartuffe is received by him with admiring and unquestioning belief; this same Orgon, too, most characteristically declaring, when at last he has been convinced of his error by the evidence of his own eyes and ears, that he will henceforth and for ever be the implacable foe of "tous les gens de bien"—thus falling, as such unreasoning people always do, from one extreme into the other. Then there are Elmire, the sensible wife of Orgon, quiet, self-possessed, with woman's wit sufficiently sharp to cut through the meshes of Tartuffe's net of falsehood, without any unnecessary excitement or demonstration of anger; Damis, the son of Orgon, rash and impetuous, proposing to counteract Tartuffe's schemes of vengeance by cutting off that astute gentleman's ears; Valère and Marianne, the two lovers, who quarrel and make friends as lovers always have done and always will do; Dorine, the sharp, loquacious attendant, who, hating and despising Tartuffe, takes a pleasure in shocking the oily knave's sensibilities; and last, not least, Cléante, Orgon's brother-in-law, with his honest, manly good sense, and his quick but eloquent protest against the shallow pretenders who would build up a reputation and a fortune for themselves on a foundation of vain words. No wonder the hypocrites fought tooth and nail against the representation of the play. Never had the mirror been held up to nature with better effect; never had scorn beheld her own image more completely.

THE MISANTHROPE.

Before this play had been permitted to rouse the laughter and admiration of the capital, Molière's reputation had been increased by other works, and his influence established by new tokens of the king's favour. Molière's company was now called the "troupe du roi," and the poet and his chief actors were pensioned. It was also understood that whoever showed any superciliousness or scorn with regard to Molière stood a good chance of incurring the displeasure of his master; and the court of Louis XIV. was not so unlike other courts of all times and countries as to fail in courtesy and offers of service to one whom the monarch had distinguished by his especial notice. It was under very favourable circumstances that "Le Misanthrope," Molière's chief work in 1665, was produced early in the next year.

In this admirable comedy the author gives us, in the chief character, a man who, thoroughly honest and straightforward, incapable of subterfuge or deceit, falls into the error of expecting too much from poor human nature. Though he might in one sense say with Timon, "I am misanthropos, and hate mankind," and indeed announces his intention "de fuir, dans un désert, l'approche des humains," Alceste, the hero, is a man-hater of the most polished type—a finished gentleman; indeed, like all the chief characters in the play, he is to a certain extent drawn from the life. He is in a continual state of disgust and anger at the duplicity and false-heartedness of the fine gentlemen and ladies who surround him; and with the petulance of an angry man sets up an impossible ideal, insisting that a man of honour ought, on each and every occasion, to say exactly what he means, and lay bare his innermost thoughts; that the conventional language of compliment prevalent in polite society is so much deception and fraud, against which every honest man should steadily set his face. He has a lawsuit pending, but will take no steps to procure a favourable verdict. No—his cause is good, and should therefore recommend itself to every just judge, without external aid; if judgment goes against him, so much the worse for those degraded beings who fail to see that his opponents are rogues. His friend Philinte laughingly suggests that it may be sometimes highly inconvenient to speak out one's thoughts without reserve; but Alceste will not allow a cruse for reticence anywhere. "Would you tell old Emilie that she's too old to play the pretty girl, and that she paints her face till she makes herself ridiculous?" "Yes." "Would you tell Dorilas that he's a bore, and tires everybody with his long stories about the glory of his ancestors?" "Decidedly." But, alas for human virtue and determination! Alceste, the frigid stickler for frankness and sincerity, is fascinated by the beauty and grace of Célimène, a young widow who has the very faults against which he is most bitter. She is a coquette, extravagantly fond of admiration, quite unworthy of the honest gentleman whom she has entangled—she must have been very like Armande Béjart, the poet's young wife; but Alceste cannot escape from her influence. "C'est pour mes péchés que je vous aime ainsi," he angrily exclaims, chafing at his own weakness; but she makes him do as she likes. He declares he will have an explanation with her, and she laughs at him; he threatens to leave her, and she commands him to stay where he is; he persists, and she tells him he may go; whereupon he stops. Philinte, the good-natured philosopher, is a capital foil to Alceste, with whom he expostulates with admirable patience. "Je prends tout doucement les hommes comme ils sont," is his very sensible motto. He is exceedingly tolerant, and considers it just as natural that men should be selfish and unjust, as that apes should be mischievous, vultures hungry, and wolves savage and wild. Sometimes, certainly, he goes too far in his spirit of toleration, as, for instance, where he compliments the conceited Oronte upon a sonnet which Alceste, whose opinion is asked by the self-sufficient author, feels compelled to pronounce trashy and bad. This Oronte is another capital character; a man of the world and a courtier, profuse of words that mean nothing, greedy of praise, and unable to endure the frankness of a man whom he has himself exhorted to speak out. Two coxcombs of marquises—Molière was somewhat given to poke fun at the marquises—help to carry off the dialogue, which is sparkling and brilliant throughout; and not the least successful among the character sketches is that of Arsinoë, the prude, who comes to Célimène with a budget of good advice and a heart full of envy and spite, and is utterly routed and put to confusion by that saucy beauty. The reading of a letter in which the satirical Célimène has turned her various admirers severally into ridicule in a manner which causes her to lose them all, appropriately concludes the play.

Molière considered "Le Misanthrope" as one of his best productions, and refused to alter a passage even at the suggestion of a royal princess. His dedications to the king and his other lofty patrons were sometimes obsequious, according to the fashion of the time; but his work was more to him than even the royal favour, and where he felt he was right he maintained his opinion valiantly.

NEW WORKS ; SUCCESSES.

Almost at the same time with this play appeared "Le Médecin Malgré lui." A translation, or rather an adaptation, has appeared in English, under the title of "The Mock Doctor." It might better be called "The Doctor on Compulsion." The work is a merry laughter-moving farce, turning on a little piece of feminine vengeance. The wife of a faggot maker, who has been chastised by her lord and master, retaliates by persuading two clowns, who are in search of a physician, that the man whom they will find chopping wood in the neighbouring thicket is a famous physician, but so eccentric that nothing short of a beating will induce him to avow his true character. The hint is acted upon, and the woodcutter becomes a doctor in spite of himself, being beaten into acquiescence by the clowns, who insist upon carrying him off to their master as a practitioner of rare skill, who will be sure to cure their patron's daughter; the young lady having been seized with dumbness from the moment when a distasteful marriage was proposed to her. The doctor on compulsion gives himself marvellous airs of learning and wisdom, only wondering that any one should wish to cure a woman of dumbness, and devoutly wishing that his wife had the disease. Like Launce, in the "Gentlemen of Verona," he evidently thinks that being "slow in words" should be set down as a woman's chief virtue. The young lady finds her tongue, and begins using it to such good purpose, that her father would fain have her made dumb again. This Master Sganarelle, the woodcutter-doctor, professes himself unable to do; but proposes to make the father deaf, which will answer the same purpose. The whole work is full of clever satire against the physicians, who were indeed, in Molière's time, a pedantic, ignorant set of Sanguados. "It's the best trade out," says Sganarelle, triumphantly; "whether we succeed or whether we fail, we get paid. Now, if a shoe-maker, when he makes a shoe, spoils a piece of leather, he has to pay for his clumsiness; but if we spoil a man, it costs nothing. Mistakes don't count with us; it's always the fault of the person who dies."

Molière himself never looked upon this clever play as anything more than a farcical trifle; but it set the whole town laughing, with the exception of the physicians; and Subligny, the author of the "Muse Dauphine," wittily observed that what Molière called a mere trifle was serious enough to make all Paris ill, since it set every one running to see "the Doctor."

In the works of every great writer there are some which stand out prominently, while others fill up the background; meritorious in themselves, they are lost in the splendour of the greater efforts. To this second class belong several of Molière's works that followed "Le Misanthrope" and "Le Médecin Malgré lui," such as "Mélicerte" and "Amphitryon," in the latter of which the poet has adapted a classic story, ill fitted in some of its details for modern representation. In another play of this period, "George Dandin," the woes of a wretched roturier or upstart are depicted with the quaintest humour, and in a manner that is not without its moral. George Dandin has had the vanity to court the alliance of a family of supercilious nobles, who rejoice in the appropriate name of De Sotenville. In bestowing their daughter upon this low-born citizen, the parental De Sotenvilles consider they have conferred such honour upon George Dandin, that such ordinary and commonplace things as duty, obedience and respect from his wife, together with any consideration for his wishes, "he must not look to have." He finds his helpmate speculating on the chances of his speedy decease, and arranging matters with a view to a second marriage; and when he appeals to his parents-in-law, this unhappy George Dandin meets with nothing but snubs and insolence; until, fairly bewildered and talked down, he promises amendment for his wife's shortcomings, and expresses contrition because she has egregiously befooled him. "Tu l'as voulu Georges Dandin." "You've brought it on yourself," is the poor dupe's mental comment. The moral of the play is "Marry in your own degree," a maxim that has not lost its force even at the present day.

L'AVARE; M. DE POURCEAUGNAC; THE CITIZEN NOBLEMAN, ETC.

A piece of a very different kind is "L'Avare." In this play we have the highest comedy, rising occasionally to tragic power, as in the scene where the miser, bereft of the money which he values above all things else on earth, home, children, or reputation, invokes heaven and earth to aid him in his vengeance on the thief. Harpagon, the avaricious noble, with his mean trickery and his despicable shifts his groundless suspicions and petty precautions—his repetition of the words "sans dot"—as the answer to every argument against his sacrificing his daughter by compelling her to marry an old man who will take her without a marriage portion—his fussy interference with small household details, with the one governing idea of his life, to save or accumulate money, produces the effect of exhibiting avarice in the most odious light. The idea, too, of the miser's hatred of the word "give," rising to such a pitch that he never "gives," but always "lends his friends good day;" his restless distrust, that causes him to betray the hiding-place of his money-box, by his continual visits to see that it is safe; the ruling passion for saving, that makes him promptly extinguish one of the two candles lighted for the signing of his daughter's marriage contract—all these are touches of true comedy. Like the Tartuffe which was produced, in a mutilated form in English, under the title of the "Hypocrite," with Dr. Cantwell, the man who "likes to be despised," for its hero, L'Avare was put into an English dress by Shadwell; but much of the charm of the original is lost in the transfer.

The year that added this to the other triumphs of the author, 1668, marks the commencement of the calamity by which the last years of Molière were darkened—chronic ill-health. A nervous cough, resulting from weakness of the chest, began to trouble him; and he even introduces this cough as part of the "business" of L'Avare, as if to accustom the audience to it. "You cough gracefully," says the flattering old woman Frosine, complimenting her patron, Harpagon, upon his good looks. This infirmity increased rapidly upon him; and it was only his determination of spirit that enabled him to battle against physical weakness, and continue at work till the end.

JEAN BAPTISTE POQUELIN DE MOLIÈRE.

"Monsieur de Pourceaugnac," which name may be translated Monsieur de Porkington, is another of Molière's farces. The hero, a country booby, is befooled in a ludicrous fashion, and the author's old enemies, the doctors, come in for more satirical handling. Poor Mr. Porkington is delivered over to two of them, who elaborately explain to him that the good appetite and the health and strength he enjoys are in themselves most dangerous symptoms, and require to be dealt with according to the best rules of the medical art, with a view to their removal. In the next year a similar idea was worked out to far better purpose in the wonderful piece of satire on the absurdities committed by purse-proud ambition, that lives in the literature of the drama under the title of "Le Bourgeois gentilhomme."

The chief character in this play is Monsieur Jourdain, who represents wealth, vulgarity, and ambition. Having plenty of money, and having bought a title, he cannot see why he should not find a royal road to all that distinguishes a gentleman. The bourgeois has no idea that there is anything in the gentilhomme beyond the power of his gold to purchase. A gentleman should possess some literary acquirements—accordingly he takes lessons in grammar and in polite literature, and is astounded to find that he has been talking prose all his life without being aware of it. A gentleman ought to know how to fence—so he takes lessons, and practises with his maid-servant, who insists on thrusting at him contrary to the rules of art. He must be taught something of music and dancing, too, and makes arrangements for improving his taste by a concert, taking care to call for his fine velvet gown pour mieux entendre la musique. Never was a better satire written on the absurdities of upstart vanity; and the effect is enhanced by the introduction of a noble, a count, who looks down with an air of amused scorn upon poor Monsieur Jourdain, while that unlucky pretender vainly endeavours to be made a gentleman by paying for it.

Again there was an interval, in which Molière produced some works, of minor merit as compared with his masterpieces, and yet of great value in themselves. He toiled indefatigably with his pen during the latter years of his life, as though with a presentiment that he had but little time before him for work. "Les Fourberies de Scapin" is an amusing piece of fooling, exhibiting in a comic light the triumph of witty, tricky knavery, as shown in some of the old Roman plays of Plautus and Terence. "Psyche," a classic tale in a dramatised form, was "written to order," at the desire of the king; and "La Comtesse d'Escarbagnas" reminds us in some degree of "Les Précieuses Ridicules."

In many of Molière's plays the reader is struck with the apparent incongruity produced by the introduction of interludes of music and dancing. To our modern ideas these ballet interludes seem entirely out of place; and we may be sure that to the correct tastes of Molière, an author who emphatically condemns artificial affectation in the line, "Ce n'est point ainsi que parle la nature," would have guarded him against this mingling of styles, had he been entirely a free agent. But he and his colleagues were the king's players; and Louis, their master, whom they were bound to please, was extravagantly fond of the ballet, and thought little of incongruities; a Roman warrior, with a flowing periwig, or the famous picture painted for Dr. Primrose, would in no wise have shocked his Majesty's idea of the fitness of things. He insisted on these ridiculous ballet scenes; all that Molière could do was to keep them out of the comedy, and insert them between the acts, where Signor Baptista Lulli, the chief of the king's orchestra, and the royal ballet-master, were told to arrange them as best they could.

THE "LEARNED WOMEN."

The Hôtel de Rambouillet could not forgive the author of the "Précieuses Ridicules." The satire had been too keenly enjoyed by the public, and was too true, to be readily forgotten. Title-tattling Madame de Sevigné, pompous Bussy-Rabutin, and all their clique, had moreover been further exasperated by the production of "Le Misanthrope," for more than one Oronte was to be found in the gilded saloons of Rambouillet. There were two versifiers especially, "de leurs vers fatigans lecteurs infatigables," who had raised against Molière the old accusations of impertinence, profanity, and vulgarity. These were Ménage and the Abbé Cottin. Molière took his revenge upon them by getting them the same unenviable immortality bestowed by Pope on the characters of the Dunciad. He brought out a comedy, "Les Femmes Savantes," the Learned Women, in which the two pedants are introduced: Ménage as Vadius, and Cottin as Trissotin. The name, at first Tricotin, was subsequently altered, as pointing too directly to the original.

It happened that Ménage, to whom a sonnet of Trissotin's had been shown, had given a very severe opinion regarding its demerits, in ignorance of the fact that Cottin was the author. The exasperated wit took the first opportunity of retaliating, and an edifying quarrel in public between Ménage and Cottin furnished gossip and laughter for several days in the salons of Paris. The incident was adapted with such skill by Molière, the two vainglorious pedants were rendered so exquisitely ridiculous, that all Paris was delighted, and ran to see the sport. Ménage judiciously refrained from complaint, declared the "Femmes Savantes" an excellent piece, and declined to see his own portrait in Vadius. But Cottin had less self-command, and could not conceal his mortification. His reputation as a wit was destroyed, and he fell into complete disrepute. When, ten years afterwards, he died, almost forgotten, a clever little verse formed almost his sole epitaph. It was hardly complimentary, and ran thus:—

"Knowest thou wherein Cottin Differeth from Trissotin?
'Tis that Cottin's days are o'er,
While Trissotin lives evermore."

In the "Femmes Savantes" we have a most judicious satire upon those would-be learned people, who, on the strength of a mere smattering of a subject affect airs of criticism, and talk a jargon which they themselves would find it difficult to explain. Philaminte, the imperious wife, Bélise, the sister, and Armande, the elder daughter of the rich citizen Chrysale, make that unhappy man's life a burden to him with their learned airs and assumption of superiority to the ordinary cares and duties of domestic life. Inasmuch as the body is the mere envelope or husk wherein the soul is confined, these high-flying ladies consider any trouble taken for bodily comfort as sordid and low, a perversion of the faculties given for sublime uses; and the unfortunate Chrysale finds himself surrounded by female relatives who disdain to minister to his home wants, while the servants dutifully imitate their superiors, to his manifest injury, for he can get no service out of them.

The success of the "Femmes Savantes" caused Molière's friends to renew endeavours they had already made to cause him to give up acting, and to get him to devote himself entirely to authorship; a post being offered him at the same time by the renowned Academy. Boileau urged the change upon him with zealous warmth, but Molière shook his head with a sigh. "It's the point of honour," he replied sadly. More than a hundred people attached to the theatre were dependent upon his managership for their daily bread, and would have been ruined if he left them; and so with failing health and aching heart he toiled on, standing to his duty as manfully as ever a sailor stood to his gun in the heat of battle.

MOLIÈRE'S LAST EFFORT; HIS DEATH.

One more effort he made, before the stage of his life was darkened, and the curtain descended upon that brave last act of courage and endurance. On the 10th of February, 1673, was represented the last of his comedies, "Le Malade Imaginaire," as full of wit and humour as any preceding work—a splendid piece of satire on the ignorance and pomposity of the physicians of that time. Molière himself played the part of Argan the hypochondriac, who fancies himself ill, and swallows doctors' stuff by the gallon, and pills by the dozen. The house was in a roar from beginning to end; the piece was to be repeated every night; and for several evenings crowded houses bore witness to its growing popularity.

But the chief actor was making sport for the delighted spectators while death was at his heart. On the evening fixed for his fourth representation he felt worse than usual. He was urged to put off the performance; but again the point of honour, consideration for those who would suffer, deterred him. The numerous people attached to the theatre would lose a day's pay if the theatre were closed, and many of them were poor. So he made a last effort, got through his part, was carried to his house in the Rue Richelieu, and died surrounded by his friends and two poor sisters of charity, to whom he had always been liberal and kind. Two priests of Saint Eustache, summoned to the bed of the dying man, refused to come. He was a play-actor, and thus excommunicate; he had written a Tartuffe, which in the eyes of the priests was enough to bring down the curse, "Let him be anathema."

They refused to bury him like a Christian; but his wife petitioned the king, and the personal intervention and command of Louis XIV. procured some "maimed rites" for the funeral of the greatest comic poet and the wisest social philosopher France had ever been able to number among her worthies.

A SOBER VIEW OF LIFE ; HARD EXPERIENCES.

"WE talked about the different courses through which life ran. She said in her own composed manner, as if she had accepted the theory as a fact, that she believed some were appointed beforehand to sorrow and much disappointment; that it did not fall to the lot of all—as Scripture told us—to have their lines fall in pleasant places; that it was well for those who had rougher paths, to perceive that such was God's will concerning them, and try to moderate their expectations, leaving hope to those of a different doom, and seeking patience and resignation as the virtues they were to cultivate." Such is the deliberate opinion, the result of a very painful personal experience, given by one of the most gifted Englishwomen of the present century; one in whose life of noble self-denial and helpfulness, of filial and sisterly affection, the truth is strongly exemplified, that the ways of Providence are not as the ways of man, and that for reasons too deep for our human understanding to fathom, earthly happiness is frequently denied to those who seem best calculated to enjoy, and appear by their conduct most fully to deserve it.

GENIUS UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

The history of Charlotte Brontë, her sisters, her strange, eccentric father, and her gifted, erring, and most unhappy brother, forms one of those tragedies of domestic life of which many are being continually enacted in our midst, and which seem all the deeper because the sufferings they entail, protracted through the monotonous pain of years, and excite so little attention and sympathy. All "the sickness of heart, and the restless, unsatisfied longing" attendant upon a life passed amid sordid cares and the anxious strivings rendered necessary by narrow circumstances, while the consciousness of genius fretted the spirit emulous of higher achievement and of loftier tasks than those whose fulfilment the exigencies of narrow means imperatively demanded;—thankless, unappreciated service among strangers unable to recognise or appreciate the value of the intellect, they were unconsciously crushing in ignoble servitude;—all the depression arising from ill-health and miserable physical depression and weakness, while oft the daily task had to be accomplished in spite of the yearning of the body, soul, and spirit for respite and repose; all this, with the deeper anguish arising from the loss of those nearest and dearest to her whom she saw fading away day by day, and who were successively snatched from her by the destroyer's hand, until she was left the last survivor of a household of seven children, who had been united by bonds of affection of no common strength, did Charlotte Brontë endure, with a quiet, patient constancy that had in it the highest heroism.

THE LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF LIFE; COMPENSATION.

Those who argue that in this earthly life the doctrine of compensation is far more fully carried out than would appear on a superficial glance, may from one point of view draw a strong argument from the history of this heroine of private life. The active and sometimes even morbid sensibility that is frequently found as a concomitant of talent, the disposition whose excessive shyness made the very contact with strangers in itself painful and distressing, the tenderness of heart and craving after kindness that render a harsh word or a thoughtless slight a source of real suffering, must be taken as very real and serious drawbacks in estimating the advantages of the possession of the gift called genius; and if, on the one hand, that possession brings occasional moments, or even hours, irradiated by the brightness of triumph, on the other hand, "the heartache and the thousand natural shocks that flesh is heir to."—"the whips and scorns of time, the oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumacy,"—all the spurs that patient merit of the unworthy takes, "are far more keenly felt than by those less sensitively constituted beings cast in a more ordinary and a coarser mould, who go placidly through existence, not greatly affected or moved by the joys or sorrows of life. "Wo viel Licht, ist starker Schatten," says brave Godfrey of Berlichingen in Goethe's play. There are deep shadows to be set against the sunlight of genius; and with the higher aptitude for enjoyment comes also the greater capacity for suffering. The sensitive nature of the genius is equally ready to thrill with pleasure or with pain. Young Keats breaking his heart, though not over a review of his poems churlishly indited by a bookworm of malignant temper; Chatterton, the marvellous boy-poet, with rage and despair in his heart, tearing up and burning the manuscripts in which he depended for fame and fortune, before making an end of it with the dose of poison in the squalid Holborn Street; Cowper enduring exquisite misery at Westminster School under the rough jests and faggings inflicted on him by his more robust schoolfellows,—these are but instances that might be multiplied indefinitely, to show how the keen susceptibilities of genius are smitten by the blows that fall comparatively harmlessly on the more sluggish natures of ordinary men and women. An average boy in Cowper's position would have paid off his oppressors in their own coin so far as his physical strength and skill would allow, while he suffered the balance of the debt to accumulate to be paid off at a future and more convenient season;—in Keats' position, he would have seen through the motives of the ill-natured reviewer, at whose malignity he could afford to smile;—and in the place of Chatterton, he would have earned food and shelter and raiment by manual labour, if better might not be, and the gate of literary fame remained shut to him. But where we find all the nervous irritability of an imaginative and poetic nature joined to stoical patience, unflinching fortitude, and a beautiful faith and trust that looks steadily to the end, when all around is darkest, and the path of life must be trodden by bleeding feet, such a life is indeed worthy of all honour and reverence; and such a life of patient endurance and warm affection, hopeful, untiring in activity, and sometimes heroic in its self-abnegation, is presented to us in the career of Charlotte Brontë, and in a less degree in that of her sisters Emily and Anne. We have now to trace the outline of this career, in so far as our limits will enable us; for the record of courage and endurance, selffastness and rectitude, cannot fail to give encouragement to many who, sorely oppressed with the burden and heat of the day, will see how suffering nobly borne will end in triumph, and how toil is followed by rest and peace.

THE BIRTHPLACE OF THE BRONTËS; HAWORTH AND ITS CHURCH.

About four miles from the town of Keighley in Yorkshire, on an ascending road passing through a bleak and somewhat hungry-looking country, with stone dykes in place of hedges, bushes and shrubs instead of trees, and patches of pale-looking, grey-green oats instead of wheat-fields, lies the village of Haworth, pronounced North by the dwellers in the region round about Haworth church, one of the oldest in that part of the country, a little aside from the main road. The village itself is situated on the side of a steep hill with a background of dun and purple moors rising and sweeping away yet higher than the church, which is built at the very summit of the long, narrow street. All round the horizon there is the same line of sinuous, wavelike hills, the scoops into which they fall only revealing other hills beyond, of similar colour and shape, crowned with wild, bleak moors—grand from the ideas of solitude and loneliness which they suggest, or oppressive from the feelings which they give of being pent up by some monotonous and illimitable barrier, according to the mood in which the spectator may be. "On one side of the churchyard, which is crowded with gravestones, stands a plain, solid-looking house, one story in height, with narrow windows and a heavy, strong roof, the door surmounted by a little porch, and with a small garden in front enclosed by a low stone wall. The house looked warm and comfortable enough, but there was no feature of the picturesque about it."

A WORTHY BUT ECCENTRIC CLERGYMAN.

In this plain abode there lived and toiled faithfully for many years an Irishman, as incumbent of Haworth, the Reverend Patrick Brontë. He was a man of some talent, great energy, and high principle; had made his own way and studied at Cambridge under circumstances of no little pecuniary difficulty and disadvantage; and had won his position by the strength of his own merit. On the other hand, he had in his character some of the impetuosity with which his countrymen are generally credited; cherished somewhat Spartan notions as to the bringing up of a family, and was especially severe in his ideas of simplicity in dress. Thus we hear of him on one occasion cutting up into shreds a silk dress of his wife's which offended him by an appearance of smartness. When greatly angered, he relieved his mind by firing pistols up the chimney or out at the back door, and once by thrusting a rug on the fire, enduring the risk of its combustion until half stifled. Charlotte Brontë declared with affectionate earnestness that he never gave her an angry word; all the more creditable to him when we consider the fiery elements always at work within him. He had married a lady of the name of Branwell, from Penzance, in Cornwall; and from this union—a happy one in spite of various drawbacks—were born six children—five daughters and an only son, to whom was given the name of his mother's family. At first the pride and favourite of the household, Branwell Brontë came to be its shame. In the order of their birth, the daughters were Maria and Elizabeth, who died in childhood, and Charlotte, Emily, and Anne, who all, though in different degrees, earned merited fame in literature.

A FAMILY OF ORPHAN CHILDREN; EVIDENCES OF EARLY ABILITY.

It was the misfortune of the little flock to be early deprived of the mother's affection and care. Mrs. Brontë died of cancer in 1821, in the thirty-ninth year of her age. During her long illness the children were left much to themselves, and would go wandering hand-in-hand over the moors, the quietest, quaintest company of little people imaginable; Maria, the eldest, a staid little woman of eight years old, watching like a mother over the tinier mites under her charge. "Such still, noiseless, good little creatures," is the emphatic verdict given of them by an old servant, Tabby, who was in the house at the birth of them all, and lived in the family till all, with the exception of Charlotte, had been laid in their graves. They led a peculiarly solitary existence, seeing very few people, and thrown upon their own resources for instruction and amusement to an unusual extent. Not that their father did not feel a real interest in their welfare; but the duties of his parish took up much of his time; and a peculiarity in his health necessitated his dining alone. He had, indeed, a high appreciation of the unusual abilities and precocious intellect of these extraordinary little ones, and has left on record an account of their early achievements and promise. "When mere children," he said, "as soon as they could read and write, Charlotte and her brother used to invent and act little plays of their own, in which the Duke of Wellington, my daughter Charlotte's hero, was sure to come off conqueror; when a dispute would not unfrequently arise among them regarding the comparative merits of him, Bonaparte, Hannibal, and Cæsar. When the argument got warm, and rose to its height, as their mother was then dead, I had sometimes to come in as arbitrator, and settle the dispute to the best of my judgment. Generally, in the management of these concerns, I frequently thought that I saw signs of rising talent, which I had seldom or never before seen in any of their age." It must have been a curious spectacle, these quiet little pale children, sitting in their "study" with the rough, faithful, Yorkshire servant, Tabby, watching over them, and discussing the characters of heroes past and present, making up from their imaginations an ideal world, and thus escaping from the monotony of their colourless daily existence. An aunt, however, arrived after a time at the parsonage, a Miss Branwell, who loved the little orphans in her way, but hated Yorkshire; indeed, the bleak surroundings of Haworth must have presented a dreary change to her from the soft climate, the abundant vegetation, and the garden flowers of Penzance, whence she came. Her nieces were never quite at home with her; nor was she able, it appears, to teach them much except needlework.

THE CLERGY DAUGHTER'S SCHOOL AT COWAN'S BRIDGE.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Brontë gladly availed himself of an opportunity that presently offered for the education of his daughters. A wealthy and energetic clergyman, the Rev. Carus Wilson, had exerted himself to establish at Cowan's Bridge, between Leeds and Kendal, a school for the daughters of that numerous class of clergyman whose means were insufficient for the education of their children. To this establishment Mr. Brontë brought his daughters Maria and Elizabeth, and soon after Charlotte was sent there too; and from Cowan's Bridge were Maria and Elizabeth, but a short time afterwards, brought home to die of rapid consumption, the one in her thirteenth, the other in her twelfth year. In after years, Charlotte, in her novel "Jane Eyre," exposed the abuses of the Cowan's Bridge institution in words of scathing indignation, attributing to the reverend projector the chief blame for bad management, food defective in quantity, and so execrably cooked that even the hearty appetites of children, sharpened by the keen air loathed it, and for the general harshness of a system calculated to crush and sadden young hearts rather than to strengthen and lift them up. To her friend Mrs. Gaskell, Charlotte, in after years, related with indignant tears, how one teacher, whom she has pilloried in her book under the name of Miss Scatcherd, one day fell upon poor Maria, suffering from illness and from the effects of a blister applied to her side, and dragged the dying child from her bed into the middle of the dormitory, rating her for laziness; and, indeed, the damp situation of the house, and the defective arrangements, resulted in a fever among the pupils, forty of whom fell ill at the same time. Afterwards the school was removed to a more suitable locality, and under better auspices and management became a useful and valuable institution; but in the days when the little Brontës were pupils there, the detestable hardening system was rife, which imposed upon the children a kind of ascetic self-mortification, and inculcated humility of the kind developed in the estimable Uriah Heep. Upon children of delicate constitutions like the little Brontës, who, though accustomed to the plainest food at home, had been used also to have their meals of potatoes or porridge served up with the scrupulous cleanliness and neatness that characterized all the arrangements at Haworth parsonage, the untidy, slovenly cookery, and the repulsive food served up at the school was a source of real danger to health, and may be said to have hastened, if it did not bring on, the disease of which they died.

CHARACTER OF "HELEN BURNS;" FIRST EFFORTS AT AUTHORSHIP.

In the beautiful character of Helen Burns, in "Jane Eyre," Charlotte has given a sketch of her eldest sister Maria. Certain it is that Mr. Brontë's eldest daughter possessed qualities and talents of an extraordinary kind; he himself speaks of her as being competent, at the age of eleven, to converse with the gravity and sense of a grown up person. By the death of Maria and Elizabeth, the office of eldest sister among the little motherless family devolved upon Charlotte; and we now have a picture of the four survivors—the three sisters and their brother Branwell once more occupying the "children's study" at the parsonage, under the care of the sturdy and faithful Tabby. "Making up stories," or evolving the plots of romances from their busy little brains, and then filling in the incidents, formed the chief amusement of these precocious and strangely imaginative children. It is recorded how, especially after dusk in the evening, they used to pace to and fro in their little room, their arms entwined round each other, and employed in weaving their romances and narratives; of child's play, in its more usual and boisterous sense, they seem to have had no notion. At this time little Charlotte began to exercise herself in written composition. Many years afterwards, her biographer Mrs. Gaskell came into possession of a number of volumes of manuscript, written in a singularly neat and minute character, and bearing testimony alike to the talent and the indefatigable industry of the future authoress.

PORTRAIT OF CHARLOTTE BRONTË AT FIFTEEN YEARS OLD.

In outward appearance she was in her early girlhood what she continued to the end of her life to be, a quiet-looking, staid little personage, with no pretensions to beauty or even to what are called "good looks," but with unmistakable tokens about her of ladylike refinement and culture. Though small, she was too well-proportioned to suggest the idea of deformity, though she used to describe herself as stunted. Her eyes were fine and expressive, shining with a peculiar lustre whenever her attention and interest were excited. The other features are described as somewhat plain, large, and ill-set; but "unless you began to catalogue them," says her biographer, "you were scarcely aware of the fact; for the eyes and the fervour of the countenance overpowered every physical defect; the crooked mouth and the large nose were forgotten, and the whole face arrested the attention, and presently attracted all those whom she herself would have cared to attract. Remarkably small hands and feet, a wonderfully neat personal appearance, a staid, subdued, reflective air, enhanced, no doubt, if not altogether occasioned by a sense of her responsibilities and duties as eldest sister,—these, with a general expression of excessive shyness endeavouring to conceal itself under grave composure, make up the outward presentment of Charlotte Brontë, just entered into her teens;—a "little set, antiquated girl, very quiet in manners, and very quaint in dress," is the summing up of her portrait at the age of fifteen.

MISS WOOLER'S SCHOOL AT ROE HEAD; ASSOCIATIONS OF THE LOCALITY.

As it was more than probable that the sisters would have to get their bread as governesses, Charlotte was sent to school again, this time to a Miss Wooler's, at Roe Head, near the "bonny Kirkstrees," the traditional burialplace of bold Robin Hood. A very different place this, with its charming glades and haunted wells, from bleak, bare Haworth; one of those fertile spots the monks of old were accustomed to choose for their abodes, with abundance of pasture, huge forest trees, and a wealth of clear, flowing brooks.

At Miss Wooler's, Charlotte Brontë remained two years. At her first arrival she astonished her schoolfellows—more than one of whom have left records of her—by the wonderful amount of her reading, and her ignorance of such subjects as grammar and geography. She was excessively shortsighted, inasmuch that when her companions admitted her provisionally to share in some ball play that was going on, they found that she could not see the ball; "and so," says one of them, "we put her out." In fact she soon told them she had never learned to play, and did not know how to set about it. But she soon won love and respect, and became famous as the best narrator, or rather the one great narrator, in the school; for in this art no one could approach her; and she could at any time frighten the other girls half out of their wits by stories of ghosts and goblins. A placid air of resignation seems to have been her general manner; the little excitements and debates of the schoolroom were of small interest to her. Already at that time a weakness of constitution was manifested in the feebleness of her appetite; for she could eat no animal food. A dreamy habit of abstraction from outward events and interests, something of the disposition she ascribes to Helen Burns in "Jane Eyre," marked her own conduct at this period. She became after a time the acknowledged authority, to whom all referred on any question of a literary and even of a political nature; for she had followed the history and fortunes of the Reform Bill, then passing through Parliament; and being an enthusiastic admirer of the Duke of Wellington, expressed great pleasure when the Bill was thrown out in the House of Lords. She objected to Sir Robert Peel for what she thought his tergiversation, considering that he acted not from principle but from expediency. Two of her companions, especially one, whom she afterwards immortalised in the character of "Shirley," remained her constant friends for the rest of her life. So popular did the little quiet, undemonstrative girl become, through the sheer force of her uprightness, kindness of heart, and undeviating principle, that on the solitary occasion of her receiving a bad mark for an imperfect lesson, the quantity set her as a task having been absurdly excessive, her companions took up the matter so warmly that Miss Wooler expunged the bad mark forthwith, to the general satisfaction of the appellants. On the whole, these schooldays at Miss Wooler's may be considered among the few glimpses of sunshine that fitfully illumined this portion of her shadowy life. In that little world her intellectual and moral qualities had been acknowledged and appreciated, and she was beloved and respected by all.

BRANWELL BRONTË; ARTISTIC SCHEMES.

On her return from Miss Wooler's, Charlotte Brontë lived for some time at home, imparting to her sisters the instruction she had herself acquired during her two years' stay. Branwell, her brother, had, among his other talents, a decided turn for drawing and painting; and he and Charlotte took lessons of a local teacher in the hope of some day becoming artists. Indeed it was time that something definite should be done in choosing a profession for Branwell, who was now almost eighteen years old, and had shown himself possessed of undoubted ability and even genius. Unfortunately he became a kind of tavern oracle in the village; and the landlord of the Black Bull would inquire of a chance visitor who seemed dull or solitary if he wanted any one to help him discuss his bottle. "If you do," the obliging Boniface would say: "I'll send up for Patrick." And the said Patrick Branwell would appear accordingly,—and quite unknown to his father, whose health and duties kept him much out of the way, was laying the foundation of those habits of intemperance which combined with other follies to make his life a dismal wreck. It was purposed that he should go to London as a student of the Royal Academy; but the project could not be carried out. He afterwards obtained a tutorship, and had an intention of reading for college, but became entangled in a wretched affair which proved his ruin, and returned home a disgraced man. To drown regret and remorse he took to drink harder than ever; and the bottle killed him.

Abandoning her artistic schemes and hopes, Charlotte Brontë, in 1835, returned to Miss Wooler's as a teacher. Her younger sister Emily accompanied her as a pupil; but Emily could not exchange the liberty of rambling over the purple moors for the disciplined monotony of a school-room, even under so kind a preceptress as Miss Wooler, without pining for her home with an intensity that made her seriously ill. It was found necessary to recall her to save her life; and ultimately it became a recognised fact that Emily must remain at Haworth when the other sisters went forth to seek their livelihood; and as Tabby was growing old and infirm, Emily bravely undertook many domestic duties to spare the faithful old servant. We have a glimpse of her at a somewhat later period, with a grammar propped up in front of a kneading-trough, making bread and studying German at the same time with indomitable energy.

We can well understand her yearning for home under any conditions. For six months she went to a school at Halifax as a teacher; and, less fortunate than Charlotte, gives the latter an appalling account of her duties. "Hard labour from six in the morning till eleven at night," writes the latter, "with only one half-hour of exercise between. This is slavery. I fear she can never stand it;" and the writer judged correctly.

INVENTING STORIES; LITERARY ASPIRATIONS.

In the holidays, when Charlotte came home and the sisters were together, many consultations were held as to ways and means. Until nine at night they continued assiduously at their sewing; but then Miss Branwell, the aunt, went to bed, and duty was over for the day. We have a graphic picture of their proceedings, when the coveted leisure hour with which the day concluded had come at length. "They put away their work and began to pace the room backwards and forwards, up and down,—as often with the candle extinguished for economy's sake as not,—their figures glancing into the firelight and out into the shadow perpetually. At this time they talked over past cares and troubles; they planned for the future, and consulted each other as to their plans. In after years this was the time for discussing together the plots of their novels. And again, still later, this was the time for the last surviving sister to walk alone, from old, accustomed habit, round and round the desolate room, thinking sadly upon "the days that were no more." One of the results of these evening consultations was the inditing of a letter to Southey by Charlotte and of an epistle to Wordsworth by Branwell, asking advice on the chances of success in a literary career. Southey's reply, though grave and kind, was not encouraging. Many volumes of poems, he declared, were now published every year without attracting public attention, any one of which, if it had appeared half a century earlier, would have obtained a high reputation for its author; and went on to say that though the writer had made literature his profession, had devoted his life to it, and never for a moment repented of the deliberate choice, he thought himself nevertheless in duty bound to caution every young man who applied to him as an aspirant for encouragement and advice against taking so perilous a course.

SCHOOL-TEACHING AT MISS WOOLER'S; TRIALS OF A GOVERNESS.

The chances of success in literature appearing thus shadowy, there was nothing for it but to continue in the old line of drudgery. "I am again at Dewsbury" (whither Miss Woole's school had been removed), she writes in 1837, "engaged in the old business—teach, teach, teach;" and at her task she continued until her health gave way. And as her bodily strength failed, black clouds of doubt and anguish for a time swept over her mind; and a belief in a kind of ghastly Calvinism reduced her to a condition of the deepest despondency. "If Christian perfection be necessary to salvation," she writes in a letter to a friend, "I shall never be saved; my heart is a very hotbed for sinful thoughts; and when I decide on an action, I scarcely remember to look to my Redeemer for direction. I know not how to pray; I cannot bend my life to the grand end of doing good. I go on constantly seeking my own pleasure, pursuing the gratification of my own desires. I forget God, and will not God forget me?" If there ever was a person in this world of selfishness who strove to do her duty; and bravely resisted every temptation of procuring the gratification of a desire at the expense of duty, it was Charlotte Brontë.

The experiences of Charlotte and Anne as governesses were not encouraging. They both met with employers who were selfish and exacting. In the little tale "Agnes Grey," Anne Brontë described some of the mortifications and perplexities that attended her efforts to teach the "young idea how to shoot," under difficulties; to control children who were uncontrollable, and whose parents invariably took the side of the darlings against the dependent who had the hardihood to find fault with them. Charlotte's personal experiences were much of the same kind. "The children are constantly with me," she writes. "As for correcting them, I quickly found that was out of the question,—they are to do as they like. A complaint to the mother only brings black looks on myself, and unjust, partial excuses to screen the children. I have tried that plan once, and succeeded so notably that I shall try no more." She nobly set herself to carry out her task of taming and instructing the children without any help from the parents. "I said to myself, 'I have never yet quitted a place without gaining a friend; adversity is a good school; the poor are born to labour, and the dependent to endure. I resolved to be patient, to command my feelings, and to take what came.' And this, indeed, was the principle of her whole life,—patience, self-control, and resignation.

She had sufficient occasion for the exercise of these virtues. One of her sweet pupils replied to a remonstrance against disobedience by wounding her in the head with a stone. She magnanimously forebore to denounce the little culprit when questioned on her bruised appearance. By this and similar evidences of good-heartedness she won the little rebel's respect and esteem. "I love 'oo, Miss Brontë," he once declared, sliding his little fist into her palm. Whereupon the mother exclaimed aloud in wonder before all the children, "Love the governess, my dear!"

No wonder, with such experiences, that Charlotte Brontë rejoiced greatly when the engagement with the uncongenial family, "proud as peacocks and rich as Jews," came to an end, and she was at liberty to return for a short time to the shelter of the dear old home at Haworth. Bleak and cheerless as the prospect from the old grey, close building must have appeared, it was everything to her from association, and she gleefully took a share of the household management; earning for herself a scolding from Miss Branwell for burning the family linen the first time she attempted to iron it, the faithful Tabby having left them for a while on account of rheumatic lameness. Charlotte declared that "human feelings were queer things," but for her part she felt much happier blackleading the stoves, making the beds, and sweeping the floors at home, than she would be living like a fine lady elsewhere. But the circumstances of the Brontës were narrow; there were many calls on the poor clergyman's slender income; and though the rest and quietness of spirit to be enjoyed at Haworth were sweet, and Charlotte Brontë frankly confessed she hated governess-ship, duty called, and she obeyed; putting the position to a friendly correspondent in a half-humorous and yet quaintly suggestive manner: "Verily, it is a delightful thing to live here at home," she writes, "at full liberty to do just what one pleases. But I recollect some scrubby old fable about grasshoppers and ants, by a scrubby old knave yeleft Æsop; the grasshoppers sang all the summer and starved all the winter." And fortifying herself with this piece of the wisdom of the ancients, she looked about her for means to escape the fate of the improvident insects before mentioned.

THE "PENSIONNAT" AT BRUSSELS.

A project long cherished, that of establishing a school on a very modest scale, or taking pupils in the parsonage itself, was reluctantly abandoned for want of the funds wherewith to make a start; and once more Charlotte Brontë obtained, after a world of trouble in the way of correspondence and interviews—each of which interviews must have been inexpressibly trying to one of her morbidly shy temperament—a position of governess in a family who treated her with something like consideration, and where her salary, after some small deductions, amounted to the magnificent sum of £16 yearly. But she found herself at a great disadvantage for want of knowledge of modern languages; and here, in her second situation as in her first, her employer appears, like worthy John Gilpin's helpmate, to have "had a frugal mind," and to have considered that inasmuch as the pupils declined any but homœopathic doses of learning, the governess should combine with her legitimate functions the duties of needlewoman, and fill up all her leisure time with tasks of needlework.

Accordingly it was determined that she should go, with her younger sister Emily, to a school or Pensionnat at Brussels, kept by a Monsieur and Madame Héger. Their special object was to learn French and German, especially the former language; and they applied themselves to the task with characteristic energy, and with an amount of intelligence that astonished M. Héger himself, a man of no inconsiderable acquirements and learning, and induced him to adopt a special plan in teaching them, dispensing almost entirely with dictionary and grammar, and giving them "readings" from the best French authors, trusting to their taste to pick out the points for imitation and remembrance. It was a strange experience for the shy, quiet spinster of six-and-twenty to be transformed once more into a school-girl, and set to study instead of to teach.

M. HÉGER AND HIS SYSTEM; MISS BRONTË'S OPINION OF BRUSSELS.

Of the value of M. Héger's intelligent analytical teaching in forming the taste of the two sisters, and opening their eyes to the difference between true eloquence and false and meretricious ornaments of speech, there can be no doubt; as little is it to be questioned that he devoted himself with true kindness and zeal to their comfort and improvement, and was actuated by a real and honest desire to be useful to them, and to advance them in their career. His good feeling is sufficiently shown in his letter to Mr. Brontë, after their first return to England, whither they went back in haste, on the news, first, of the sudden and alarming illness and then of the death of their good aunt Miss Branwell. M. Héger wrote a letter to Mr. Brontë, full of real solicitude for the completion of the process of improvement that had been so well begun in both his gifted pupils. He had seen the undoubted genius possessed by each of them, and also that they had never had any systematic teaching of the higher kind until they came to Brussels. In the most gracefully appreciative manner and with a gentleman's tact, he urged the expediency of their returning to Brussels for another year under such conditions as proved the sincerity of his declaration, that this was to him and to Madame Héger not a matter of a pecuniary interest, but affection for the studious, striving, gifted young Englishwomen. Emily, always liable to homesickness when separated from the moorland and the heather-covered hills around Haworth, could not be prevailed upon to leave England again; but Charlotte returned to Brussels, and passed an additional year as English teacher in the Hégers' institution. After her final return home she wrote to M. Héger, expressing in the warmest terms her sense of the kindness she had received under his roof and of the value of the knowledge she had acquired under his tuition ; and yet in her correspondence with her friends, and afterwards, when the time came for her to write "Villette," she had hardly a good word for the country or the institution, or its inhabitants, old and young, male and female, with the sole exception of "M. Paul Emmanuel," in whom some of the traits of M. Hégér are reproduced.

FOREIGN LANDS AND ENGLISH PREJUDICES ; ESTIMATE OF THE PEASANTRY.

The fact seems to be that she brought to Brussels with her that frame of mind, common enough forty years ago among English people, and not entirely extinct yet, in which everything that clashes with preconceived ideas or long accustomed habits is set down as in itself objectionable—something of the method of thinking of Marryat's sailor in "Poor Jack," who could not conceive how a ship could be worked in "such lingo" as that spoken by the French, and attributed the alleged defective seamanship of that nation to the outlandish name they gave to the foremast. The same feeling of patriotism that induced Charlotte Brontë to consider the Duke of Wellington the greatest hero the world had produced, made her look upon the foreigner, generally, as a kind of inferior animal. Dickens admirably describes the denizens of Bleeding-heart Yard, in "Little Dorrit," as patronizing brisk Jenn Baptiste Cavaletto with a kind of contemptuous pity, having a notion that it was a sort of Divine visitation upon a foreigner that he was not an Englishman, and that all kinds of calamities happened to his country because it did things that England did not, and did not do things that England did. Such, making all due allowance for the immense difference between a woman of genius and the ignorant "Bleeding-hearts," was the spirit in which Charlotte Brontë judged the Belgians and their institutions. "Singularly cold, selfish, animal, and inferior," is her verdict on her schoolfellows ; "very mutinous and difficult for the teachers to manage ; and their principles rotten to the core." And here it may at once be said was the fault that appears in all her works, and occasionally in her admirable letters, full as they are of affection and duty and high, unselfish principle ; she had an inveterate habit of generalising and judging large questions by observations confined to a narrow basis. Thus she sees, even in an exaggerated form, the evils in the system of the Roman Catholic Church, and describes them with a bitterness of sarcasm worthy of Thackeray ; but she is quite unable to discern the other side of the question,—to appreciate the humanising influences spread around him, and the persistent work accomplished by many a country curé. To her the gorgeous ceremonial of Romanist worship was all "mummery ;" and in like manner she seems to think it a duty to stand up for her own countrymen and countrywomen against the foreigner, even in cases where she could certainly not speak of her own knowledge. Thus in "Jane Eyre," speaking in the person of the heroine, she puts forth the following astounding statement :—"After all, the British peasantry are the best taught, best mannered, most self-respecting of any in Europe : since those days I have seen Paysannes and Bäuerinnen ; and the best of them seemed to me ignorant, coarse, and besotted, compared to my Morton girls." And at that very time Charles Kingsley was telling in "Yeast" and "Alton Locke," from his own experience, the real story of the British peasantry, in their hopeless, dreary, bovine ignorance, sottishness, and degradation, in the days when, to fill the labourer with bacon and beer was considered the best thing to be done for him, and his highest happiness was sought in the carouse that gave him temporary oblivion of his serfdom. And as Charlotte Brontë was never in her life in France or Germany, while her Belgian experience was confined to the precincts of a half-conventual "Pensionnat," it is difficult to imagine where the Bäuerinnen and Paysannes can have come within her ken. She was simply talking about what she did not understand.

THE SCHOOL PROJECT RENEWED ; A SKELETON
IN THE HOUSE AT HAWORTH PARSONAGE.

By the end of 1843 she was back with her sisters Emily and Anne in the old parsonage at Haworth ; and now again the question arose, what they were to do to earn money ; for Mr. Brontë's income was small, and the calls upon his slender purse were many. "I no longer regard myself as young," wrote Miss Brontë to a friend ; "indeed, I shall soon be twenty-eight, and it seems as if I ought to be working and braving the rough realities of the world, as other people do." The plan discussed among them over and over again was that of keeping a school ; and that their plan was not a very ambitious one is shown by the proposal of Charlotte to fix the charge for board and English education at £25 per annum. But though everyone wished them well, no pupils came, and the scheme was perforce given up. Indeed it could hardly have been carried out successfully in the locality proposed, for Haworth parsonage soon became the scene of a dark and heavy trouble, such as made it an abode of unhappiness to all its inmates, and hardly the place to which children could have been sent with advantage. Branwell Brontë, the only brother of the family, upon whose varied and brilliant talents so many hopes had been built, had, after following various employments, obtained a position as tutor in a family where he became only too great a favourite. He formed an unhappy and illicit attachment, which while it at times overwhelmed him with remorse and self-upbraiding, he had not the strength to shake off. The sisters, and especially Charlotte, were terrified with vague presentiments of approaching evil, when he would come home for his holidays in wretched spirits, vaguely accusing himself of nameless treachery and wickedness, and haunted by thoughts which he endeavoured to stifle by resorting inordinately to the use of stimulants.

At length the whole mystery was divulged, and in a manner terribly shocking to the quiet family at the Parsonage, very ill, and in strange agitation. He had been dismissed at a moment's notice with disgrace by his employer, with an injunction, under penalty of exposure, never to hold communication with his family again. From that time the unhappy young man never made an attempt to retrieve his character or position. He was the skeleton in the house at Haworth parsonage. He became an habitual drunkard. He kept his anxious sisters and his father—upon whom at this time the misfortune of blindness had fallen, though he afterwards partially recovered his sight—in a continual state of nervous trepidation lest, in his fits of temporary delirium, he should commit some frenzied act of self-destruction. During the day he slept much, or lounged about in a listless, purposeless way; but at night he was very restless, and sometimes had fits of delirium tremens. He would come whimpering out of his father's bedroom in the morning, and declare: "We have had a terrible night of it, the poor old man and I—he does his best, the poor old man; but it's all her fault—her fault!" He lived for some time afterwards, but never took one upward step. Occasionally he would receive money from some mysterious source; his father and sisters dared not confess to each other their suspicions as to whence it came; and then he would indulge in a lamentable debauch till the supply was gone, when he sank back into his listless, brooding state. Charlotte told an old school friend, who was her constant correspondent, how they were harassed day and night by her unhappy brother's conduct, adding that good situations had been repeatedly offered to him, "but he will do nothing but drink and make us all wretched." Once the family were taken by surprise by the sudden arrival of a sheriff's officer, "with an invitation to Branwell either to pay his debts or to take a trip to York," the debts having to be paid there and then by the family. What with the blindness of the father of the household, the gradual sinking of the brother into an early grave, and their own feeble health, the three brave sisters had more than enough of depressing influences to encounter when they resolved to turn to literature as a means of subsistence; and it is not to be wondered at that the books they produced were tinged with the gloom that surrounded their own lives.

LITERARY PROJECTS RESUMED; THE NOVELS OF CURRIER, ELLIS, AND ACTON BELL.

Considering that their sex, if known, might place them at a disadvantage in the effort to get their works examined and accepted for publication, the three sisters, Charlotte, Emily, and Anne Brontë, respectively assumed the pseudonyms of Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell. Their first literary venture was the publishing, on their own account, of a "Collection of Poems by Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell," which the critics imagined to have been written by three brothers. Like most poetry by unknown hands, the book excited little attention, and did not pay its expenses. Undiscouraged by this failure, the sisters set to work each upon a prose work of fiction. Emily Brontë produced a strange, weird, powerful tale entitled "Wuthering Heights;" Anne Brontë, a graceful little story, "Agnes Grey;" while Charlotte wrote "The Professor." The different manuscripts were sent to London, where "Wuthering Heights" and "Agnes Grey" found a publisher, though on anything but remunerative terms to the writers. "The Professor," on the other hand, met with acceptance nowhere; the MS. came back over and over again; and on the very day when Charlotte was about to accompany her father, who was to undergo the difficult operation of having a cataract removed from his eyes, the unfortunate book came home again, with a curt letter of refusal. But out of failure the light of hope began to dawn. In a brown paper parcel with the names of various houses to which the work had been sent in vain not obliterated, but merely scored out, the MS. arrived at the offices of Messrs. Smith and Elder, in Cornhill. What befell there may be told in the words published by the anxious author in the character of Currer Bell.

"As a forlorn hope," she writes, "we tried one publishing house more. Ere long, in a much shorter space of time than that on which experience had taught him to calculate, there came a letter, which he opened in the dreary anticipation of finding two hard, hopeless lines intimating that 'Messrs. Smith and Elder were not disposed to publish the MS. ;' and instead, he took out of the envelope a letter of two pages. He read it trembling. It declined, indeed, to publish that tale for business reasons, but it discussed its merits and demerits so courteously, so considerably, in a spirit so rational, with a discrimination so enlightened, that this very refusal cheered the author better than a vulgarly expressed acceptance would have done. It was added that a work in three volumes would meet with careful attention." Accordingly, Charlotte Brontë laid aside "The Professor," and set to work indefatigably upon a three volume work. That work, destined to found and to assure the fame of its writer, she entitled "Jane Eyre."

When the work was forwarded to Messrs. Smith and Elder for acceptance, the gentleman who had to read it at once perceived its transcendent merit, and expressed himself with a warmth that amused Mr. Smith. "You seem to have been so much enchanted that I do not know how to believe you," was the laughing comment. But a second opinion, coinciding with the first, induced Mr. Smith to read it for himself; and the work was at once accepted and put into the printer's hands without delay. Within two months of its arrival in Cornhill the book was published, in October 1847.

"JANE EYRE;" SUCCESS OF THE WORK; STARTLING PASSAGES; THE AUTHOR'S VINDICATION OF HER BOOK.

The success of the work was immediate and complete. The originality displayed throughout every chapter, the powerful delineation of human character, motive, and action, the excellence of the style and the skill in the working out of the well-linked incidents, showed that a new light had arisen in the literary world; and all were anxious to know who this Currer Bell, whose name did not even give a clue to the sex of the possessor, could possibly be. On this subject the publishers knew no more than the public, their communications having been with "Currer Bell, Esq., to the care of Miss Brontë, Haworth." The unknown writer was exceedingly anxious that the anonymity should be preserved; and for a long time the secret was kept. There was "a rush for copies;" and in December a second edition was published, with a preface by the author, thanking the public for its indulgent reception of a plain tale with few pretensions, the Press for the fair field its honest suffrage opened to an obscure aspirant, and the publishers of the work for their liberality to an unknown and unrecommended author. Then the writer entered upon a defence of the book against the strictures of unfriendly critics, and of that section of readers who had been shocked at the outspoken plainness of many of its passages; at the manner in which, for instance, the self-righteous cant of the Reverend Mr. Brocklehurst was held up to odium and ridicule. "Conventionality is not morality," the author says, "self-righteousness is not religion. To attack the first is not to assail the last. To pluck the mask from the face of the Pharisee is not to lift an impious hand to the Crown of Thorns." Then with a scriptural reference that smacks of the sturdy old Puritan spirit, the reader is reminded that Ahab did not like Micaiah because he never prophesied good concerning him, but evil; that probably he liked the sycophant son of Chenaanah better; and that yet Ahab might have escaped a bloody death, had he but stopped his ears to flattery, and opened them to faithful counsel. "Appearance should not be mistaken for truth," says the writer; "narrow human doctrines that only tend to elate and magnify a few should not be substituted for the world redeeming creed of Christ." Thus did Charlotte Brontë defend her intention in publishing this remarkable book.

BLEMISHES IN THE WORK; PRESENCE OF COARSENESS; EVIL EXAMPLE.

That a defence was needed there was no doubt, for there is much in the tale to startle the reader, and some things of which the friendliest critic cannot conscientiously approve. The manner in which Mr. Rochester tells Jane Eyre the story of Céline Varens, has at first the appearance of a cool cynicism that, to use Miss Brontë's own expression concerning Balzac's books, "leaves a bad taste in the mouth." Even Mrs. Gaskell, the friend, the admirer, and the loving and sympathetic biographer of Charlotte Brontë, is reluctantly compelled to admit the existence of coarseness in this and the subsequent works of the authoress, who, in publishing certain passages of the work may be said, as Lord Macaulay said of Clive in his transactions with Meer Jaffier, "to have done that which if not evil in itself was certainly of evil example." For the unqualified success and acceptance of the work among the English readers both in Great Britain and in America, caused a number of imitators of "Jane Eyre" to spring up, with just enough ability to copy with more or less cleverness the points that had "made the judicious grieve," without showing a spark of the genius of the author. Every writer has a responsibility, not alone with regard to what he says himself, but in so far as he may influence the thought and expression of his time, with regard to what he may cause others to say.

UNCONSCIOUS IMITATION OF THACKERAY ; DISAGREEABLE CHARACTERS IN "JANE EYRE."

It is a significant fact that this second edition is dedicated to William Makepeace Thackeray, for whom the author had at that time an unbounded admiration, somewhat modified subsequently, it would appear, in the days of her matured and ripened judgment. Something of the tendency to probe with the merciless scalpel of his wit the wounds and sore places of poor humanity, that to a certain extent mars the work of the author of "Vanity Fair," is found in the delineations of character in "Jane Eyre." The whole of the Reed family, nearly the whole company of guests assembled at Thornfield Hall, Mr. Brocklehurst and his belongings, Miss Scatcherd of Lowood, are all disagreeable. In the preface to "Jane Eyre," Thackeray is described as "hurling the Greek fire of his sarcasm and flashing the levin brand of his denunciation;" it is to be lamented that Miss Brontë followed him too closely in this her first book; for at that time he had not yet given to the world his "Colonel Newcome" or "Henry Esmond." Meanwhile "Wuthering Heights" and "Agnes Grey," the productions of Ellis and Acton Bell, had been delayed in the hands of the publishers, somewhat to the indignation of Charlotte, who wrote to Mr. Smith asking if this were the usual method adopted by the firm in the management of business, or an exceptional instance. "A different spirit seems to preside at — Street," she writes, "to that which guides the helm at 65, Cornhill . . . my relatives have suffered from exhausting delay and procrastination, while I have to acknowledge the benefits of a management at once businesslike and gentlemanlike, energetic and considerate." One of the many excellent traits in her character was the warm readiness to acknowledge kindness and courtesy.

BOOKS BY ELLIS AND ACTON BELL ; "WUTHERING HEIGHTS ;" "STRANGE POWER OF THE WORK ; ORIGINALITY OF THE CHARACTERS."

The success of "Jane Eyre" may have hastened the publication of "Wuthering Heights" and "Agnes Grey," which appeared in December of the same year. A second and longer tale, "The Tenant of Wildfell Hall," by Acton Bell, appeared soon afterwards. In "Wuthering Heights," especially, the genius of the Brontë family was displayed. The reader is, indeed, bewildered by the rough strength of the portraiture, and wonders what strange kind of beings these can be to whom he is introduced, with their fierce passions, their indomitable loves and hatreds, and their cruel crimes. The dark villain Heathcliff, with his fiendish malice and persevering malignity, and yet with a capacity for love as deep and lasting as his vengeance; the wretched Hindley Earnshaw, falling a victim to the hatred of the man he has wronged and oppressed; the puritanical hypocrite old Joseph; the wayward Catharines, mother and daughter; and the weak Edgar and Isabella Linton—are a thoroughly original group of characters, though far from an attractive one. What can have induced the authoress to collect into one volume such a mass of moral hideousness as that which obscures the pages of this wonderful work, must always remain a matter of doubt; but there is a terrible fascination in the book, that carries the reader irresistibly forward from beginning to end. As a first production of an undisciplined pen, it is a wonderful effort; we can only mournfully conjecture what grand work that genius that created "Wuthering Heights" would have produced in its maturity, and echo Charlotte's mournful cry of regret: "If she had only lived!"

ANNE BRONTË'S "TENANT OF WILDFELL HALL;" A PUBLISHER'S MISTAKE.

In Anne Brontë's book, "The Tenant of Wildfell Hall," on the other hand, the intention is clear enough. It is a book written with an object, the purpose of the writer being obviously to place before the reader as a warning example the picture of a character degraded and brought to ruin by intemperance. We are told that the task was most uncongenial to the gentle nature of Anne Brontë, but that she forced herself to accomplish it, and to work out all the details, holding it a duty to set up a warning beacon, to show the quicksands on which she had seen a life wrecked. For it was written during the time when the brother's miserable drunkenness and profligacy were destroying the whole happiness of the quiet household at Haworth. The resemblance of the books in style, and the likeness of both of them to "Jane Eyre," induced various critics to express an opinion that Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell were one and the same personage, and that "Wuthering Heights," "Agnes Grey," and "The Tenant of Wildfell Hall," were earlier and cruder efforts of the hand that had produced "Jane Eyre."

The secret was first revealed by the authors themselves, in vindication of their own good faith. In consequence of the sale of "Jane Eyre" in America, the London publishers had agreed to let a New York firm have early proof sheets of the next new novel by Currer Bell. This gentleman soon afterwards heard that another American house had been promised early sheets of Currer Bell's book, Ellis and Acton Bell's publisher having declared to this second firm that to the best of his belief "Jane Eyre," "Wuthering Heights," and "The Tenant of Wildfell Hall," were all works by one and the same author.

VISIT OF CHARLOTTE AND ANNE BRONTË TO LONDON; "SHIRLEY" COMMENCED; TROUBLES AT HOME; DEATH OF BRANWELL BRONTË.

The arrival of a letter from Cornhill at Haworth parsonage stating these particulars, so disturbed the inmates there, that Charlotte and Anne determined to start for London that very day, and prove their separate existence by a personal appearance at Messrs. Smith and Elder's offices. Accordingly they packed up a change of dress, walked to Keighley through a thunder-storm, took the night train to the capital, and arrived next morning at the Chapter Coffee House in Paternoster Row, whence they made their way to Cornhill. Mr. Smith could hardly believe his eyes and ears when his own letter written by himself only twenty-four hours before was put into his hands, and he was assured that in the two small, timid-looking ladies before him, he saw the veritable Currer and Acton Bell. He immediately set about making arrangements for showing them some of the sights of London, and introducing them to his family; and after a few pleasant and very exciting days, the sisters returned to their Yorkshire solitude well pleased with their visit. The new book by Currer Bell, respecting whose proof sheets the misunderstanding had arisen, had begun almost immediately after the completion of "Jane Eyre." It was entitled "Shirley;" and in the character of the heroine, a Yorkshire heiress, various traits of the author's sister Emily were reproduced. It had advanced about two-thirds towards completion, when a series of mournful events came in succession, to turn the quiet parsonage into a house of mourning.

The first blow, one, however, which had been long expected, was the death of Branwell Brontë. That unhappy man, with his constitution undermined by intemperance, had long been gradually sinking into the grave, but the end, when it came, was somewhat sudden. Eccentric to the last, he determined to die standing, having heard that even the moribund body could be forced to obey the dictates of a strong will; and when the last agony came on he insisted on being lifted to an erect position. In a beautiful letter to a friend, Charlotte Brontë describes how all remembrance of his faults seemed to fade away as she gazed on the corpse of him who had once been the pride and hope of the family, the light of his father's and his sisters' eyes; how during the last day or two of his life the young man's hard spirit had seemed to soften, and how they were now content to leave him, after his brief life of sin, remorse, and suffering, in the hands of the Infinite Mercy.

EMILY BRONTË, "ELLIS BELL;" HER CHARACTER; HER ILLNESS AND DEATH.

The grave had scarcely closed over Branwell ere its shadow fell upon another member of the household at Haworth. Emily, whose novel, "Wuthering Heights," gave such promise of future excellence, was the next to be summoned away. Hers was a singular and, to the general observer, not a genial or pleasant nature. Exceedingly reticent and almost exaggeratedly taciturn, she went on her way through life seeking no sympathy, and forming few or no friendships out of her own family circle; but Charlotte and Anne, who knew her best, almost worshipped her. Some traits in her character show a masculine courage and determination; such as her hastening into the kitchen, after being bitten by a mad dog, to which, in ignorance of its condition, she had mercifully tendered a bowl of water, and searing the wound with a red-hot Italian iron; and again, her dragging her savage bull-dog, Keeper, by the scruff of his neck off a bed on which he had stretched his tawny limbs in luxurious repose, and punishing him vigorously, amid ominous growls from the infuriated brute, whose savage nature had been thoroughly aroused. Her illness was rapid consumption.

Charlotte Brontë, in a preface to a new edition of "Wuthering Heights" and "Agnes Grey," published after the death of the authors, gives some particulars of their deaths, telling how, in the very burden and heat of the day, the labourers failed over their work, and how Emily was the first to decline. "Day by day," says the sorrowing sister, "when I saw with what a front she met suffering, I looked on her with an anguish of wonder and love. I have never seen anything like it; but, indeed, I have never seen her parallel in anything. Stronger than a man, simpler than a child, her nature stood alone." "The awful point was," says Mrs. Gaskell, "that while full of ruth for others, on herself she had no pity; the spirit was inexorable to the flesh; from the trembling hands, the unnerved limbs, the fading eyes, the same service was exacted. To stand by and witness this, and not dare to remonstrate, was a pain no words can render. In fact, Emily never went out of doors after the Sunday succeeding Branwell's death. She made no complaint, she would not endure questioning, she rejected sympathy and help." On the very day of her death she rose, and with feeble hands dressed herself as usual, and actually tried to set about her household tasks. It was not until within a few hours of the last struggle that she consented to see a doctor. A strong, wild nature, but strangely attractive to the gentler sisters, to Charlotte especially, who appeared to look on the stronger spirit with a yearning admiration.

ANNE BRONTË, "ACTON BELL;" HER LAST ILLNESS AND DEATH; "SHIRLEY" RESUMED IN SOLITUDE BY THE AUTHOR.

Hardly had the remains of Emily Brontë been carried to their rest in Haworth churchyard, when it became manifest that Anne, the youngest sister, must quickly follow. The family disease, consumption, had fastened upon her, and a medical examination revealed to the anxious relatives the mournful fact that both her lungs were affected. Unlike Emily, she eagerly adopted every method suggested for alleviation or cure; and at length, at her own request, was taken as a last hope to Scarborough, only to die four days after her arrival in full and certain hope of a joyful resurrection. She lies buried at Scarborough. "Take courage, Charlotte, take courage!" were the last words she spoke.

Courage, indeed, the mournful courage of resignation, was sorely needed when the sole survivor of that gifted group re-entered the desolate house, where the old father, now in his seventy-third year, sat bereaved of his children. From that moment the one surviving child devoted herself to the task of cheering and supporting her father; and it is touching to see how in after days, when she became famous under her own name, and the authoress of "Jane Eyre" was pointed out as a celebrity, she still paid a childlike obedience to the advice of the parent she loved, and gave up her own dearest hopes in affectionate obedience to his wishes. The greatest trial of all was the resumption of home occupations and literary industry, once carried on hopefully in common by the sisters with kindly interchange of counsel and encouragement, now to be pursued by the survivor alone and unaided. The sisters had been accustomed to betake themselves, after the tasks of the day were done, to the room once known as "the children's study," and there, in the twilight deepening into darkness, they passed to, and fro, with arms intertwined, discussing the incidents and scenes of their novels, and giving mutual criticism and encouragement; but now, within the space of nine months, the grave had three times closed over a member of the Brontë family; and the tale of "Shirley," begun when there were three sisters alive, was finished with its authoress as the sole survivor. She still retained the habit of walking to and fro in the darkening shadows of twilight in the desolate room, sadly thinking of the days that were no more. Yet there was work to be done, and it was done bravely and well. But we can well agree that "though the work was resumed and continued resignedly, it was dreary to write without anyone to listen to the progress of her tale, to find fault or to sympathize while pacing the length of the parlour in the evenings." Under these circumstances her constitutional timidity revived, and she greatly feared that by her second work she would lose the reputation gained by her first.

"SHIRLEY" ANOTHER TRIUMPH; CHARLOTTE BRONTË'S INTERVIEW WITH THACKERAY.

The apprehension was groundless. "Shirley," though it contained no such powerful characters as Rochester and the heroine in "Jane Eyre," was well received and favourably criticised. The humorous portraits of the three curates, taken, like the other personages in the book, from originals who had come under the writer's observation, excited much amusement; and the charm of the style was equal to that in the former work. With her publishers her relations were always cordial; with the family of Mr. Smith she was on terms of friendly intimacy, and was at various times tempted to leave the seclusion of Haworth for a short visit to London, residing during her stay with Mr. Smith's family, and making acquaintance with the celebrities of the literary world, who had learnt to admire and appreciate her in her works. Among other literary magnates whom she thus got to know, was the ideal of her former days, Thackeray, her estimate of whom was now less enthusiastic, and perhaps more judicious than when she dedicated "Jane Eyre" to him. In London, and afterwards at Manchester, she heard him give one of his famous lectures on the English humorists; and not without reason took exception to the tone of his remarks on the life and character of Fielding, whose vices of intemperance and extravagance she considered treated in altogether too easy a view of toleration. Thackeray, no doubt, had the idea of speaking of the famous novelist of the eighteenth century in the spirit of Fielding's contemporaries, and thus treated the vice of drunkenness as it would have been treated in a time when it was as much the fashion for a gentleman to exceed in wine as to wear ruffles, a sword, and a periwig; but Miss Brontë pertinently asks whether the great novelist would have regarded the matter in the same half jocose spirit if he had seen a son treading the downward road of intemperance, whose goal is ruin, and what effect the lecturer's remarks were likely to produce on any youth with a turn for dissipation who might be present. That she regarded Thackeray with less awe than in former days is shown in her discussing his faults with him in a confidential conversation; the great writer making a half amused defence that in many cases puzzled his accuser by aggravating the fault.

LITERARY ACQUAINTANCES AND FRIENDS; OLD SCHOOLFELLOWS AND MISS WOOLER.

Among the acquaintances she made in her flying visits to London, during the concluding years of her life,—acquaintances that generally ripened into friendships, for when her shy reserve was once overcome, she was found to be both warmhearted and genial, are to be recorded those of Mrs. Gaskell her biographer, Miss Martineau whose guest she became at Ambleside, Mr. H. G. Lewes the critic, who once offended her sorely by what she considered some unkind remarks upon her second book, and Mr. Sydney Dobell, whose poems she greatly admired. With several of her old schoolfellows from Miss Wooler's, and with Miss Wooler herself, she maintained a friendship to the last; and many humbler friends she had also among the village population for three miles round Haworth, in whose joys and sorrows she never failed to sympathize, and with whom Miss Brontë was a general favourite. Various families of the neighbouring gentry were also anxious to have her as a guest in their houses, and made advances accordingly. But she had an invincible dislike to being lionised, and except in the case of Sir James and Lady Kay Shuttleworth, of whose hospitality she availed herself more than once she persistently declined such offers.

SOLITARY LIFE; PUBLICATION OF "VILLETTE;" GROUNDLESS APPREHENSIONS.

In spite of the occasional glimpses of change in her visits to London and to friends in Yorkshire, her existence was a very solitary one. Her father was approaching his eightieth year, and passed most of his time alone in his study; and his one surviving child was left to her solitary musings in the deserted house, peopled only with the shadows of the dear ones departed. Haworth, too, was damp and unhealthy, and every winter the health of the inmates of the parsonage was sorely tried. Meanwhile her publishers were anxious for another work from her pen; and in failing health and a mental and physical depression against which she struggled heroically, she sat down to write "Villette," a book in which she turned to account her experiences in the institution of Madame Héger, Villette being a pseudonym for the city of Brussels. It was uphill work, writing alone in her wretched state of nervousness and debility. As the book, which under these untoward circumstances lingered long in the writing, approached completion, she became morbidly apprehensive of failure, and dreaded the announcement of the "new novel by Currer Bell." "These are the transcendentalisms of a retired wretch," she wrote to her publishers; and soon her fears were quieted by the general welcome with which the book was received. Indeed, in many respects it shows an improvement on her former works, especially in matters of description and style. Had she been able to travel, Miss Brontë would have given us excellent pictures of the cities of the world; and had she visited Brussels later in life, her account of "Labassecour" and its inhabitants would have been less prejudiced. On the whole, the wonder is that she should have made so much of the materials she possessed.

HER MARRIAGE TO MR. NICHOLLS.

This was her last literary work. At the end of her life came a bright gleam of sunshine, alas, only too brief. She had in the course of her life received several offers of marriage, but with excellent good sense had declined to marry where her heart was not engaged, preferring to toil on and preserve her freedom. A proposal from the Rev. Mr. Nicholls, her father's curate, whom she had long known and esteemed, was looked upon favourably by her; but Mr. Brontë objected, and she at once gave up her own wishes in deference to his. Mr. Nicholls, however, was constant, and waited patiently till time did its work in overcoming the old father's somewhat selfish opposition. He gave his consent to the marriage, which took place in June 1854; and Mr. Nicholls became an inmate of the parsonage. The few months of the wedded life of Charlotte Brontë were months of calm and peaceful rest. "We, her loving friends," says her biographer, "standing outside, caught occasional glimpses of brightness, and pleasant, peaceful murmurs of sound, telling of the gladness within, and we looked at each other, and gently said, 'After a hard and long struggle—after many cares and many bitter sorrows, she is tasting happiness now!' . . . And we thought, and we hoped, and we prophesied, in our great love and reverence. But God's ways are not as our ways."

A SHORT PERIOD OF HAPPINESS; THE END.

Happiness and rest came too late to be lasting; or rather, they were soon to be exchanged for the rest that is eternal. The constitution, nervous and delicate, gave way suddenly, as in the case of Emily and Anne. A cold, the consequence of a walk over melted snow, completed the work of years. Fever came on with continual depression and utter inability to take nourishment, the very sight of food bringing on intolerable nausea. She was too well used to suffering to be easily alarmed; and bore this crisis as she had borne the former burdens laid upon her, with meekness and patience, at times even with cheerfulness, hoping that this attack would pass away like others of the same nature at previous times; but when day succeeded day and no relief came, a dark feeling of dread began to awaken in the hearts of the husband and father to whom she was dearer than anything else on earth, and soon this dread took a more definite and alarming form.

The biographer of Charlotte Brontë graphically portrays the scene beside the dying bed. "Long days and longer nights went by, still the same relentless nausea and faintness, and still borne on in patient trust. About the third week in March there was a change; a low, wandering delirium came on, and in it she begged constantly for food, and even for stimulants. She swallowed eagerly now, but it was too late. Wakening for an instant from this stupor of intelligence, she saw her husband's woe-worn face, and caught the sound of some murmured words of prayer that God would spare her. 'Oh!' she whispered forth, 'I am not going to die, am I? He will not separate us, we have been so happy!'"

But her course was run. That life of noble self-sacrifice was complete, and her work on earth was finished. The end came; and after nine months of happy wedded life, Charlotte Brontë died on the 31st of March, 1855, in the old parsonage at Haworth, where for years she had toiled in the path of undeviating duty. On the day when her corpse was carried forth from the door of her father's house, there were many who remembered with tears how short a time since she had emerged from that same portal a pale but cheerful bride; still more remembered how abounding her charities had been, and how, not only the toiler in the narrow way, but the erring fellow-creatures, the "unfortunates weary of breath," had found in her a pitying, consistent, and helpful friend. And some few sighed when they thought what that creative genius might still have produced, and how great a literary light was here prematurely extinguished.

FRIEDRICH VON SCHILLER.

He wears no mask, - he hates all crooked ways -
He is true,
He's so good, so noble.

Piccolomini, Act. ii. Sc. 5.

THE PERIOD OF SCHILLER'S BIRTH; HIS PARENTAGE.

THE eventful year 1759 found Europe plunged in the very depths of the cruel Seven Years' War. It was the fourth campaign of that terrible struggle; and besides the principals, Austria and Prussia, who were tearing each other like lion and tiger, the other powers who had been drawn into the fray, England and France, Russia and Sweden, with various smaller principalities compelled to furnish their contingents to the fray, had cause to lament, in wasted treasure and slaughtered men, the Juno-like vengeance of the Empress-queen who had stirred up this mortal strife, and the invincible pertinacity of the great Frederick, who was evidently determined to fight it out to the bitter end.

Among the armics sent forth by Maria Theresa against the Prussian king, from whom she was determined to win back her forfeited province of Sillesia at any cost, was an auxiliary force of Württembergers; and in this corps, in the regiment "Prince Louis," was to be found a certain Captain Johann Caspar Schiller. A sturdy, honest officer was the captain, and helpful in many ways; for he had been a surgeon; and when an epidemic disorder decimated his corps, he undertook, at a pinch, the multifarious duties of army doctor, in addition to his own regimental work; tending the sick, and watching by them, like the good Samaritan he was, and even officiating as regimental chaplain; reading prayers to the men, like the good Baron of Bradwardine, and even leading the psalms at the Sunday parades. A very pleasant picture to contemplate, in looking back at those troublous times, is that of the little captain, in his big three-cornered hat and trim tight-fitting uniform—ever ready for duty in whatever shape it might come: a man, moreover, eager to acquire knowledge, and possessed, as we find by his journals, of a regretful remembrance of the impediments that had prevented him, in early life, from improving his mind by study; and yet amassing a very respectable stock of learning, especially in scientific agriculture; and at last attracting the attention of the Grand Duke, and promoted to be superior intendant or overseer of the Forest operations in the domain around the beautiful castle of "Solitude," near Stuttgart. He wrote a book on his favourite subject, Die Baumzucht im Grossen, tree cultivation on a large scale, and lived and died honoured and respected, as he deserved to be.

SCHILLER'S BIRTH AND EARLIEST YEARS.

While Captain Schiller was doing his duty in camp, moving with his corps from place to place, and seeing the "seamy side" as well as the showier aspect of glorious war, there was a wife, a good gentle-hearted woman, in the little town of Marbach, waiting tearfully and hopefully the day when the cruel war should cease. There was about her, as about her husband, a simple trustful piety that reminds us of the best aspect of the old Puritans; and though of limited education, and aspiring to be nothing beyond a good German Hausfrau, her refinement of feeling and poetic elevation of mind had the best effect on the little household she ruled wisely and well, and on the rougher but honest-hearted captain, over whom her influence was unbounded. In 1757, this worthy wife became the mother of a daughter, Christophine; and two years afterwards, at the quaint little peaceful Marbach, on the bright Neckar, there was born to her a son, Johann Christoph Friedrich, destined to reflect lustre on his country, and to give the quiet country town an interest similar to that with which Englishmen regard Stratford-on-Avon.

Captain Schiller managed to hasten from the camp, to gaze on his new son and heir; and that in his natural exultation there mingled a sense of his own deficient education, is shown in an allusion in a manuscript volume of reflections written by him when that son had become great and famous: "And Thou, Being of all beings, I prayed to Thee after the birth of my only son, that Thou wouldst add to his portion, in vigour of mind, what I could not attain for want of instruction, and Thou hast heard me. I thank Thee, most beneficent Being, that Thou hearest the prayer of mortals."

Four years later the war was over, and the captain was restored to his family circle. Soon after, he was sent by the Duke Carl of Württemberg, as recruiting officer, to Schwäbisch Gmünd, an old imperial city; but his place of residence with his family was at Lorch, a beautiful rural spot, with an old cloister, where are the graves of the mighty Hohenstauffen, and the ruins of the old castle, from which the race took its name. Here the Schiller family dwelt very happily for some years, though in narrow circumstances; for Captain Schiller found it a hard matter to get his arrears of pay. The good father was painfully anxious to give his son the education he himself lacked. At six years of age little Fritz found in the kindly clergyman of Lorch, Pastor Moser, a judicious tutor, and began to learn the elements of Latin and Greek, in addition to lessons in reading and writing; while Captain Schiller himself took all possible pains in bringing out the minds of his children, telling them anecdotes of his own career in the wars, or stirring histories connected with the old Hohenstauffen Castle, and its former inhabitants; for there was a certain store of romance hidden away under the stiff military bearing and abrupt, soldierly curtness of Captain Schiller.

CHARACTER OF THE CHILD ; POETIC INFLUENCES.

The childhood of little Fritz was a happy one. The kind-hearted though stern-mannered father was always to be propitiated by an appeal from his gentle wife ; and the children used cunningly to confess their small misdeeds to her, and request to receive the punishment at her hand, before a report was made to the paternal authority. Christophine, who resembled her father in features, worshipped Fritz, who, with his blue eyes and open forehead, was the image of his mother. For this good sister, who lived to be ninety years old, Schiller always cherished a far warmer feeling of love and respect than for the two others who in course of time increased the family circle. Affectionate and grateful by nature, he never forgot that Christophine had been his earliest and most devoted friend.
